Nothing arouses love so surely or in so pure a form as a little baby. "All the world loves a lover" and all the world loves a baby. That historic scene of the Nativity, with its sweetly (simple) human figures, its domestic love, its mutual reverence and devotion, its exquisite blending of humility and dignity, goes straight to the heart of humanity.

To get close to the spirit of that, one feels, is to come into the very presence of God. To quote Christina Rossetti's beautiful poem again:—

"Worship we the Godhead
Love Incarnate, Love Divine,
Worship we our Jesus
But wherewith for sacred sign?"

"Love shall be our token
Love be yours, and love be mine,
Love to God and all men,
Love for plea, and gift and sign!"

Christmas then must become a spirit within us, or it fails even as a festival without. In vain the merriment and the mirth unless deep beneath it all we can feel its echoes in Heaven and in the heart of the All-Ruler. The happiness of a godless world can never be more than a hollow mockery. Only the joy that carries conscience and faith in full consent can really satisfy the soul.

The Christmas of the heart means the constant worship and service of Love. The love that came down at Christmas is a King to whom unswerving loyalty must be sworn and from whose service there is no discharge. A Gospel fitfully embraced and intermittently served—a poor thing of times and seasons only—cannot save humanity. Christmas all-the-year-round is our need and our hope. Our Christian Faith is a faith in love as God and God as love.

Innumerable legends of great beauty have been coined by the Church to express this fundamental truth. The story of St. Christopher and the Christ-child, of Sir Launfal and his vision, come to one's mind. The American poet Edwin Markham has two exquisite poems upon this theme, "Conrad the Cobbler," and "The Hindered Guest." In the latter poem we are told of a certain Friar Hilary who in his search for God withdrew himself from mankind, built a tower of stone and passed his days within it in solitary prayer. It became a constant prayer with him that the Lord should visit his narrow cell.

"One bleak December he fasted sore
That Christ might knock at his low door."

Something, however, seemed to be hindering the coming of the Holy Guest. At last one dark night a cry of distress penetrated to his cell and obeying for once his natural impulse, Friar Hilary ran out into the blackness of the surrounding forest to give what aid he could. He discovered a stricken man, helped him up the steep stairs of his tower and there administered to him.

"He washed his feet and stroked his hair
And for the once forgot his prayer."

As he finished attending to his brother's need he was thrilled to discover standing by his side, the Lord Christ. And from the lips of the Lord of Love fell the explanation of all the delay—

My son,
My children on My errands run,
And when you flung the psalter by
And turned to heed a brother's cry,
You turned at last your rusty key
And left the door ajar for Me!

That is the greatest meaning of Christmas. God comes to human life when Love comes. "Love came down at Christmas" that we might know at last what God is and what we must be. Let Love come into final possession of your heart and life and Christmas will be perfectly yours—for you it shall be at last finally true "unto you is born . . . a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord."

WESTCLIFF-ON-SEA, Essex, England.

BE of good faith, my dear Friends, look not out for any thing; fear none of those things ye may be exposed to suffer, either outwardly or inwardly; but trust in the Lord over all, and your life will spring, and grow, and refresh you, and ye will learn obedience and faithfulness daily more and more, even by your exercises and sufferings; yea, the Lord will teach you the very mystery of faith and obedience; the wisdom, power, love, and goodness of the Lord ordering every thing for you, and ordering your hearts in every thing.—1. ## LIMITATION IN AMUSEMENTS.

BENJAMIN S. DECOU.

A willingness to be guided in regard to our amusement, as in other affairs of life, seems to be of much importance. When such an attitude really exists, it matters not whether the guidance be in positive or negative form, for each is seen to be but a different view of the same thing and perhaps both are necessary to complete the picture. If, on the other hand, one desires to have his own way, instructions in positive form are just as likely to cause rebellion as those in negative form. In short, it is the attitude of the individual which seems to be a very important factor in determining the reactions resulting from any attempt to guide his steps.

It is our belief that God speaks directly to individual men in a loving endeavor to guard them from pitfalls and to lead them in a way that is safe and sure. As men heed and follow this divine guidance, they learn much as to what helps or hinders the growth of the spiritual life, and find themselves constrained to warn and direct others who are following over the same way. Such experience has produced our queries. We may, if we choose, try to test the effect of every thing ourselves, but when we are surrounded by so many witnesses it hardly seems desirable to lose the time and energy involved. We do not consider such a course necessary in other departments of life; for example, no one thinks of testing the poisonous quality of laudanum in his own life.

Is there not a solemn responsibility resting on parents, on the church, and in fact upon all of us, to hold up both the danger signals as well as those showing the way to be clear? It would be sad indeed to have an erring brother say to us, "you never told me of the danger ahead and so I have made shipwreck."

Everyone, no doubt, will agree to the principle that amusements may be harmful, and that our time should be healthfully employed. But is it not helpful to have some concrete illustrations of what is harmful and what is healthful? It has been generally conceded in the past that "theatres, opera, dances" are good illustrations of harmful amusements; perhaps new and better illustrations could be found, and it might be well to give some illustrations of amusements that have proven healthful in Christian experience.

The crux of the situation, nevertheless, would seem to be in the individual attitude, that is, it is not so much the query, as it is our life that needs to be changed. Shall we not, therefore, pray that we may come into the attitude described by Paul when he writes to the Philippians; "Yet all that was gain to me, for Christ's sake I have reckoned it loss. Nay, I even reckon all things as pure loss because of the priceless privilege of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord. And for His sake I have suffered the loss of everything, and reckon it all as mere refuse, in order that I may win Christ and may be found in union with Him, not having a righteousness of my own, derived from the Law, but that which arises from faith in Christ, the righteousness that comes from God through faith."*

HADDONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING.

Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting, held at Moorestown on the 14th, although somewhat smaller than usual, was felt to be a time of favor. The messages and the fellowship of a number of visiting Friends were helpful and strengthening.

In the afternoon session Esther Morton Smith and Anna Cope Evans were listened to with warm appreciation as they brought to us a fresh realization of our duty to our colored brethren, and of our responsibilities to all men, in helping to bring the Kingdom of God on earth as taught us in the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour.

The recommendation of the Representative Meeting, that the annual gathering of Ministers and Elders, usually held on *Weymouth Translation.

Third-day morning of Yearly Meeting week, should be held at another time, in order that the Yearly Meeting may hold one of its regular sessions at that time, was adopted for the coming year. The concern has been feelingly expressed that this may unduly tax the strength of Ministers and Elders who gather on Seventh-day preceding the Yearly Meeting, and perhaps result in some loss to them spiritually by a possible crowding of the matters claiming their attention.

The report of the Committee having charge of the meetings held in Atlantic City, showed the unique opportunity these afford of spreading our religious principles, and of reaching many who are hungry for a more spiritual way of worship. It is felt that Friends throughout the Yearly Meeting should bear these gatherings on their hearts and, as opportunity offers, should share in the responsibility of holding them to the glory of our Father in Heaven. The report also informs that the principal of the Friends' school, which is held in the same building, has a short Meeting on Fourth-day morning at nine o'clock, for the children, who number about eighty. Friends are also encouraged to join in this time of worship, or to notify the principal, if they wish to meet with the children on some other morning, at the same hour.

A committee was appointed to have a care over the little meeting which started in the home of our late friend George Abbott in Orlando, and has been held during the winter months for twenty years past.

The hotel "Osceola" which, through the courtesy of our late friend Joshua L. Hurley, has been the place of meeting for some years, will be again available this winter.

This is another "Friendly outpost" which should claim the prayerful thought and sympathy of Friends throughout our Yearly Meeting.

In our morning meeting the call has come to each of us, to come to Him who will tell us "all things that ever we did," as they appear in His sight, and enable us humbly to repent of our sins, great and small, which have separated us from Him.

If, in the Light of Christ, we will revalue the activities which fill our time, and will seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, wrestling for His blessing in all things, we shall become new creatures in Christ Jesus, and shall be enabled to enlist whole heartedly in His service, whom to serve is perfect joy and freedom.

Adventures in South America.

TAKEN FROM THE LETTERS AND NOTEBOOKS OF A TRIP TO COLOMBIA.

Sixth Month 20, 1922.

We are just back from a trip to "Canaan," the "finca" or mountain "farm" of Don Julian Uribe Uribe. We wanted to study the plants of the higher altitudes of the Central Andes. Don Julian's farm is right at the foot of the active volcano of Puracé, enabling us to reach Paramo in two hours with a climb of some three thousand feet. We did not know till afterwards that it was a risky thing to do as a couple of men had been killed on Puracé by an explosion only a few weeks ago. I shall never forget the grey volcanic ash over which we made our way or the fine rain that smote our faces giving some relief from the fumes of sulphuric acid which poured out from the soil in little clouds.

The "finca" has two small houses on it. In one of these lives the overseer or majordomo and in the other we took up our abode. It was like living in an Adirondack shack or a camp on the Rancocas. Our man, Luis, did the cooking in the majordomo's kitchen, which was of the crudest. It would seem to us that cooking was extremely hard work done over a smoking fire on the floor and in the dark; but Luis accepted every difficulty as a matter of course and succeeded in giving us good meals. He even learned to make excellent flapjacks with Aunt Jimima flour, and his coffee was always beyond praise. Nevertheless, it is good to get back again to our beautiful convent and to our friends here.

We have, as usual, been very busy over the plants. In the intervals there has been time for some visiting. One day we went to pay a bread and butter call on Señor Bolívar Mosquera, at whose country home we had spent a night on the way back from Puracé. Señor Mosquera's father, General Mosquera, had been twice president of the republic of Colombia, and we were shown his sword set with jewels and mounted with gold. We also saw there a charming letter from the Empress Eugenie and a lock of the Emperor Napoleon's hair which he had sent from St. Helena to a niece who gave it to the General when he was in France.

Yesterday I was taken to call on the wife of the ex-ambassador to Italy. We embraced in the Spanish fashion and sat down to afternoon tea. Presently it developed that the Señora had expected my husband also. I tried to excuse him on the ground that he was very busy, but the Señora soon had me at a desk composing a note which a small Indian boy stood ready to carry on a solid silver salver. In due time F. appeared and then we were taken downstairs to see the family treasures. There were vases of old blue porcelain, damask vestments embroidered in gold and set with jewels, a large casket of real tortoise shell with clasps of silver, some twenty hammered silver vases as high as my waist and a large solid silver ball on which the statue of the Virgin stands on certain great festival days. These were sacred to the church as was also the chiefest treasure of all—a solid gold crown set with over three hundred perfect emeralds, some of them as large as a quarter of a dollar. A special dispensation from the Pope gives the family permission to sell the crown and found an orphanage with the proceeds. Americans of wealth may apply. Are you interested?

CALLI, Colombia.

Seventh Month 15, 1922.

Here we are back in Cali after a strange jumble of experiences. The last night of our stay in Popayán was a fitting ending to a unique experience. We were serenaded at midnight in our own patio. Can you imagine the scene? First came a muffled noise of feet and chairs as the men filed into our patio and took their places. Then came the music, marvellous, mysterious, floating up to the dark and silent room where we lay listening. They played about an hour—played under the brilliant tropic stars and among the roses.

The next night was the most uncomfortable one I passed in Colombia. We had ridden off on the trail north early, arranging to meet our animals and men at the town of Piendamó in time to make camp for the night. Although we had ridden slowly we had seen nothing of our men during the day and when we came to the bridge at Piendamó there was still no sign of them. Darkness was coming on and a long, low hill rose up into the sky facing us. We were fain to camp there for the night, but bedding, provisions and tents were with the cargas. If Luis had, by chance, misunderstood us and gone on we dare not wait. We questioned a man camping by the roadside in an open tent walled up with coffee sacks. "Si, señor," he had seen seven mules and two peons. "They went by an hour ago." On the strength of this news we pushed on. After we passed the top of the ridge our mules began to trot of their own accord. It was so dark by that time that we could barely see each other's dim forms in the blackness. Finally it was too dark to go on. We turned up to a little inn and asked for lodging. Grudgingly they agreed to take us in. "Quanto?" (how much) queried the wary foreigner. "Veinte centavos" (twenty cents) was the answer. We dismounted and waited for supper which came in the course of time—excellent hot coffee and fresh eggs well poached. There was neither bread nor rice, but we were fortified to face the night after consuming some sweet oranges which we had purchased during the day at a bargain—fifteen oranges for two cents. Preparations for the night were primitive. There was only the one central room for all comers. The señora and the botanist were given two wooden benches each less than a foot wide. On these, with saddle pads below, ponchos above and saddle bags for pillows, we composed ourselves to sleep. The botanical companion took the dining-room table. Every one else had space on the floor. The innkeeper securely barred both the doors with forked sticks, thus shutting out all air, for there were no windows. Travel in Colombia when you take it as it comes is somewhat like what travel must have been in our own country in the pioneer days. Well, it is interesting to have been a pioneer for one night. But what a contrast to the moonlight serenade of the previous evening!

PANAMA,
Eighth Month 1, 1922.

Back in Panama and though still twenty-one hundred miles from home, nevertheless once again in an Anglo-Saxon twentieth century world. I felt it when I took my first step into the Hotel Tivoli, and I knew it definitely when somebody said to me of a mutual acquaintance, "She is a very busy woman." We speak English once again, we eat American food, we take a taxi from place to place. Gone is the land of romance with its scarlet saddle blankets, its sunny patios, its ancient convents, its treasures of gold and silver, its glorious orchids and its queer little native inns.

WHITTIER'S UNKNOWN ROMANCE.*

There have just been published some newly-discovered letters of John Greenleaf Whittier to Elizabeth Lloyd, of Philadelphia, which are of considerable interest.

The letters are stately and dignified to the point of quaintness almost in their simplicity and directness. They reveal not only his character but also give us an insight into her personality.

She is seen as a refined, gentle girl, well read, bright and intellectual with a deep love of the beautiful in nature and in art. She was a poet, too, and her verses on "Milton's Prayer of Patience" first published anonymously, have been printed in Milton's collected works as though he had written the poem.

She was a girl of some force of character, for when "read out of meeting" for marrying outside of the Society, her letter of protest was so strong and convincing that she was reinstated. Whittier was naturally much pleased at her readmittance and wrote her, "I cannot tell thee how glad I am to hear of thy success in maintaining thy place in our Society. It is a very, very rare instance. I scarcely know another like it."

Elizabeth Lloyd married Robert Howell, in 1853, but he died three years later. Whittier wrote her very touchingly in regard to her marriage. "I feel that thy instincts were right as respects that very happy and beautiful episode in thy life—that sweet calm sufficiency and fulness of love graciously offered thee for a season, which, brief as it was, had the length of years in its completeness, and which still blessed thee with the richest legacies of memory, and with hopes that outreach time and take hold upon eternity. . . . And, if, in the great happiness of meeting thee I seemed at any time to forget this, I am sure thee understood me, and knew that I would not designedly trust myself between thee and the memory of such a life and such love, otherwise than as a loving and sympathizing friend, upon the sanctities of thy sorrow. It was no more than thy due to know how much thy unconscious influence had been to me, and how happy I was to meet thee again. I am sure, in the end, it cannot harm thee or me, to know that years and cares and sorrows have not estranged us nor blunted our mutual sympathies. What the world suffers from is the want of love, not the excess of it."

In later years Elizabeth Lloyd joined the Episcopal Church, and Whittier in a letter to her sister wrote, "Elizabeth, I fear, was not made for a Quaker, and I cannot find it in my heart to blame her for living out her nature with its love of all beauty and harmony. . . . She has a deeply religious nature, but it seeks expression in other forms and symbols than those of her early faith." And in a letter to Elizabeth he wrote: "I see we cannot think alike about Friends. I am sorry but it cannot be helped. Heart and Soul I am a Quaker, . . . I take my own way, and Friends theirs." And in another letter he writes, "I, as thee knows, am no sectarian, but I am a Quaker, nevertheless, and I regard the philosophy underlying Quakerism as the truest and purest the world has ever known. I care little for some of our peculiarities; but I love the principles of our Society, and I know that it, with all its faults and follies, is, at the moment, in the very van of Christianity; that among its members, at this very hour, are the best specimens of Christians to be found in the wide world. My reason, my conscience, my taste, my love of the beautiful and the harmonious, combine to make me love the Society."

It would be quite interesting to read her letters to him but they were apparently destroyed, for he writes her, "I have obeyed thee as to thy letters—reluctantly, but with a feeling that thee had a right to their disposal. Perhaps—in the uncertainties of life—it was best."

Hawthorne, in his Journal, describes her as, "quite young and comely, with pleasant and intelligent eyes, in a pretty Quaker dress. . . . Her manners were very agreeable; the Quaker simplicity, and the little touch of Quaker phraseology, gave piquancy to her refinement and air of society. She had a pleasant smile and eyes that readily responded to one's thoughts so that it was not difficult to talk to her; a singular but yet a gentle freedom in expressing her own opinions."

The frontispiece is from a painting of Elizabeth Lloyd and we discover a really beautiful girl. Her eyes, large, dark and expressive, her hair dark and abundant. The face is sweet, refined and spiritual, the expression is thoughtful, as though she often heard "the still, sad music of humanity." Perhaps this is the picture to which, with some warmth and enthusiasm, Whittier refers in the following letter, "Dear Elizabeth, as I am not allowed to step over thy threshold today, I must needs write to inquire what prospects there is of my having that 'counterfeit presentment,' which I assure thee will be worth more to me than a whole gallery of Old World Madonnas and saints. I meant to have spoken of it yesterday but in the presence of the original, I entirely forgot the picture."

We gather from the letters that they cared for one another on a very high plane, they knew that "He who loves maketh his own the grandeur which he loves." And not only were their affections engaged but there was a strong mental attraction. Although temperamentally unlike there was an innate congeniality of mind and heart.

CHARLES B. HESTON, JR.

J. W. ROBERTSON SCOTT (equally well known under his nom de plume, "Home Counties"), contributed to the Eleventh Month issue of The World's Work a lively article on the agricultural laborers' organization. In course of it he refers to the chief organizer, who was formerly, if not at present, a Friend who, he says, has probably spoken on more village greens than any other man. He said: "It is a remarkable coincidence that on the last executive there was a Quaker and that on the present executive there is another; also that both the past and the present editors of The Land Workers are Quakers. There is no explanation to be given of a fact which, considering the small size of the Society of Friends, is surely interesting."

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

A MODERN MIRACLE.—(A True Story.)—Since the great war a German lady, whose husband was an American, was left a widow, and decided to return to Germany, her old Fatherland, with her family of children.

The day came for them to sail from New York. On tickets and baggage alike the time for sailing was marked as 12.30. With her younger children she went on board early, leaving her eldest son, a lad of seventeen, to attend to a few last things in the city. At half-past ten the vessel sailed and consternation and distress reigned in the family.

The officials on the ship informed the sorrowing mother that nothing could be done. The small children were loud in their outcries. She asked them please to be quiet that she might think. Not only was she deeply troubled about her boy left alone in New York, but the steamer trunk, in which were many necessities for the voyage, was also left behind.

As she sat, almost in despair, she caught sight of one of her young sons, with a small book in his hand, sitting very quietly by himself. An uncle of the boys, a Moravian minister, had made a close friend of him, and they had talked freely together.

"George," said the mother, "what are you doing?"

"I am praying," answered George, "that God will let Conrad and your trunk get on this ship."

"That would be a miracle," said his mother.

Time went on, and as she sat in her state-room, suddenly the door opened and Conrad walked in. To his mother's astonished question he answered that a number of passengers had been left because of the early sailing of the ship, and they had all been brought out in a tug, and climbed the sides of the great vessel on rope ladders.

And the trunk came also.

"George, the miracle happened," said the mother, turning to her boy.

And how simple really the working out of that miracle was. Does it not make us feel that "All things are possible with God" even when they do seem impossible to us?

Frequently we do not receive from our Heavenly Father just what we ask, but then He means us to love Him so much that we will trust Him when His answer to us is "No," and believe that He is giving us instead something far better, because He loves us.—CAROLINE C. WARREN.

INTERNATIONAL DEBTS.

FRANK H. TAYLOR.

[We are glad to pass on to our readers the sentiments contained in the following address delivered before the Manufacturers' and Exporters' Association at their Annual Convention, held recently in New York.—Eds.]

There should be a public call from the people of this country that a thorough study shall be made, by those best qualified to advise us, of our position in respect to the question of international debts.

This study should set before our people the broad facts pertaining to the public debts of all countries, and should suggest a plan by which they can be wisely balanced and disposed of. We are creditors for a large amount, and we want to know how far our claims stand in the way of a better world.

Suggestions from people who know generally what is going on in Europe are of no value. Immense sums of money are being squandered there in military establishments; every government in Europe is fostering political ambitions; foreign exchanges continue to be abnormal; there are selfish international bankers who have designs upon public movements with a view of profit. Budgets are out of balance; foreign currencies are still inflated. New wars are threatened.

The only group of people in the United States who have sufficient data to study the subject and suggest helpful remedies are in the State Department in Washington. They know the essential facts, many of them deeply confidential; so much so that they cannot be published, and these facts cannot be left out of account by any body who might undertake this study.

The State Department at Washington with the collaboration of the Treasury and of the Department of Commerce are the best qualified people in the world to lay down a workable proposal in respect to international debts.

It is clear that any such proposal must take into account the obligations that are due this country. It is equally true that a syllabus in which firm terms and conditions are stated must call upon all nations for great sacrifice. No one from this country can ask that these sacrifices be made and great debts abandoned which does not begin with a vicarious offer on the part of the United States to cancel our public loans to Europe.

It is admitted that to offer such a cancellation without adequate guarantees and terms would be futile, harmful and unjust to our taxpayers. Surely there are sane conditions which, once laid down and accepted by other people, would so materially correct the present troubles that the offer of sacrifice might be wisely made, not only to the benefit of one hundred million people in this country but also to many times that number abroad.

Under the above conditions there ought to be a demand from the leaders of our people that this great National Department should apply itself to this study, and should produce a plan so broad and so generous that it would compel acceptance. The Department has already done a signal service in respect to disarmament.

Nothing is asked from the State Department except a comprehensive plan—no propaganda, no political agitation.

A broad, workable scheme, plainly stated, would be taken up instantly by our churches in a way that would start an avalanche of public opinion in its favor. The American people can be trusted to receive it with fervor, that "springing from a fire of sacrifice, will beat with bright wings about the throne of God."

If the great mountain of international debt can be swept away under proper guarantees, we shall see the world in a new light and in true proportions.

If this mountain were removed, it would be possible for the United States, through its strength as a great creditor nation, to do mighty service to reconcile a shattered world, and to open doors that would quickly lead to the joy of living and of working.

BOOK REVIEW.

"BIBLE AND SPADE."

Some months ago there was published in THE FRIEND a brief account of some of the interesting findings of Doctor Peters. These gave comfort to a certain type of mind, a little over-fearful that the work of exploration in Palestine shall jostle harshly our already firmly settled convictions.

To that class these lectures collected now in Dr. Peter's "Bible and Spade" will appeal with peculiar satisfaction. He delivered the lectures before the Lake Forest College and they are now made public to all.

Dr. Peters gave many years to critical research work and his efforts command a hearing. The titles of the lectures included in the volume are: The Ancestry of the Hebrews, Cosmogony and Folk-lore, History and Prophecy, Hebrew Psalmody, The Exploration of Palestine and New Testament Times.

Our attention has been called to what he says concerning the Eighty-fourth Psalm and its adaptation to professional purposes in the olden days, as indicated in the rubrics that it undoubtedly contains: "Under the light of his interpretation the Psalm has a new and intelligible meaning, and this is greatly emphasized by the results of recent explorations in Jerusalem."

"THE BIBLE FOR SCHOOL AND HOME."

I have just finished the careful examination of Paterson Smyth's five books under the general title given above. My first reflection was one of regret for the times that are past, that books such as these were not a part of my own daily life years ago when I was a youth, but that is an idle regret and I change it at once to a feeling of positive joy that the young people of to-day have what we did not.

These books are not intended primarily for home reading, but rather for the week-day school or the First-day School. Many a mother, however, is finding them delightfully helpful for the half hour reading which follows the evening meal.

The plan of the author is embraced in these three statements: To interest; to teach; to move. I believe he is sound in his pedagogy, for without an awakened interest but little real teaching can be accomplished, and even if you do have some teaching skill, it will avail but little unless you awaken and stir the deeper springs of our being. In this case the final goal should be to arouse the affections toward a love of God.

The five books of the series include The Book of Genesis; Moses and the Exodus; Joshua and the Judges; The Prophets and Kings, and lastly, The Life of Our Lord.

The fifth may wisely be your first and then follow with the other four in the order given. A winter's thoughtful reading, but a few hours a week, preferably with an older person as guide, will yield a wealth of knowledge.

It is a satisfaction that so many well-edited books of the character of these find ready purchasers. They must never usurp the place of the Bible itself and they never will if rightly handled. They do not attempt theology. Simply the Bible story so arranged as to appeal to an ordinary child of twelve or older. How lamentably ignorant concerning Old Testament history many are who dislike to acknowledge it. We believe these compact, handy little volumes will be eagerly welcomed by teachers, parents and Bible students, and justify the claim which their publishers make. Bible characters are made more real and tangible to the child than the ordinary family Bible reading can make them, and the final purpose is never to be overlooked "to move the heart towards the love of God and the will toward the effort after the beautiful life."

An Allegory.

In an upland valley lies the little village where I was born. It is hemmed in by mountains, and of what might lie beyond, our people knew little.

Very quiet were their lives in the narrow, self-contained dale, and their thoughts, from father to son, changed scarcely more than the peaks which shut in their little world, and which they had almost come to think of as the boundaries of the universe itself, beyond which nothing, or nothing good, was to be known.

Yet now and then some among us would grow restless, and find it impossible to remain content with the old restricted outlook and the straitened life, and a great longing would come upon them to mount the hills and learn what lay beyond. And such an one was I. The village elders and even my own dear parents and friends looked very grave when I spoke of it, and did their utmost to dissuade me. Some warned me of the danger of the ascent, recalling the fate of one and another who had either never again been heard of, or who was actually known to have perished. Others spoke of the uselessness of the adventure. The valley yielded a living to all, they said, and what more did I want. Others thought it wicked to desire to pry into mysteries too high for us, with which we were not concerned. God, they said, had allotted to all their several stations; us He had placed in our valley, and the very fence of mountains that encircled it showed that it was His will we should stay there. A few set down my longing to discontent and self-conceit. The valley had been good enough for our fathers. Who was I, that it was not good enough for me also? In short the general feeling was against me. None spoke encouragingly or with approval, yet some of our younger men, though they said nothing, looked wistfully at me as if they, too, had felt the drawing of a similar longing.

For a time I yielded, but, almost unconsciously, the unsatisfied impulses grew stronger within me. My thoughts were always on the heights, and often I found my feet actually starting to climb before I realized what I was doing. At last the passion over-mastered me, till it seemed not of my own will or choice, but by the compulsion of an irresistible power that I broke from the dear old valley and began my upward solitary way. Through dark forests and over pathless rocks I toiled on, gaining many a high crest only to find others yet steeper and higher before me. But at last my feet were planted on the very summit.

And I turned myself and looked down, over crag and tree top, down upon the valley from which I had come.

The sight took my breath away, for, from my new and lofty standpoint the old scenes were hardly to be recognized, so different was the reality from my previous conceptions. My thought flew back to my old friends and I voluntarily exclaimed, "why! their ideas are all wrong, from beginning to end." Even the old familiar peaks to which I used to lift my eyes, had utterly changed their forms and outline. Many that had seemed most important as looked at from below, I now saw to be by comparison insignificant. Some had sunk below the sky line altogether. If I had not been sure they were there, and had not known where to look, I could with difficulty have distinguished them at all. Everywhere a new background, of which the valley saw and suspected nothing, had risen into prominence, dwarfing its old immediate surroundings. Even our one chief summit, which had overtopped all else, its crest soaring into the sky, standing alone and with its base concealed by the nearer hills, could be clearly seen from where I now stood, to rise by the gentlest slopes from the valley level, and to be but a giant outlier flung forward from the still loftier and remoter heights, with which it was really one.

Suddenly, as I gazed, there appeared at my side one who bowed low to me, and with a deferential smile congratulated me on my prowess in daring the long ascent, and on my success in gaining the top. In much detail he pointed out the mistaken conceptions of the dwellers in the valley; he emphasized where they were wrong, and with a subtle flattery he pityingly contrasted their ignorance with my newly won knowledge. So there began to grow in my heart a gentle contempt for all my old friends, even for my father and mother, till I came to think that the gulf which now divided us was wide indeed, and that I was verily compact of finer clay than they. My companion fostered the notion, remarking that I could never again content myself "among the unthinking herd," so he called them, "now that I had come to know the truth, and had seen all there was to be seen."

But even as he spoke another companion joined me, by name "Humility," upon sight of whom the first (who is called "Pride of Attainment," and whose dwelling is among such high places) made haste to leave, for the two can never abide together. "Hast thou indeed and truly seen all there is to be seen?" my new friend asked, and then he showed me how the outlook from the lower level was in no sense "all wrong," as I had said in my haste, but that it was as true, as far as it went, as the prospect from the mountain top, although only part and not the whole of the truth had been realized, and much needed to be adjusted in order to bring all into true harmony and perspective.

"The impulse that moved thee to leave the beaten track and climb, was a right one," he said, "and it is well that thou hast come. But look around and tell me what thou seest, and think deeply as to its meaning, or even here thou mayst gain more of error than of enlightenment."

So I looked across the valley to the wide expanse of the flat world stretching away, far as the eye could see, like the furrowed surface of a stormy ocean. And I told him what I saw. "Even so," replied Humility, "the flat expanse of earth. Yet thou well knowest that earth is not a flat expanse, but a sphere. Thy new outlook has shown thee new truths about one little valley, but outside those narrow limits thy first impression has led thee into delusion. What thou now seest is true, even as what thou used to see down the valley was true; but neither is the whole truth, nor can thy nature rightly comprehend even what thine eye can see."

"Not from here, nor from any earthly standpoint can 'all that is to be seen and known' be discerned. Nor can the finite mind free itself from error anywhere. Remember too that the man who first proved the earth to be a planetary sphere came nearer to the very heart of truth than thou hast done from this lofty height, yet he was a dweller in the lowlands thou has despised. But look forth once more and this time look upward."

It was now twilight, and the stars were brightening every moment. My heart sank within me as I realized how far, how very far, away they were. I had left the valley with a vague but ardent hope that from the summit I should attain to some fuller, clearer revelation of God in His Universe. It was for this, not for a better conception of old home surroundings, that I had striven and toiled. But now, I saw that it made no difference. I was no whit nearer the heavens than before. Even the neighboring noon showed no change, and the blue vault seemed only more vast and remote, and its unfathomable mystery more awful.

I was crushed to earth. A moment before I had been vain-gloriously magnifying the contrast between the breadth of my new, and the narrowness of my old horizon; now the difference appeared as nothing, for I saw that though enough is revealed to all to fit them to live, here on earth, as God would have them, yet even to the wisest and holiest among men, all that He permits them to know of Him is but as a drop from the vast ocean of what He keeps unrevealed, and seeing this, how small the individual differences, as between man and man, appeared.

I clung to Humility, for sore had been my need of him, and prayed him not to leave me. "I will stay with thee," he said, "but we will not remain longer here. Thou hast learnt thy lesson. To come once and again is good, but few can live here constantly for there is neither covert from the tempest, nor warmth, nor food, nor human companionship, and the air suits not for man, whose appointed place is to occupy and enjoy the habitable parts of the earth."

So together we went down from that grand but desolate summit, and at last I found myself once more beside the pastures and cleared cormlands, and among the homes of men, and the old landmarks I had known so long.

At first it seemed as if I should go about correcting everybody and showing them how little they really knew. Some listened and a few believed me, and others set out to seek the truth for themselves; but many refused to hear, and were grieved or angry with me, and my own heart was saddened. Then Humility came again to my help and showed me that I should not force my views of truth too insistently on others, for the same truths are not for all.

"Some," he said, "God called, as thou seest, to serve Him wholly in the valley, and these do not require to see what thou hast seen of His great world beyond. Do not forget that thou art as liable to err through want of full comprehension as they, and that it is not the highest truth, but the truth that lies nearest to our daily work which we most want to understand and live by. So do not thou think slightly of truth as it shapes itself to the dweller in the valley, for it is God's sufficing light to him in all his needs. Abstract knowledge, even of Divine things, may remain unfruitful. If thou wouldest indeed approve thyself filled with God's good spirit, let it be manifested in a life of rich helpfulness, for in this world where men are placed to help one another, he shows most like to God who lives most for his neighbor."

In this spirit I now seek to dwell, thankful for what God has shown me, and above all, thankful that I have been taught the littleness and incompleteness of even my highest aspirations; ready to stay in the valley or to climb the heights again, as He may bid me, and looking ever forward to a hereafter when more shall be revealed than now appeareth.

INCOME TAX EXEMPTIONS.

All contributions to the American Friends' Service Committee are deductible on income tax returns. In case this is questioned, kindly refer to letter from the Treasury Department signed by Ephraim Lederer, under date of Second Month 28, 1921, and confirmed on Twelfth Month 20, 1921.

CORRECTION.

On page 298, of our issue of last week, the amount of milk, 154,420 litres, distributed by the Vienna Mission, was for the whole month, and not the daily average as there stated.

AGRICULTURAL WORK IN THE FAMINE ZONE.

Recognizing that the Russian famine was caused by agricultural reverses, and that it can be terminated only by agricultural reconstruction, the American Friends' Service Committee is making such reconstruction a part of its work in the famine area.

The original famine of 1921 was caused by crop failures due to drought. The recurrence of famine this year is due to a new drought during the past summer, and also to the lack of livestock in the famine zone. In the area for which the Quakers are responsible, 75 per cent. of the horses, 59 per cent. of the cows, and 82 per cent. of the sheep either starved or were slaughtered to keep alive the famine sufferers last winter. The resulting shortage of draft animals prevented the peasants from plowing sufficiently in the spring, so that the crop would have been inadequate even had there been no drought. Only as they are given means to plow their fields again can the peasants raise normal crops, and only then can the famine be completely terminated.

The Friends' Mission, therefore, is importing both horses and tractors into the famine zone. Horses are being bought from the nomads in the Aral Desert and transported to the famine area. They will be sold to individual peasants in return for a portion of the flour which they raise, or its equivalent in some service for the famine community. The equivalent service will include plowing for other peasants who have no stock, and transporting Quaker relief supplies. Thus the importation of horses will help the famine zone, not only by restocking it, but also through food or service which will be given in return for the horses.

Four Fordson tractors have been used by the Quaker workers since last spring. They have plowed some thousand acres which would have otherwise remained fallow, but which will now produce crops next year to help terminate the famine. Twelve additional tractors will be sent at once, while the Quakers are appealing for funds to increase this number to as many as one hundred. The tractors are being shipped to Russia from America.

A plan has been worked out by which the tractors will be sold to agricultural communes and farm schools in return for payments of grain which the Quakers will distribute to famine sufferers. These payments will be extended over a period of three years. The communes or schools, together with the Russian Government, will furnish the oil and benzine for fuel, while the Friends' Mission will train a dozen or more motor mechanics, under the direction of two American supervisors, to take charge of the distribution and work of the tractors.

This plan will yield thousands of bushels of grain for distribution among the famine victims, while it will also encourage the peasants to introduce modern agricultural methods.

FAITH WITH WORKS.

Where there is a will to help relieve the suffering in Europe this winter, there is always a way.

One woman writes to the American Friends' Service Committee: "I am sorry I cannot send a check immediately. However, I hope to be able to remit $25 in January. I only wish it were possible to send you a much larger sum. I will not forget."

The wife of a well-known biologist and botanist of Harvard University is aiding the work through the sale of "miniature plants." A check for $50 resulting from their sale has already been received.

Another contribution of $50 is accompanied by the following note: "Enclosed is from the Monthly Meeting of Friends in Ram-Allah, Syria, for relief work in Russia. We wish we might pay more. The collections are taken at the morning meeting the first two Sundays in each month." Even the crisis which they are themselves experiencing in the Near East, has not made these Friends forget the great need in Russia.

Many give of their substance at real sacrifice to themselves. One contributor from Ionia, Michigan, who sends $5 from himself and $5 from his wife, writes: "I am a railway worker. I was locked out four months in 1921 and two months in 1922 and have since been out on a strike five months. I have a wife whom we have been raising from the dead, almost, these last four years. Sounds like a hard luck story—well, it is not. When we got your appeal for Russia, we realized how much we have to be thankful for, and we are sending 'our mite' in 'His name.' May the famine sufferers be blessed in receiving as we are in sending."

Such letters as these show that Friends' Service work represents more than relief alone. It is a channel through which the spirit of love finds expression in service to those in need. Much has been written about the idealism which has been stimulated by the Friends' work abroad. The spirit in which many of its contributors at home have supported the work is equally stimulating to faith in human brotherhood.

DEMAND FOR QUAKER LITERATURE IN GERMANY.

Agnes L. Tierney, who is in Germany in connection with the Message work of the American Friends' Service Committee, writes of the demand for Quaker literature in Germany at the present time.

"I must speak of the importance here at this time of having plenty of Quaker literature," she says. "Used as I was to the difficulties of getting anything serious read at home, I was unprepared for the hunger and thirst here for solid reading. It seems to me that for the spread of Quaker ideals, furnishing literature is really the important work.

"We visited the other day what we were told is the most complete library on the continent on the subject of alcohol, local option and prohibition laws, etc. The director told us it was much frequented by students. If we could quickly get into all the universities a shelf of our best Quaker literature it would probably be much used. I say 'quickly' because of course the interest has been aroused by the feeding, and again because so little new literature comes into Germany now. I pay 350 marks each day for my lunch of soup, meat, two vegetables and pudding. That is a trifle over four cents. Think how many meals it would cost a German professor to subscribe to the Atlantic Monthly. The majority of them can't pay 350 marks for a meal—far from it."

In another letter Agnes Tierney throws further light on the great hunger for printed literature of all kinds which is now found in Germany, and on the general conditions being experienced by the middle class. She writes:

"If there is any way in which you could get doctors to send their literature here it would be a wonderful thing. The doctors cannot possibly afford to subscribe to foreign periodicals. Gilbert McMaster tore a leaf out of the Survey giving tuberculosis statistics of New York and addressed it to Dr. Rost. He got an affecting letter of thanks from the medical head of all Germany saying how much it meant to them to have a report like that."

"Cafares are impossible for most salaried people now. Imagine living on potatoes and cabbage and walking back and forth from Germantown or Chestnut Hill every day to work! You invite people to a meal and find that cafare stands in the way of their accepting. Eleanor Garrett and I are giving a Thanksgiving Tea to about a hundred people to whom coffee, cocoa and sweet buns will be an undreamed-of feast. It will cost us some 50,000 marks—staggering sum!—about $6. We shall be busy this evening putting 100-mark notes in envelopes to be given each individual for cafare. Remember these are educated people used to nice ways of living."

The representatives of the "Message Committee" in Germany are doing all they can to preserve the faith of these hard-pressed people, and to provide them with literature that will satisfy their longing for religious reading along the line of their ideals.

SHIPMENTS received week ending Twelfth Month 16, 1922—127 boxes and packages received.

"CHRISTENDOM FOR A WARLESS WORLD."

A letter from Alfred C. Garrett reports as follows the distribution in England of the "Philadelphia Letter," as they call it there, appealing to Christians for a "Warless World."

Of the 100,000 printed, 87,000 had been distributed, and they were going so fast that 20,000 more were to be printed. One hundred and twenty-seven Preparative Meetings are active, and large public meetings are being held. One hundred and twenty-one requests for more came from non-Friends and many interesting replies had been received. Only the Roman Catholics repelled the appeal; the Y. M. C. A. also does not co-operate. The other denominations were cordial,—the Wesley Methodists declare they hold that all war is wrong. The national body of First-day Schools promises to distribute the letter to all of their centres.

The Friends' Centre in Paris is also taking up the matter, although Alfred Garrett says, "there appear to be not over six members of the Society of Friends in France and pacifism is almost an illegal attitude to take. However, it was proposed to send the letter to all Protestant pastors and to Protestant religious papers generally, as well as some Roman Catholic papers." Mark Hayler, Secretary of the Quaker Centre in Paris, can use 5,000 copies in France, sending them to Belgium, Switzerland, Poland and some to Constantinople and Syria, as well as distributing them in France, as above suggested. Carl Heath wants 6,000 printed that 1,000 may be sent to him for distribution from London.

Alfred Garrett had also heard that the Monthly Meeting in Berlin had taken up the subject and "prepared a shorter letter of their own based on ours, and are preparing to distribute that." We hope to hear more fully from Germany after Alfred Garrett's visit there.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

HUBERT PEET, London, sends us the following item:—

The winter season at Sydenham Meeting was opened by a week night meeting to which the public and local Ministers were specially invited to hear Carl Heath on "Religion and Public Life: The Quaker Standpoint." The address was a shortened form of his Swarthmore lecture, and was particularly appropriate, as it was given a few days before the Borough Council Elections in London.

Sydenham Friends are following this meeting up by devoting their fortnightly First-day evening addresses to twelve talks based on the New Part I of Christian Discipline, the general title being "Religion and Life in the Society of Friends."

WILMINGTON COLLEGE, the child of Wilmington Yearly Meeting, in southwestern Ohio, reported a total enrollment of 653 students. The Yearly Meeting statistics showed an average loss of 80 a year for the past five years.

We referred some time since to the work of Dr. Ambrose Czakó of Budapest, Hungary. He has just published a book (A vallási Fejlődés Utja) or when interpreted, "The Way of Religious Development." The book has three parts: (1) the need of religious development; (2) the Society of Friends, describing its origin and some of its tenets and using it as a model in the development of his idea of a democratic theocracy; (3) tracing the development of religious thought from his original faith, the Roman Catholic, to his conception of Quakerism.

A RECENT letter from Joseph Taylor of the Friends' Settlement, Calcutta, tells of the meeting he had at the home of certain Y. M. C. A. workers with Dr. Rabindranath Tagore.

He describes the poet as "a fine-looking man with an eye to appearances; black skull cap and pince-nez, with broad black ribbon showing well on a long gown of cream silk. His long hair, and beard carefully tended, set off his æsthetic appearance. He told us of the growth of his school from a few rather difficult lads to its present size and of his desire to make it into an International University and of the men who had been drawn to it from different countries to teach in various subjects. Music and art have always figured largely in the scheme which rejects hard and fast curricula, seeking a natural education rather than to cram knowledge into boys as so much of Calcutta's University teaching seems inclined to do."

Joseph Taylor also mentions that when up on the Hills at Mussosorie he found with great surprise among the miniatures sent in one of the late Frederick Andrews.

FRIENDS as well as others have for years found that one of the most beautiful of the stories of Jesus for children is that by our Scottish Friend, Robert Bird, of Glasgow, entitled, "Jesus, the Carpenter of Nazareth."

The demand for the book is still so regular that a new edition is planned for by the publishers in their "Edinburgh Library."

PAUL M. PEARSON, of Swarthmore Chautauqua Association fame, has been elected President of the International Chautauqua Association to succeed William Jennings Bryan.

The Eleventh Month issue of The World Tomorrow announces that Henry T. Hodgkin, lately invited to become a Secretary of the National Christian Council for China, becomes a Contributing Editor to The World Tomorrow with that issue. It is interesting to note that in this issue are the most up-to-date articles on the new forces working for peace yet published in this country, and that among those contributing these are William I. Hull, Henry T. Hodgkin, and A. J. Muste, all well-informed and prominent Friends.

SUSIE MEEK, the full-blood Indian, who visited among English Friends two summers ago and who is now Y. W. C. A. Secretary for Indian girls in Indian Schools, has recently been traveling in South Dakota. She wrote recently from Ogala Boarding School, on the Pine Ridge Reservation, one of the largest in the United States, where there are about 300 girls.

MARRIED.—Third-day, Twelfth Month 12, 1922, at the residence of Hugh Melvaine, Haverford, Pa., by Friends' ceremony, CHARLES WILLIS EDGERTON, son of Charles and Ida B. Edgerton, and MARY BUNTING McILVAINE, daughter of Hugh and Mary B. Melvaine, all of Haverford, Pa.

DIED.—On Eleventh Month 8, 1922, at Sewickley, Pa., EDWARD B. TAYLOR, in his seventy-third year; a member of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, Moorestown, N. J.

—, Eleventh Month 19, 1922, at his home, 1307 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, CHARLES RICHARDSON, in the eighty-second year of his age; a member of Western District Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, on Twelfth Month 3, 1922, at his home in Media, Pennsylvania, GEORGE B. ALLEN, in his eighty-third year; an Elder and life-long member of Chester Monthly Meeting, Pennsylvania.

—, Twelfth Month 1, 1922, at his home in Germantown, Philadelphia, JOHN E. CARTER, in his eighty-fifth year; a member and Elder of Germantown Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, at her home, Wallingford, Pa., on Twelfth Month 12, 1922, LYDIA KITE McCOLLIN, widow of Thomas H. McCollin, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District.

A BELT FOR HARD DRIVES.

ALMOST every industry has one or more "hard drives." Many of these prove far less troublesome when rightly belted.

Our study of belting problems has led to a number of special belts such as Volta Dynamo, Special Planer, Special Spindle and two Special Cone Belts.

We have also proved that our regular brands such as Gilt Edge, Power, Watershed, Stronghold or Tannate, some drives can be more economically belted with one and some with another.

Specify "Rhoads," and let us help you to the right belt for your drive.

The memory alone remains
Of all its joys, its griefs, its gains;
And now with purpose full and clear

SIGNIFICANT VOICES.

The late Alice Meynell, in one of her vigorous and original essays,* has remarked upon the tendency of words to become "inexpert" and to fail in keeping a "sequestered intention." In her view of the matter (and she had a genius for discovery), an unwillingness on our part to be troubled with distinctions makes a word "run errands," sometimes to the final neglect of verbal and grammatical proprieties. "None but ourselves," she affirms (referring to English-speaking peoples), "have been so impatient as to put out of common use the second person singular." But it is more than impatience: it is "civilized sloth" that Alice Meynell finds partly chargeable both with the general disuse of the pronoun in question and with what she regards as the "perversion of reform" shown in the familiar speech of the Friends. "Restoring the second person singular to the language," she says, ". . . the followers of Penn restored none of the inflexions," at least so as to keep them in use "after a generation or so." This may be asserting too much; but her verdict, however founded, seems to have had some support in the observed fact that the "Quakers" in one of Harriet Beecher Stowe's novels "would neither decline nor conjugate."

It may be remarked, however, that writers having little actual acquaintance with Friends are liable to make their Quaker characters speak in phrases or forms with which most of us, at least, are not familiar, accustomed though we are to irregularities. Moreover, grammatical customs were not standardized all at once and for all time; and certain peculiarities of speech, not conforming to present rules of grammar, have probably had some justification in historical priority. Most of the correspondence of the early Friends, as it has come down to us, seems to have been generally well-ordered in the use of pronouns (and better in this, perhaps, than in some other particulars); but it is likely that in their intimate conversation and informal address many of the Friends, even some of fair education, followed, more or less, the familiar way of dialectic or provincial usage. "I paid fifty pounds after thee wentst away," wrote Ellis Hookes to George Fox; and again, "It may bee as thee orders."

Alice Meynell was quite aware of the fact that the habit of speech of the early Friends, used without distinction of rank or position, was a moral protest against "the hyperbole of courtesy" so much cultivated at that time; but it should be understood that her own plea for a "revision of customs" now—for a re-instatement of the neglected pronoun with suitable verb forms—rests on the ground of beauty and service. How far she would extend its use is not quite clear; but not a few of us, perhaps, could indorse her opinion that it would be worth while "for some author, unencouraged, to recall responsibly the second person singular, and with it certain tenses long out of use." Such "literary and familiar restoration" is the more needed since this form of address seems to be disappearing even from the language of "piety and poetry." Allowing now that changes of custom have (as to the present) largely reduced the force of part of the early Quaker testimony, we may nevertheless suitably consider whether there is not still something worth conserving in this manner of speech,—something in the direction of integrity and propriety, and of possible relation to amendments in some other usages. Who shall say that something "worth while" might not presently come from a restoration of the second person singular to its rightful place in the English language?

Sounding a more serious note, but touching some matters which Friends have been wont to associate more or less with their testimony in regard to language, the author of that much-noticed book, "Mirrors of Downing Street," has ventured in his concluding pages to challenge sharply the rectitude of the prevailing customs of society and of the popular attitudes of mind. He is keenly sensible of the need of "compelling examples" of virtue among people of position and influence in England, and he finds the Church sharing in the general worldliness and having "no sound of confidence in her voice." It seems appropriate to quote a few sentences from this author here, even at the risk of repeating something that appeared in THE FRIEND a few months ago.

"Where," he boldly questions, "are there now among the possessing classes an example even of simplicity in dress, modesty in behavior, temperance in conduct, and thrift in living? As for any higher example—an example of wisdom, duty, self-sacrifice and moral earnestness—it is nowhere visible in our national life to those who look upward." Now we may not agree with all this entirely; the author may have failed, too, in a right analysis of causes, and perhaps (like Elijah) he has misjudged as to the number of those who have not bowed the knee to Baal; but he is not far wrong when he says, "We need the Puritan element in our characters, the Hellenic element in our minds, and the Christian element in our souls. We must set a higher value on moral qualities, on intellectual qualities, and on Christian qualities." In these several strictures he imposes no form, advocates no studied singularity; but he sees the urgent need for "more seriousness, . . . greater intelligence, . . . nobler living," and the relation of these, one to another.

We have small reason to congratulate ourselves on the superiority of American life in general, in the aspects above considered; but whether in America or in England, if it is true that moral and spiritual advancement has not been parallel with the material, we can hardly ignore the burden of this writer's solicitude, nor deny altogether the force of his indictment, even though we think it too sweeping. To stop here, however, will correct nothing. What is our part, then, as a Christian society, toward supplying and encouraging the "compelling examples" so much needed?

Another subject (and one of great weight) which has special interest for Friends, was brought forward in The Century Magazine within the past year, by a writer who has discovered, or shared in the discovery, that the Church at large has long been suffering from a famine of prophets! This he regards as "a part of the general confusion in the world." The early Church, he reminds us, had prophets rather than preachers; but "prophetic utterance was crushed out by official groups of leaders," and the religious reality of the prophet's message "was destroyed by rhetoric and philosophy." The remedy then for "the present incompetency" is to get back to the principle of Divine inspiration, and for the preachers to have "a baptism of prophetic unction." What he calls "an order of neo-prophets," women as well as men, fulfilling their proper call and mission (which he seems inclined to specify to some extent), would contribute to the regeneration of society, although such work might expose its leaders to "social martyrdom."

If the author of that essay were to go deeper in his searches, he would perhaps find that once the possibility of the present operation of the Spirit of prophecy were recognized, the reformation proceeding directly thence would not be confined to preaching; and that the principle involved—that of "the testimony of Jesus"—has ultimate reaches not to be prescribed or circumscribed by human "wit and wisdom."

There is no intention here of trying to establish an equality of weight between any two of the foregoing subjects, or between two and one; but it has been interesting to find an awakened thought concerning them, and in quarters where we should hardly have looked for it. If we recognize some elements of sober truth in any of the positions severally shown, let us be stimulated to continue in the support of them, or to return thereto if we have been justly charged with departures.

Glimpses of Iowa and Iowa Yearly Meeting.

Walter L. Moore.

IOWA

It was after thirty hours and one thousand miles of almost continuous travel from Philadelphia the writer entered the State at Dubuque. In the early dawn of the eventful day following a starlit night he had quit his berth hoping to see the boundary line—the Mississippi river, which had been lisped as an early school boy exercise. Disappointment came, however, with the realization that the Father of Waters had pleased to robe in an impenetrable garment of vapor. Nevertheless, there remained the thrill of realizing the colored patch of childhood's map rapidly changed to a geographic entity that was for the next thirteen days to absorb his every sense and faculty.

Yes, Iowa is a great State. It has a hundred counties save one; these have an average area of 567 square miles of land area, only one per cent. being unillable, and of the whole ninety-seven per cent. is in farms. Figuring on this basis we readily come to the conclusion that the State contains 228,622 farms of an average size of 160 acres each, which about agrees with census reports. In this connection it may be of interest to know that the unit of measure is a section, and that a farm area is reckoned as a section, half section, quarter section, etc., as the case may be. We note the character of the soil almost immediately upon entering the State. It is very dark and of a soft, unconsolidated drift material, there being practically no barren, sterile or marshy areas. The country is abundantly watered by streams and by the moisture-retaining character of the soil.

With such natural advantages as to soil we may be ready to appreciate that Iowa leads all the States in the production of corn and hay. More than nine-tenths of the farms grow the former staple. The State also leads in total value of farm animals, the pre-eminence arising from both quality and quantity. It far outranks every other State in the value of the swine. In the number and value of its beef cattle it is surpassed only by Texas, and only by New York in number and value of its cows.

The luxuriance of the flora may readily be foreseen, that once covered this very "land of Goshen," and still seeks to cover any space that is left unclaimed by tillage. Here in their season may be found the aster, goldenrod, sun-flower, boneseed, lobelia, and a host of other members of the floral kingdom, not least among which is the wild rose of the prairie,—Iowa's State flower. It is, however, in native grasses that the real floral value resides, since these are of many species and highly nutritious. They embrace big and little blue stem, wild rye, Indian beard, etc. We can imagine, then, these stretches of treeless prairie land as they were before the days of settlement, covered in summer by high waving grass intermingled with the gorgeous coloring given by the flowers, while in the autumn and winter these afforded abundant grazing for the buffalo and other ruminants that wandered wild and free over country now the seat of farms and cities. That majestic inhabitant of the prairie, the buffalo, has gone, but in many places he has left his wallows, as the Indian has left his dart, to show that this was once his home.

Historically, the country now embraced in the State of Iowa was first brought to the knowledge of the white man through that adventurous canoe voyage down the Mississippi by the Jesuit explorers Joliet and Marquette, in 1673. It was not until one hundred years later that first settlement was attempted, and one hundred years later still that the western part of the State came under tillage. The territory embraced was a part of the Louisiana Purchase in 1803, and reached Statehood in 1845. But it was not until 1852 that the great tide of immigration set in from the States east and south of Ohio. As compared with the East, Iowa is therefore comparatively young, and has yet to gain the prestige that age alone confers upon civic institutions.

As the reader follows the writer he will now find him comfortably seated in one of the fully-equipped express trains of the evidently prosperous Illinois Central railroad, laconically dubbed the "I. C." by Chicago officials. The day is everything that could be desired. The sky is blue, the air is still. The mid-autumn sunshine falls upon the landscape with enlivening effect, so that fields, trees and streams, as they are passed by in rapid succession, are touched with additional power to charm the lover of nature, who "Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, Sermons in stones, and good in everything."

It is not fine or picturesque scenery that now incites the attention of the traveler, but rather the evidences of plenty and comfort surrounding the inhabitants, as it would appear, with remarkable uniformity. Travel in several States has failed to reveal to us anywhere the touch of God's hand in preparing the earth for man to earn his bread, as here we find it. We think of New Jersey—the "Garden State"—with her soil of sand exhaled continually with manure and fertilizer to reluctantly yield her increase; of New England, more parsimonious still, as from her stony patches in darksome little valleys or on rugged hills Yankee ingenuity is taxed to the utmost, until, patience exhausted, he turns to his mills, or escapes to the prairie regions of the Great West. Here the deep, rich, black earth, the gift of the Glacial epoch, commands only man's implements of tillage in order to yield its increase.

We are now set for a day's travel of 330 miles, extending very nearly across the State; traversing twelve of its counties, and viewing, on the average, the richest of its lands. As viewed from the train, there is a remarkable sameness in the tout ensemble of the farm buildings. Everywhere seems equally manifested the thrift of the landholder. The description of one farm stands for all. We see the great barn with accompanying out-buildings, silo and windmill pump. Close by is the substantial dwelling of the owner. Invariably the house is sheltered by a wind-break set against the northwest and north. For this latter purpose trees of quick growth have been selected, such as cottonwood, willow maple, and box elder. Many of the older and more thrifty homes, however, have the more effective and attractive plantings of the hardier evergreens.

We have already spoken of corn as Iowa's staple crop, a fact which soon began to emphasize itself in overpowering manner. For hours we rode without being out of sight of corn. Everywhere it was corn, corn, corn.

As far as eye could see, and yet beyond

Was there the billowy prairie land

In strange impelling vastness spread.

    Mile upon mile in tawny patches

    Flocking farm by farm—a bounteous yield—

    On stalks grown heavy bend the golden ears.

The method of harvesting this cereal differs very perceptibly from that which obtains in the East, in that the stalks are not cut but allowed to stand until the corn is fully ripe. The harvesting had just begun. The method mostly followed was that of traversing the field with a wagon into which the ears are tossed as they are rapidly and deftly husked and pulled from the stalk in one operation, which is called "picking corn." In order to prevent the ears from passing beyond the wagon the side opposite the picker is elevated by the addition of one or more boards, called the "bang boards"; and a very pleasant sound in farm industry is said to be that arising on still, frosty mornings from adjoining farms, as the golden ears are thus rapidly made to find their place on the wagon, while the horses as they slowly move along with the increasing load reach forth and browse at liberty on the upstanding stalks. A harvesting machine has been devised to perform the work, but being expensive and not always satisfactory is not in general use. After the corn has been "picked," the cattle and other stock are turned in to browse upon the leaves and stalks. After, or even sometimes before, harvesting, the hogs are allowed to roam the fields at their own sweet will. When the former privilege is allowed it is called "hogging corn."

Just here we want to say that the relationship between corn and hogs in Iowa is so definitely important that it should be dwelt upon. And by way of introduction let us say, that if there is a very Hog's Paradise it is in Iowa. Like the corn, everywhere the animal is in evidence, and has boundless liberty of enjoyment in roaming the fields, wading in the streams, exulting in air and sunshine, alfalfa and corn. In fact, the most contented, jovial specimens of the porcine race the world can afford are here. We shall always recall one big fellow in particular, as we glanced him from the car window one sunny afternoon. He was literally dancing with delight upon a little knoll, as though at perfect peace with the world and with all his fellows. It was a melancholy reflection, happily hidden from his view, however, that came to his observer, as he contrasted all this sunshine ecstasy with the gruesome shambles at Chicago or Sioux City, to which his hogship was probably fated, there his whole being to be utilized except, as has been facetiously remarked, his squeal.

The total absence of what might be denominated forest growth soon became one of the outstanding features of our day's journey. To appearances it had never existed. To break, however, the monotony of the landscape, streams were crossed at intervals, meandering their way through the land, and bordered with a luxuriant growth of what was in some instances heavy timber. Oaks, red cedar, box elder, maple, birch, locust, and willow interspersed with grasses, offered charming vistas and meadow glades. Here a stream attains the title but not the dignity of a river long before it does with us. A geographic schedule exhibits a list of over sixty streams in Iowa which are dignified with the name of river, besides which there are many more streams which have the humbler designation of creek.

Speaking of rivers, brings to mind that fine passage from the pen of our river lover and enthusiast, Henry van Dyke, as follows—

"Every country, or least every country that is fit for habitation, has its own rivers, and every river has its own quality, and it is the part of wisdom to know and love as many as you can, seeing each in the fairest possible light, and securing from each the best that it has to give."

And so, as we crossed rivers, map in hand to learn their names and note their courses, we were refreshed mentally, as was the land they watered. We shall remember the beautiful Wapsipicon for its euphonious Indian name, and for reminding us so closely of our own ancestral and historic Brandywine. Cedar river, a wider and apparently a more slowly moving stream, we at once associated with the Rancocas of New Jersey. The Iowa and the Des Moines were also crossed, but too near their headwaters to realize their later importance.

But, notwithstanding outward appearances of present prosperity on the part of Iowa farmers, we were to learn that they are in the midst of a hard struggle in facing the odds of the remarkable deflation which they share in general with the Middle West, both in value of farms and farm products. Farms that for a time rose to the unprecedented price of $400 per acre are now to be had for half the sum. Farm products, too, were not only cheapened by a narrower world market but by high freight rates and annoying scarcity of facilities for transportation. Nor is this all. The cost of living as regards the purchase of commodities outside the farmers themselves had by no means been proportionally lowered. Taxes, too, are suggestive rather of the war period than present conditions. Some farmers have been forced to the wall of financial embarrassment, while others naturally fall back upon what they have succeeded in saving by industry and thrift throughout the previous years. When one actually gets into the midst of these conditions he is prepared to hear of a "Farm Bloc" at Washington.

The day was passing into late afternoon, when, after traversing eleven counties of the State, we entered that of Cherokee where, leaving but one intervening between it and the western border line, lay some of its richest lands. The confirmation of the statement lay in its self-evidence. A double interest arose from the fact that the first settlement of these lands had been so comparatively recent, having been about 1872. While halting at a railroad station, we chanced to meet an old German resident who told of his coming here in 1876 and ploughing up the unbroken prairie. He was now a prosperous landholder, having retired to the county metropolis, leaving, as he told us, the tillage of his farms to his sons.

A change of cars, a half hour more of travel, and our destination was reached at the little station of Gaza in the neighboring county of O'Brien. Kindly faces, though unfamiliar, greet us here, for it is Friend meet Friend with expectant grasp of hand. A little later we are set down at a hospitable home close beside the little white meeting-house—the Mecca of two days and two nights of travel—and which for the next six days was to afford opportunity for acquaintance with the spiritual and social activities that centre in the Yearly Meeting about to be held.

ENGLISH NOTES.

A stay in England of nearly three months, beginning with London Yearly Meeting and ending with a summer school at Woodbrooke, has made a memorable chapter in the lives of two young American Friends. And we are so full of enthusiasm over it all that we want to tell others just a little about it.

We set out from home impelled by a strong desire to renew old friendships made in France during the days of our common service there in the Mission des Amis and to make new contacts among English Friends. And we returned feeling that the venture had been immensely worth while and longing that many of our friends on this side might share in a similar experience.

Though it was our first visit to England we felt at home as soon as we landed and this comfortable feeling grew stronger as time went on so that it was a real trial when the good-byes had to be said. A long-delayed spring was at its height when we reached England and surely no other season there can compare with the spring for loveliness. Green fields bordered with white hawthorn hedges made wonderful landscapes. And the English gardens! Well, like many other beautiful things, they have to be seen to be properly appreciated.

From Southampton we made directly to London to be in time for the Yearly Meeting. We could hardly believe we were really there. It was a wonderful occasion, a real education for us visitors and a splendid opportunity for social intercourse. From London we visited Leighton Park School at Reading, a Friends' boarding school for boys, Oxford, and Jordans, with fine weather to make these beautiful places doubly attractive. Then we moved to Birmingham, situated in the centre of England, the so-called midlands, a two hours' railway journey from London. Here we made headquarters and paid several visits. Many Friends live in and near Birmingham and the Selly Oak Colleges, which include Woodbrooke, are close by.

A trip to the Lake country was our next undertaking and very enjoyable it was in spite of much "falling" weather. A day's journey to Grasmere and a pilgrimage to Ulverston and Swarthmore were the chief events of our stay in this picturesque region. Emma C. Abraham, the present owner and occupant of Swarthmore Hall, conducted us over this historic building, now quite restored to its original condition by the good lady herself. She is a direct descendant of the Fells and fairly worships the place. We were thrilled ourselves to see the spot which had so much to do with the beginnings of our Society far back in the seventeenth century. The same day we visited old Swarthmore meeting-house, built at the concern of George Fox near the close of his life. Here are several articles of his furniture and the famous "treacle" Bible, his gift to the meeting. It rests in a glass case open at the eighth chapter of Jeremiah, so that one may read the last verse in the quaint style of this old edition, "Is there no treacle in Gilead?"

From the Lake district in northern Lancashire we traveled over into the great industrial section of southern Yorkshire, a hard, forbidding country, grimy with the soot of countless mill chimneys. But the warmth of hospitality we experienced there made us forget everything else. Visits were paid to Huddersfield, Leeds and York, and of course to Ackworth School. While in York we called at the two Friends' schools there, Bootham and The Mount, and were much interested in going over them. A long week-end with some old friends near Colwyn Bay in beautiful North Wales and a few other short visits in the neighborhood of Manchester finished our northern tour and after returning to Birmingham we started for Somerset in the southwest.

This part of England has a charm and beauty peculiarly its own and we fell in love with it at first sight. Likewise the Friends we met there quickly won our affections. The summer session of Bristol and Somerset Quarterly Meeting was held at Street while we were there, a community noted for its hospitality and good fellowship. It was impossible to feel like outsiders in such a genial atmosphere. We lingered in Somerset as long as we could, making a number of new friends and visiting many interesting places, such as Glastonbury, Wells, the Quaintocks, the seat of the Lake Poets before they took to the Lakes, Cheddar, and Sidcot School, another Friends Boarding School run on co-educational lines.

From Bristol, our last stopping-place in the west, we went to Salisbury to visit its great cathedral and then on to London. There we stayed some time at the Penn Club, a popular stopping-place for Friends. Trips to famous Canterbury in Kent and Hampton Court on the Thames and participation in a stirring "No More War" demonstration at Hyde Park were some of the features of this stay in London. The city is inexhaustible in its interest to visitors and we loved it, but a summer school at Woodbrooke drew us back to Birmingham. This was planned and conducted by the National Adult School Union and the Woodbrooke Extension Committee and was a most enjoyable and inspiring occasion. It gave us an opportunity to meet various leaders in the Adult School Movement and a number of young Friends. About eighty attended and we had a happy time together. It was a fitting conclusion to our sojourn abroad. The day following the close of the conference we embarked at Liverpool and our summer in England became a memory.

In looking back we feel the best part of such an experience cannot be fully told. The kindness of English Friends, their spirit of warm friendship, their sympathy and understanding, their simplicity, their clear thinking and fearless seeking for truth, and their sane and wholesome outlook on life made a deep impression on us. We owe them more than we can say for this time of fellowship, for the privilege of being in their homes, for quiet walks and talks, for the times of family worship, for the hundred and one apparently trivial details of daily life which they let us share with them. Our hope is that there may be more interchange of visits between English and American Friends for we need to know and understand each other better.

COUNTRY SCENES IN JAVA.

The best way to see the Javanese countryside is to take one of the little two-wheeled carts, with outrageously narrow seats, propelled by the joint efforts of a much-driven horse and a much-urging driver. The Javanese horses are very diminutive—they reminded me of the big Newfoundland dog, "Carlo," which paraded about my grandfather's place in the country and around whose neck I wound my arms when a little boy. But they travel. The drivers take the cares of life easily—too easily at times. They sit out front and occasionally gesticulate vigorously as they try to explain some scenic attraction which you fail to see. But if you have a kodak you must understand one magic word, "Brenti." That means "stop." Our Jesus generally were very willing to pull up under shady trees and dream sweet life away whilst I would dismount at the tail of the trap and hunt for the right position from which to snap a subject.

One of the wonders of Javanese country life is the Borobudur, between Semarang and Djokja. You motor about thirty miles over the smooth roads, which the Dutch government has constructed in every direction, under over-arching trees or through the crowded streets of odd villages where rubber-tires and naked youngsters threaten to come into deadly contact. Every little town or cluster of houses have their "pasars," or market-places, where the people gather to barter, talk and eat. These markets are under rude sheds or giant trees and the men and women squat in circles offering for sale odd fruits and uncanny-looking vegetables, minute potatoes and gristly bits of meat. Men with queer carts or small stands dole out gaily-colored fluids to their thirsty patrons. Sometimes a few tailors are seen in the midst of the moving mass of purchasers and idlers; and these champions of the sartorial art sit on the ground, with hand sewing-machines in front of them, prepared to stitch or sew whilst their customers wait. Then, a moment more, and you are away out in the open country amid canals, cocoanuts, hedges, blue vistas and nearby flocks.

Finally, you reach the Borobudur. By those competent to judge it is considered the most remarkable Buddhist relic in the world. It is an enormous square stupa, built around a hill, and is 531 feet on each side at the base. It was constructed in the eighth or ninth century, most likely by Hindu architects. It faces a glorious outlook across a peaceful valley and distant mountains. The building is wonderful in many respects. It consists of seven stories, or galleries one above the other, all receding from the base until they culminate at the top. Each gallery is open to the weather and the walls are everywhere covered with elaborate bas-reliefs illustrating the tradition associated with the life and alleged reincarnations of Buddha. These carvings are of the most delicate description—there are over two miles of them—they depict men and women, horses, elephants, monkeys, birds, chariots, flowers. There are many images of Buddha and handsome gargoyles. You are lost in wonder at the wealth of design and the possibilities of the artist's exquisite work long, long ago. Not the least extraordinary is the fact that when a Moslem inundation threatened Java this immense structure was covered with earth by patient toilers, and for many centuries was hid from human view. It was finally discovered and excavated. Contemporary sculpture seems purile in comparison with its conception and wealth of artistic detail.

Whilst in Java we enjoyed a short vacation at Garoet, one of the charming resorts of the island. Here at the unique and delightful Hotel Papandajan was secured much-needed rest from heat, dust and work. The hotel was quite typical, at the intersection of village streets thronged with Javanese and funny little carts and horses. The bungalows constituting that delightful hostelry were embowered in a wealth of gigantic trees and winsome plants and flowers. Here bare-footed "boys" waited on us hand and foot—white folks become very sluggish in a climate where there is almost no variation in temperature all the year round. In Garoet we met with some good Christian life, although the Mohammedan religion overwhelmingly prevails. One calm summer morning we walked through the trafficking village street to the "Protestant Church," and soon were within the little bamboo building before the native service had concluded. The room, with its almost flexible bamboo sides, was chiefly noteworthy because of its extremely dilapidated appearance and the immense pulpit, some eight feet wide, wherein the preacher stood. He wore the turban-like headgear, made of "batak," so universally used in Java, retaining it with all its handsome coloring on his head as he preached. His native congregation listened soberly and devoutly whilst he expounded the Gospel. Soon after the natives had left the Dutch church people assembled. Their minister was a scholarly-looking man who wore a great black robe of unusual proportions, with immense sleeves, relieved by his ample neckgear that gracefully hung down his breast. His little group of listeners hung with rapt attention upon his words—there was none of the condescending listlessness or bored appearance so frequently observed in home churches or religious meetings. Evidently his words were authoritative and he knew it. His manner was very oratorical, but devout. We were glad to worship with these, our brethren, of two distinctly different races, although probably there were no English-speaking Christians besides ourselves in the neighborhood. We could not understand the guttural Dutch or softly-spoken Javanese hymns and ministry, but there is, the wide-world over, the gracious language of the Spirit which is apprehended by Christ's people everywhere and which is the mother-tongue of all who honor Jesus.

I do not forget one notable feature of the landscape. In the midst of miles of primitive rural sights one will suddenly come across a great sugar-cane mill with its lofty stacks sending forth clouds of black smoke over the troops of workers and scores of oxen which are contributing food to its greedy maw. Hard by will be the spacious and beautiful residence of the Dutch manager, evidently offering much that European culture can give, whilst not far away are the smaller homes of the Dutch employees. This foreign colony is surrounded, at its very doors, with the color, sounds and alternating filth and cleanliness of native life. These managers are little Overlords in the realms in which they live, and, after acquiring a competency, are likely to retire to Holland to enjoy the fruits of their labors under the equatorial sun.

What a glorious country the people of Java live in! Whilst the coast cities are hot and moist, and may contend with plague, cholera and fevers, the uplands and mountains are much more healthful and rich in beauty of the sort that only the tropics can afford. Here, close to the Equator, are some of the most charming resorts of the world. White people from over the Far East seek the mountains of Java when taking vacations. The exquisite loveliness of the plains with their rice-paddies, and sugar-cane fields, in a wondrous setting of foliage and flowers, with their broad backgrounds of rugged, deep-blue mountains can not be described. In Java I have seen several mountains of 10,000 feet altitude, or over, which for symmetry and impressiveness, in an atmosphere that rare Nippon can not rival, have compared with far-famed Fugi of Japan. I think of the towering, tossing sugar-cane, the highest of its kind in the world, of great-leaved banana trees, of nutmeg and almond trees, of groves of splendid banyan and rubber trees, of shining and somber stretches of other trees that look as if they were heavily laquered in the fervent sunlight. There are clumps of bamboo with trunks large enough to make good-sized conduits for city water. In spots there flare upon the vision the "Flame of the Forest" trees with their magnificent tulip-like flowers glowing all over them. In places you see long rows of palms such as before I never laid eyes upon—they are so very high and so exceedingly slender that they look like straight ropes thrust upward into the air with a bushy tuft of palm-leaves swinging at the top.

Masses of foliage betray in their dark depths the thatched roofs of innumerable bamboo houses. The many little water-courses are alive with natives sporting in them beneath the overhanging shade. The distant hills are green with tea and coffee plantations. Steep slopes have built upon their sides layer upon layer of rice-paddies—great terraces they are, like huge amphitheatres. There are ponds surrounded by stately cocoanut palms in whose placid surfaces are reflected, as in a mirror, lovely shores and distant volcanoes. There are cool-looking pools where, retreating from the mid-day sun, lave big-horned oxen, their heads only visible in the soothing waters. Men and women, clad in all the colors of the rainbow, wander along narrow foot-paths that separate fields and water, while others gather in groups beneath out-spreading trees and idly squat or recline by the shaded roadsides. Everywhere is color, color. The dress of the people, their gay sarongs and kabays everywhere moving in ceaseless streams, in the midst of Nature's rarest handiwork, completes the charm of the beauty of this wonderful land, so aptly termed, "The Pearl of the East."

[The following has been sent us by a correspondent, it having already appeared in an English publication. The authoress, Maude Robinson, is widely known to a large group of American readers through her delightful stories, "Nicholas the Weaver," and others.—Eds.]

Why should cheap joys be "pathetic?" I firmly believe that the home-made suit makes a mother really happier than the glossiest Eton ever turned out by a West End tailor, and that the marigold and scarlet runners of the tiny backyard are as precious and enjoyable as orchids and roses.

Do we really find well-to-do people more happy, more cheerful and contented than the thrifty wage-earner? (I am not speaking of really abject poverty.) I fancy the man with a grievance is as common in one class of life as the other—riches do not inevitably bring happiness, for that cannot be bought.

I am old-fashioned enough to believe that the law "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap," has never been reversed, and that he who is so lazy, dishonest, and unreliable that no one will employ him richly deserves the poverty which he brings on himself—the saddest part is that his wife and children are the chief sufferers.

What will be the end of the modern theory that everyone must have a "living wage," whether he earns it or not? In the relief work now being provided many of the men can be seen standing at ease, a tool in one hand, and a cigarette in the other, yet expecting—and getting—the same pay as the honest worker. It is enough to discourage any man on the job from doing his best. How long will the long-suffering community be able to go on keeping these non-producers, who will increase year by year when they find that no effort is necessary, and bread (nicely buttered!) can be had without any sweat of their own brows? (The sweat being the privilege of the payer of taxes and rates.)

These may be unpalatable truths to the modern social reformer, but the many letters of approval which have reached me show that a great many Friends are feeling that it is high time someone had the courage to point out whither we are tending. The theory that money is happiness, and that there is a universal right to get without giving, is far too lightly and thoughtlessly pronounced, and is insidiously mischievous in these days of anxiety and re-adjustment.

I SUM UP all my desires for you in the single prayer, that you may be kept from the peril of the lesser god.—PRESIDENT HENRY CHURCHILL KING.

JOHN WOOLMAN IN GERMANY.

It has not been many years since the interest of the average Philadelphia Friend was centred, so far as religious subjects were concerned, within a radius of our own meetings. One need but scan a few consecutive numbers of THE FRIEND to satisfy oneself that our horizon has stretched farther than we could then have guessed it ever would.

Some of us will find our thoughts oftener turning to the work at the school in Tokio and other Japanese interests associated with it; the burdens carried by our friends Daniel and Emily Oliver and W. Bacon Evans in Syria claim first place just now with not a few; the strain under which our people live in Russia calls not without a ready response from all of us, and now that a little group of four have gone on a special mission to Germany we are following their doings with the keenest interest to know what they can do and how we can help them.

The letter which follows is from our Friend, Alfred C. Garrett, written from Berlin and dated Twelfth Month 3rd. It was handed us too late for last week's issue or it should have had place, because we want our readers to know of the opportunities for this peculiar service that are opening up, having the conviction that there are those who can not "go," but who wish to assist in the cause of those who "do."—[Eds.]

A. C. G. writes:—

Since reaching Berlin about two weeks ago, my efforts have been directed a good deal to trying to have put through some of the publications which were delayed for lack of funds. It seemed that while we were getting settled and learning a little more German, this might be a good service, and so we have met with the several committees, some of them several times, had conferences with leaders, and urged and promised, so as to get things through.

The thing I most wanted done was the immediate publication of "Woolman's Journal," as translated by Alphonse Paquet; the translation is a beautiful one,—and Paquet does not care to encumber it with much introductory matter, but let it speak for itself. The manuscript had already been purchased from Paquet—and now they just wanted $100 to publish it at once. I concluded therefore to use the $100 put at my disposal by our Book Committee in Philadelphia for this purpose, and this morning I drew from my Letter of Credit that amount.

The other things we have put through arc the "Philadelphia Letter" to the churches on Peace (50,000 copies in German translation); also Rufus Jones' "Double Search" and the Peace "Calendar." But I do not appeal for any help on these. "Woolman" and the "Calendar" are expected to be out before Christmas. We agreed to free distribution of the "Calendar" for Christmas.

But there are two other things that I hope Philadelphia can help with:—(1) "The Quakers and War" (in German), being the pamphlet put out by the "All Friends' Conference." The edition has been exhausted, and they want 3000 more, but have no funds. (2) "Children's Stories," four or five thousand of which are printed, but they need money to distribute them,—it's a shame it cannot be done at once. Carolina Wood has already sent $250, but more is needed; probably funds might be sent through her. What better could American Friends do at once in order to follow up their own child-feeding, and conserve its results? Why put thousands of dollars into feeding, and then allow its results to fade away? I feel that we need to get our message before those we feed, and keep it before them till they grow up and can act upon it effectively in national life. The stories now printed in neat simple pamphlets are: "Fierce Feathers," "The Thief in the Tan Yard," "The White Feather," and "Our Word is Our Keeper."

The letter concludes with a brief reference to some meetings attended in Berlin and then in a short note A. C. G. refers to the Peace letter as follows:—

The Berlin Field Committee has taken up in earnest the distribution of the "Philadelphia Letter" to the Churches on Peace, and I feel that we ought to push it along while they are interested in it. I reported to them what had been done by the London Meeting for Sufferings and the plans made at Paris. They now say they want to print 50,000 of the translation they have made into German (which seems now to be revised to satisfaction,—by the way, it seems to have been a mistake to say they had re-written the letter to suit themselves; they were simply dickering over the most effective translation); they have got a list of all the Protestant pastors in Germany, etc.—so now they need $300 to carry out this program. Last evening Joan Fry had a rather remarkable meeting with Count Bernsdorff, and a Catholic Father, to see what opening there was to distribute it among German Catholics, and they seemed so friendly and favorable that she thinks there may be quite a further opportunity there. I propose in about ten days to draw $300 from my Letter of Credit for them, so as to push this thing through promptly.

Austria has now to be considered, and I just had a letter from Headley Horsnail, Friends' Secretary at Vienna, asking about the translation and distribution here. He especially wants to know the re-action of Roman Catholics to the letter, especially in America.

[Friends wishing for more definite information with the view of assisting in this work may be referred to William B. Harvey, Secretary, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.—[Eds.]

A Successful Experiment in Education.

Social progress and education are identical in Denmark. Therefore, one must have in mind the background of Danish history in the nineteenth century if one is to understand the story of education in that period. That story gathers about the folk colleges, the instruments of the adult education movement, which has been the most influential factor in Danish education in the century.

Denmark is about one-third the size of New York State, and has a population of three-and-a-quarter millions, about the same as the State of New Jersey. In the Middle Ages, Denmark had governed Norway and Sweden, and at one time most of England. The early English settlers in America had, in fact, a considerable percentage of Danish blood in their veins. But Denmark sided with Napoleon in the early nineteenth century, and went down in his defeat. She was reduced to one of the smallest countries in Europe. To add to her woes Prussia and Austria in 1864 seized one-third of what remained, the richest provinces of Denmark, Schleswig-Holstein, which a short time later were annexed by Prussia.

Industrial depression set in. The Dane found that he could not compete against the large scale production of wheat in America. Markets closed. Floods, droughts, epidemics among the cattle, and dire poverty swept the country. By 1870 Denmark was at its lowest ebb. A Danish writer says that "the people seemed to be on their death beds." Religion had become a colorless rationalism. The spiritual life of the people seemed extinguished.

During this period of decline, however, male suffrage had been granted. At that time, N. F. S. Grundtvig—bishop, poet, and above all, educator—arose. This "prophet of the North" who is generally rated as one of the four or five great leaders of Democracy, tried to stem the tide of decline. When male suffrage was granted he advocated the simple and powerful thought that all who were to exercise citizenship in a democracy should be trained for citizenship after reaching adult age. This is a definite departure from our own thought. We believe children should be trained—at least until they are fourteen and if possible until they reach adult age. This means not to exceed two per cent. or three per cent. of our adults. Denmark, on the other hand, is training almost fifty per cent. of her adults.

The method by which she trains them is entirely different from anything in our school system or our colleges and universities. We have almost nothing that can be compared to the Danish system.

Grundtvig maintained that it was necessary to establish popular folk colleges for that part of the youth who should become neither officials nor scientists, but farmers, tradesmen, artisans, etc. This education, therefore, should not finish with an examination. The breeding and enlightenment here given is each one's own affair and is its own reward. It must be such that it does not, after the end of the school year, weaken the desire to go out again into work.

Grundtvig did not formulate a plan in detail but indicated only the broad outlines of what has proved to be the most powerful movement for Democracy ever experimented with. Grundtvig's followers, in the face of haughty opposition from the Intellectuals to this idea of culture and spiritual growth for the peasant and working-man, and bitter opposition from the narrow Religionists, built up a movement which emphasizes the development of citizenship through the constructive use of leisure time and the spiritual awakening of every youth in the country.

The Danes have built scores of folk colleges, and the greatest men in the country have given their lives to this movement. Every fall Danish youths flock to these schools for the five months' training courses. At the end they go back to their work on the farm, in the factory, in the stores—wherever they are in life—with the burning desire to serve their community and their nation.

They go back trained as volunteer community leaders. This is the very core of the Danish method of training. All this tremendous spiritual power would evaporate, as it does with many of our own college youths, if the Danes did not have the genius to equip these inspired young people to serve their community and their nation as leaders in gymnastics, community singing, amateur dramatics, folk dancing, folk games, hiking, young people's associations, athletics, sports, lecture associations, educational clubs, and the like, both in the common life and in the homes of the people.

From the first, therefore, young people were brought into active participation in the community life at the right psychological moment in their lives. As they grew older, they organized the world-famous co-operative movements of Denmark. They established some of the finest agricultural colleges in existence. They reclaimed waste heather lands and through highly scientific farming of rather poor and stony soil have made Denmark one of the wealthiest countries in the world—measured by the well-being of the people. They took the control of the government out of the hands of politicians and social interests. To-day the people of Denmark actually govern themselves. Many leaders in the Danish Parliament point with pride to the time when they were volunteer gymnastic leaders in their home communities. A series of laws of the most progressive sort have been put on the statute books. Municipal Government attracts the best men in the community. No one questions the advisability of financing community projects municipally.

The eight-hour working day is universal in Danish industry. Old age pensions and other institutions take care of the problem of the aged and helpless. Poverty has been practically abolished. There is a greater degree of economic justice than in any other country in the world, and wealth is distributed most equitably. Denmark has reduced the death-rate from tuberculosis from one of the highest to the lowest in the world. Illiteracy is practically abolished. The percentage is about .02 of one per cent., while in the United States, for example, the illiteracy is variously estimated between 10 and 25 per cent. Landlordism is fast disappearing in Denmark and most of the farmers own their own farmland.

The Danes, of course, have a regular school system which they got largely from Germany. Every child finishes the eighth grade; many go to secondary schools where they prepare for vocations or the university. Both the grammar and the secondary schools are of a high type, with a large percentage of male teachers who are regarded as leaders in their community. A large percentage of the Danes attend the university from which they cannot graduate, however, in less than seven years. The folk colleges do not fit anywhere in this system.

The Danes, we see, insist that a child up to seventeen or eighteen years of age is not psychologically ready for the most important kind of education. Attendance at school during the adolescent period is not considered important by the Danes. Somewhere between the age of eighteen and twenty-five youth begins to ask the great questions of life. When a youth is, of his own accord, psychologically ready for education, he should have the opportunity to go to a folk college, where there are teachers who understand how to teach the adult youth. This Danish experiment has proved that there is a definite time when the great fields of history, art, literature, science, sociology and adult play appeal to youth. The Dane has been able to do in five months, at exactly the right time, what four or five years before the right time cannot do. It is the conviction of many that through the high development of the art of teaching the Danes are able in four or five months to produce better educated men and women than we do in four or five years of college, because we entirely disregard the significance of this period of life and we do not teach with that in mind.

Youth is not a time to prepare for making money. Youth will make great sacrifices to come to school for spiritual development when it will not make the same sacrifices to acquire a dry intellectualism. The Danes have shown that the power of democracy lies in the fact that the whole mass of the youth can be aroused spiritually and can comprehend the meaning of life as a whole and see clearly the duties of community membership.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

HUMMING BIRDS.—Among the trees, shrubby and vines that almost bury a quaint old farmhouse many birds find attractive building sites for their summer homes and here little humming birds have come and gone for years.

The people in the house know many birds and love them. Perhaps the birds know this and so feel safe and happy in building their nests and tending their little families there.

After the long journey of thousands of miles the humming birds usually arrive punctually the last week of spring. On their arrival early in the morning they are heard humming among the flowers of the "Washington Bower," an old-time shrub that seems to have started as a bush and later decided to be a vine and is a combination of both.

It is said there are hundreds of varieties of humming birds in tropical countries, but the ruby-throated is the only one that comes to the eastern part of the United States.

Words can give little idea of the beauty of this least of our birds, so tiny, so dainty, so brilliant! A jewel of rubies and emeralds flitting on swift wings! The father bird wears the ruby and is the more gaily dressed, while the mother-bird is safer in less glowing colors.

The nests of these birds are not less interesting than their builders. Only the finest and most delicate materials are used in making a nursery for their little ones. The soft brown wool, called plant fibre, from the stem of a tall fern forms the body of the nest. The outside is wrapped around with cobwebs and covered with lichens, like the grey moss you sometimes see on stones and the bark of trees. The nest is so fastened on a twig that on the under side it looks as if it had grown there. If glue is used it may be taken from evergreen trees (where bees get it for their use). When finished the nest is one inch across the top, from side to side, and three-fourths of an inch deep, and looks much like a knot on the branch of the tree.

The nests are built in various kinds of trees—evergreens, fruit and shade trees, from five to twenty feet from the ground.

Two tiny white eggs, about the size of a small bean, are laid. There is one day between the laying of the first and the second egg and also between their hatching. In fifteen days the eggs are hatched and the young birds look like little hairy caterpillars. But how fast they grow and change! In three weeks they leave the nest, yet the mother still feeds them for a time as they fly about the trees and perch on dead branches. She gets honey from the flowers, seeming to prefer the red ones, as the trumpet vine and scarlet-sage, but all kinds are called on. The honey and tiny insects from the flowers and little flies, caught on the wing, are the food she gives the young birds by putting her long bill far into their wide open mouths, even down their throats.

The little nest is so soft that even the light weight of the young birds on its edge sometimes makes it quite flat, so if there is a second brood there must be a second nest. As one nest was built the twenty-third of Fifth Month and another the thirteenth of the Eighth Month, it seems there is sometimes a second brood.

One of the five nests found this summer at the old farmhouse varied from the usual plan. Instead of using lichens the little mother bird cut tiny round pieces from the leaves of the tall fern that gave her plant fibre for her nest, and fastened them on the outside. Did she think that green trimming would be prettier than grey? If so she must have been disappointed for the pieces of leaf dried up, leaving the brown fibre of the nest quite bare. This is interesting as it shows a variation in nature, which many persons think always follows fixed and unvarying rules.

The last brood left its nest the first of Ninth Month and had little time to prepare for the long journey of migration. How wonderful that such tiny birds can make this journey and return in the spring to their former summer home! They doubtless have the same upholding care as the sparrows we read of that sold two for a farthing.—M. A. P.

INSIDE A DUGOUT.

A recent letter from Poland gives a picture of the life in dugouts which thousands of Polish peasants are still enduring. Its writer says:—

"There is an old army dugout that I know of not far from Powursk. Two widows and seven children live in it. It measures four by five yards. Every morning sixty buckets of water are bailed out of it. A few iron rails from the trenches are flung down for the women to stand on. There is a small stove, and on top of this the children live and sleep. The women never lie down. They sit all night and sleep with their feet on one of the iron rails because there is only room for the children on top of the stove. This is one of thousands of cases.

"Here in Powursk is a fetid, unventilated dugout, rotten with damp and green with mildew. A baby swings from the beams of the roof in a primitive basket. To see the baby one must peer through the gloom. The baby is doomed; an old man from next door delirious from typhus wandered in here from his own bed and got into bed with this family, infecting the lot. The old man died and the three grandchildren that he left struggled through typhus in a ramshackle shed just big enough to hold comfortably a fairly big calf."

The Friends' Mission is doing its best to relieve such conditions. Mission horses have been organized into timberhauling columns for the winter. The Polish Government has given grants of timber to the refugees, but in many cases, lacking horses as they do, they cannot get the lumber to their building sites. This the Friends' hauling columns are enabling them to do.

The price of building a two-roomed water-proof peasant cottage is 700,000 Polish marks, or at the present rate of exchange, $38.50. Contributions are urgently needed for the support of this work in Poland.

SERVICE ITEMS.

The plan developed by the Russian Mission, of distributing food to able-bodied adults only in return for some service to the community, is now under way, and the workers feel that it is the best thing yet devised in getting relief to the proper people with the least pauperizing effect. "Already some bridges have been repaired; wood has been cut for Children's Homes; roads have been put in better condition; and in one volost (township) a large part of the population turned out with spades and prepared tracts of land for sowing in the spring. All of this work was accomplished in return for the Quaker food rations.

Two new enterprises are now under consideration. One is the reconstruction of an abandoned machine-shop which will be able to repair a great deal of farm machinery and will teach many of the boys mechanical trades. Another is to provide a building and general dormitory facilities for boys at the Totskoye Agricultural School. The head of the school will undertake to teach a number of older boys from the Children's Homes, if the Mission will provide a place in which they can live.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY horses were recently bought by the Russian Mission for about $20 each, and taken into the famine zone. They will be sold to the peasants in return for grain or equivalent service. If the payment is made in grain, the latter will be used for famine relief purposes. The latest cable from the field urges that all available funds be cabled at once to be used in purchasing more horses for spring plowing.

RECENTLY the Mission in Vienna extended its fresh milk distribution to include a number of groups which had not received milk previously. Eight times during the first day of this new distribution, a mother turned to her child with the cry: "Now you know what milk tastes like!" Many of these children, though several years old, had never before tasted milk. The fresh milk distribution carried on by the Friends' Mission is helping to save many little lives from disease and the fate of a cripple.

MEMBERS of the Vienna Mission recently interviewed Herr Schueller, Section Chief of the Austrian Foreign Office. He said that under the League of Nations plan for the rehabilitation of Austrian finances, 100,000 state officials are to be dismissed in the near future.

Provision for their readjustment to other branches of national life is a problem with which the Austrian government itself must deal. The Mission, however, is helping to meet the problem by rendering assistance to the Land Settlements, which will absorb many of these men and their families, and by assisting individual families who are in need of emergency relief.

Herr Schueller urged the necessity of helping the children and students, who in the near future will be required to take over the control of affairs. He also entered a plea for the relief of the old people, who must be cared for in their declining years.

IN the face of increasing distress among the middle and artisan classes of Vienna, the Austrian Mission has worked out a plan for increasing its middle class relief activities. The plan provides for increasing the help given to professors, teachers, lawyers, doctors, scientific and research workers, former civil officers and students. The help given will include food parcels, tickets for a daily hot meal in the municipal kitchens and the opportunity to purchase clothing and coal at low rates. Students will be aided to pay their fees and to secure books. The degree to which these activities can be extended depends only upon the amount of funds contributed for them in America.

"IN our dark days your noble gifts came like a beam of light. One was almost inclined to think of the appearance of your members as the ambassadors of the Mount of the Holy Grail, coming to help the youth of Germany in their deep need."

So says a letter recently received by the American Friends' Service Committee, from 175 school children in Gross Schönau, Saxony. Expressions of thanks from the children of Germany still continue to come in, showing how much they appreciated the food and the good-will brought to them by the Friends' Child-feeding Mission. Many of the children have shown their gratitude by sending beautiful drawings and hand-lettered statements of thanks which they themselves have made.

In a recent letter, Mlle. Merle gives interesting news of life and work at the Châlons Maternity Hospital, which was erected by Friends as a memorial to their work in France.

"I have only good news to give," she writes. "The best of spirits reign among the staff. Internationalism is not much talked of, but is lived daily in a friendly spirit. The hospital goes on being a great success from the medical point of view. We book more and more mothers, and the work develops in every direction. We have not had a death in our sick babies' wards for more than four months, and have had a number of extremely interesting cases cured.

"Our baby clinic is well attended, and with the help of the French Red Cross, we are going to superintend a second such clinic in another part of the town. My only fear is that in a very few years our new home will be too small!"

FROM a well-known firm of rug manufacturers in Philadelphia comes a generous check, accompanied by the following note:—

"At Christmas-tide all should be joy and happiness, and it is a blessing that so many are enabled to celebrate the great event in health and prosperity.

"Perhaps we do not come in contact with the various forms of human misery to realize their extent, but the fact that there are such institutions as yours, working so unselfishly, reminds us of the unfortunates and our duty to them.

"It is, therefore, with pleasure that we enclose our check to you, as our stewards, to use for the furtherance of your work.

"May you be abundantly blest, and bring cheer and comfort to many who need your ministrations.

Sincerely yours,

HARDWICK & MAGEE COMPANY,

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

ENGLISH Friends are very good to us; we still have J. Rowntree Gillett in our midst, and word is at hand from A. Neave Brayshaw that he expects to sail for America on First Month 12th.

Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin is expected to arrive from England on Second Month 7th; it is hoped that his itinerary may allow him to spend the time between the 16th and 22nd of Second Month in and around Philadelphia; he is en route to China once more, where he is expecting to take up very important work in connection with international Christian co-operation.

We were crowded for space when the following would have been most timely, but we cannot allow such an important event as the Anniversary of Old Salem Meeting-house, N. J., to pass without some notice.

Daniel Batchelor has written a full account of the gathering from which we take this short extract:—On Eleventh Month 11th, Armistice Day, the Friends of Salem, N. J., celebrated the 150th anniversary of the building of their Meeting-house. The settlement of the Friends there dates from 1675, and they named the place Salem, signifying Peace. From this place the Friends have migrated to all parts of the country, carrying the name with them, until there are Salems dotted all over the map.

The present building was erected fifty years before the unfortunate separation of a century ago, and so it was fitting that both branches of Friends should join in the celebration. Fully three hundred persons took part in the exercises of the day.

One feature of the morning session was the planting of a young oak tree, with appropriate exercises by a group of children; in the grave-yard close by stands the famous "Salem Oak," believed to have been a tree one and a half centuries old when the first Friends sailed up Salem Creek and made a landing there. A unique feature of the lunch at mid-day was a huge birthday cake, on which there were one hundred and fifty candles.

At the afternoon session, eight ministers from the various churches of Salem were seated side by side in the speakers' gallery. The kindly greetings from all of these, including two young colored ministers, were delivered with excellent taste, laying emphasis on their points of agreement with Friends' principles.

The chief feature of the afternoon session was an address by Rufus M. Jones.

Only one or two points can be touched upon in this limited space. He said that the first of the world's needs was the vision of a better social order. Four years had elapsed since the signing of the armistice, which was to usher in an era of peace, —and international relations were now in a worse condition than before. Our statesmen lack vision, and "where there is no vision the people perish."

Every great advance was due to some one who had vision—who had faith in the invisible. As instances in the realm of science, he cited Sir Isaac Newton with the law of gravitation, Edison with electricity, and Marconi with wireless transmission.

The next need was a dynamic faith. As a Society of Friends, they must not be content with a passive belief that things would be better at some future time, but an energetic faith that would strive against all odds—and overcome them. They must attempt the impossible. In this connection, he quoted an epitaph from an old tombstone which read, "She hath done what she couldn't."

BATH-ROOM COMFORTS

Hajoca Plumbing Fixtures are not merely well-made as users have admitted for sixty-five years; they add many unusual advantages as well.

This make is generally chosen for the remodeling of homes where the addition of modern sanitary plumbing is all that is needed to transform a fine old residence into a more comfortable and convenient one.

You may be thinking of such a course. If so, you will find the Hajoca show-rooms a practical help in your plans.

Here every modern design is displayed so as to assist in wise planning and a satisfactory selection when you wish.

AGAINST DEBASING THE CURRENCY.

The silver is mine, and the gold is mine, saith the Lord of hosts. The glory of this latter house shall be greater than the former, saith the Lord of hosts, and in this place I will give peace. . . . (Haggai: ii: 8, 9.)

So spoke the prophet and encouraged the builders of the second temple. Much as these words must have meant to the zealous Zerubbabel and Joshua and their helpers, it is certain that the prophet also saw and spoke of realities which transcend the local, the racial and the material. Old Jerusalem was trodden again by the Gentiles. Hand-built temples disappeared in blood and smoke. Treasures of silver and gold were despoiled. Yet the statement and promises spoken by the prophet were true nevertheless. There is a New Jerusalem, a house not made with hands, and a treasure beyond the reach of moth, rust or robbers. Here and here alone is the true peace.

And this peaceable kingdom is not for heaven only. God's will is to be done on earth, as well as in heaven. So He dispenses to each soul here in this life a portion of His heavenly treasure. Happy are those servants who acknowledge the gift, and who occupy honestly and fruitfully!

WM. BACON EVANS.

DO WE KNOW THE FELLOWSHIP OF CHRIST'S SUFFERINGS?

Our country-woman, Helen Hunt Jackson, has written a little poem called "My Legacy," in which she tells of her search for this legacy and what it proved to be:—

"They told me I was heir; I turned in haste
And ran to seek my treasure;

"I journeyed many roads; I knocked at gates;
I spoke to each way-farer
I met.

"And so the morn, the noon, the days were spent,
While empty-handed, up and down I went.

"At last one cried, . . .
"Hath no man told thee thou art joint heir
With one named Christ, who waits the goods to share?"

She sought Him long ere she received her "share." And what did it prove to be?

"My share! No deed of house, or spreading lands,
As I had dreamed; no measure
Heaped up with gold; my Elder Brother's hands
Had never held such treasure.
Foxes have holes; and birds in nests are fed;
My Brother had not where to lay His head.

"My share! the right like Him to know all pain
Which hearts are made for knowing;
The right to find in loss the surest gain;
To reap my joy from sowing
In bitter tears; the right with Him to keep
A watch by day and night with all who weep.

"My share! To-day men call it grief and death;
I see the joy and life to-morrow;
I thank my Father with my every breath
For this sweet legacy of sorrow;
And through my tears I call to each, 'Joint heir
With Christ, make haste to ask Him for thy share.'"

That is the very thing we avoid—to ask our Father to send us sorrow and suffering. Instead of thanking Him for these gifts when they come to us, we count ourselves objects of commiseration, and our friends do too, and extend their sympathy. It seems a strange thing to us that some beautiful sanctified spirits have bitter trials even to their last days. Is this all wrong—our way of looking at affliction? Was Christ's life really so marked with suffering as "H. H." represents? "A man of sorrows and acquainted with grief?"

To answer these questions, let us "search the Scriptures." We all know that Jesus encountered opposition during His public career, and we assuredly remember Gethsemane and Calvary. Occasionally we are told "He sighed deeply in His spirit," or that He wept for the sufferings of others. But His usual attitude was that of silence as regards His own personal rights, privileges and feelings, appearing not unto men to fast; while the beautiful, active helpfulness of his life, and his frequent messages of good cheer, bringing courage and hope to broken hearts, turn our attention rather to the "tidings of great joy," to the glorious blessings of His Gospel, to the results rather than to the incidents of their attainment. We seem to forget that He announced that He "came not to send peace on the earth"—those words so often misapplied; we pass over with little notice the aloofness of His kindred, His two-fold rejection by His own city, the many disciples that walked no more with Him. He no doubt marked more clearly than we do, the ominous gathering hatred of scribes and Pharisees because He violated their Sabbath laws, ate with publicans and sinners and called God His father. The mystical views about the bread of life, the light of the world and spiritual freedom which they were not able to understand roused them to more active measures, and soon they were plotting His death. He knew, beyond a doubt, what was to be the tragic, humiliating termination of His earthly career.

When we apprehend that a dreaded event is awaiting us, how absorbing and paralyzing such a thought becomes!

Most momentous of all His sufferings was the burden of the sins of the whole world, sins that had been, sins that were to be. As says J. Rendel Harris: "To make His far-seeing griefs complete, we must include all those [sinners] who in later days have crucified Him afresh and put Him to an open shame, in which congregation may we no longer see our own faces." What heart of man could stand this crushing weight? How can we even in slight degree realize it? If Gethsemane and Calvary move our hearts to their depths what must they have been to the Saviour of the world! Truly never man suffered like this man! And for us!

We must now consider the application of these truths to the lives of Christian believers. Because Christ suffered for them, are they exempt? His own words forbid such an assumption. The disciple is to be as his master. He must bear his cross, and drink the cup that Christ drank. He will be persecuted and hated by the worldly spirit. The lives of the apostles bear ample evidence that such was their experience, and that they handed down similar testimony. "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." Paul said also, "I die daily;" "the sufferings of Christ abound in us;" "we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake."

What has become of the suffering Christian? Have the days when, for conscience' sake, men suffer in their persons and estates, gone forever? You remind us of the C. O.'s. Yes, but Christians in Christian lands are, as a group, living easy and comfortable lives. Men speak well of them. No "woe" to such? We rather think something is wrong—that as the Heavenly Kingdom has not come on earth, the Church should be in the thickest of the fray striving to establish it—fighting against entrenched evils, getting all manner of abuse, risking ease, property, life, if need be, suffering with her suffering Lord.

However that may be, the day for inward struggle cannot yet pass away. The individual soul will always have to strive to enter in at the strait gate, and to walk in the narrow way; to attain self-surrender and personal righteousness. The Father's dealing with His sons is still graciously marked by chastenings. The cross must continue to be borne. But the pity of it is that we should regard these losses and crosses and temptations as so many deplorable accidents, rather than counting them all joy, bringing us into a closer fellowship with Christ, and making us to know better the power of His resurrection. May we have the grace to believe that our mourning is a blessed thing because of the comfort and discipline that follow. Then we can say, as did Helen Hunt Jackson:—

"I thank my Father with my every breath

For this sweet legacy of sorrow;

And through my tears I say to each, 'Joint heir

With Christ, make haste to ask Him for thy share."

The John Woolman Year.

Some one asked yesterday what is the new book on the library table in most Friends' homes this winter? The answer was a mere guess, but the hope found expression that it might be the new "Journal of John Woolman," edited by Amelia M. Gummere.

THE FRIEND early reviewed this masterpiece, but failed to express the sense of obligation under which we are all placed—that this work was carried through by a Friend—that it was a native of New Jersey who conceived the idea, laid the plan and then worked for ten years or more until she was satisfied that the field had been fully covered. The one hundred and fifty pages that are of her composition unfold a story that has a charm that no other Quaker record exactly parallels.

But this is far from all. On a side street in Mt. Holly, N. J., to be exact, at 99 Branch Street, stands the little brick house, where John Woolman bade farewell to his wife and daughter in 1772, as he started on his religious visit to England, from which he was not to return. The same Friend who has brought the Journal afresh to many firesides this winter, has also brought to the notice of a large number of people this obscure spot, has given it a place and an importance not dreamed of ten years ago. I have just read the sixth Annual Report of the Trustees of this property, and have felt more than a tinge of regret that THE FRIEND has not often called the attention of our readers to what the work of these Trustees should mean to all of us and how little most of us are doing to help support what they have in hand.

We write of visits to Amesbury, our chief Quaker shrine in America; we write often of Jordans and Swarthmore in England, but the little house in Mt. Holly has failed to receive the notice and the support it merits.

John Woolman as the modest but positive champion of justice in every detail of life, as the author of the "sweetest autobiography in the language," and now freshly before people who read and think, should receive a new influx of devotion from the good people near and far, who wish to see the purity he strove for grow and prosper.

The Annual Report just issued begins: "The sixth annual meeting of this Association was held on a bright afternoon, October 15th, at the Memorial, when between thirty and forty members were in attendance. The well-curb was filled with products of our own garden—baskets of apples, preserves from our own fruit, and glorious dahlias, all of which found a ready sale. This made a bright bit of color in the clear sunshine, as we met before the hospitable door, on porch and grass. Quite two thousand visitors have come to us during the season just closing—a record of which we may well be proud. The motoring craze and the need for an accompanying tea house will probably keep up the number. Signs placed at the junction of Garden and Branch Streets, and at the site of the old fountain on Mill Street, have brought some of our callers. These signs were originally given, and have been renewed, by our Trustee, Edward B. Jones; they had suffered both from boys and weather. We rejoice in the great improvement of Branch Street, whose macadam surface has greatly increased traffic, and gives us a comfortable approach. We can now with an easy mind urge our friends to visit us."

The report recites numerous donations made to the Association during the year; these include a series of drawings in pastel, some of which have been sold, a percentage of the receipts being given to the Association. The same can be said of some beautiful rugs sent from New Hope. There has also been an exhibit of Russian embroideries placed here by the American Friends' Service Committee. Alluding to the tract of land adjoining the cottage and the property of the Association, the report continues: "Most of our peaches, grapes and pears were sent to a neighbor to do up on shares. These products also adorned the well-curb. The orchard is still a problem. The trees are coming into bearing, but the peaches, though abundant, are all defective this year. The Association has not had the funds to give the proper care, and the spraying has not been sufficient. Through the period of the war—the growing time for the orchard—our Garden Committee had not time to give the place the attention needed. But there is a reluctance on the part of the Trustees to neglect it altogether, or, as once proposed, to sell the land. We are therefore hoping that someone will feel this as an interest for the future. A rose-arch has been added to the garden with good effect. Gifts to us have been; from Robert Pyle, of West Grove, Dr. Van Fleet and American Pillar roses for the arch, as well as one of the new Rosa Huginos for our rose-bed. Three roses, which are also well started, came from the W. H. Moon Company. From a member of the Woolman family (Lilian W. Woolman), we have a copy of Violet Oakley's "The Slave Ship Ransomed," from the frescoes in the Capitol at Harrisburg. In the predella are four scenes representing John Woolman's services to humanity. The frame was chosen by the artist herself. We have been presented by Maria C. Scattergood with the completed portfolio of these wonderful paintings, which is ready. Several pieces of old china, some old Friends' books, and a small steel engraving of George Fox came from the estate of Mary Deacon, of Mt. Holly, through her son, Hartley Deacon, of Germantown. Two old books from a daughter of Samuel Aaron, the schoolmaster of a former generation. An ancient grille-iron for the fire-place is an interesting gift from J. W. Lundy, and the old clock has been repaired and keeps old-fashioned time—a bit slow!

Among the many visitors during the year mention is made of Elizabeth Braithwaite Emmott, Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin and wife and T. Edmund Harvey, known more than by name to a widening circle of American Friends.

This reference is made to the death of Howard M. Cooper, of Camden, N. J., one of the largest and earliest contributors to the original purchase fund and whose constant interest has helped the Association over some of its discouraging moments. The report recites: "After many legal aids and much helpful advice, he drew up for us the Act which we hoped would be presented to the New Jersey Legislature last year, but which did not reach its end, although every member of the Senate and House received our circular letter. We intend, however, to renew our efforts this year, and all of our members are earnestly requested to lose no opportunity to push our interests at Trenton, and where possible, to call upon their own member, or the Chairman of the Appropriation Committee in that city, urging attention to our needs."

"We are asking for an appropriation of $10,000, to be used, as is required by the State, in necessary improvements, chiefly the removal of the old stable next door, once John Woolman's home, to our own land, where it can be fitted up for our urgent needs. The maintenance fund must come from our endowment, which has fallen very far short of the needed sum. We had the backing, in our application to the State, of the New Jersey Historical Society and of the Women's Burlington County Historical Society, and other influential persons, but we are still encouraged by Senator Roberts to make the effort again. A good Finance and Publicity Committee will, we hope, help us out."

All of our friends should read the fine article on John Woolman's Cottage, written by Caroline L. Crew, and published in the spring number of Americana. She has not failed to stand by us in our higher interests, and attention is called to her important and interesting article.

"It is with great regret that we are obliged to announce that she feels herself unable to continue in her present position in charge of the Memorial. Her health will not permit her to undertake the strain again. We feel that the atmosphere of the little home has been largely due to her presence and understanding of the purpose in the minds of the Trustees."

The report concludes with the following fair and modest statement:—

"In conclusion, it is not our desire to continue to beg of many kind friends. Yet until we can get upon our feet with a small endowment fund, and without annual dues, secure enough to meet our modest needs, we are forced to call attention to the fact that we cannot maintain this pleasant Quaker refuge, even, as our beloved Professor Rendel Harris loved to say, "in the simplicity," without some further support financially. We must leave the question of our future success, urging the fact that we now have no debts except that to our hostess, Caroline L. Crew, in the hands of our friends, who have never failed us yet.

"AMELIA M. GUMMERE,
"President."

An examination of the financial statement shows that 23 persons have made contributions during the year, totalling $2,845.50, some large sums being included. There are also 32 persons contributing to General Fund, which totals for the year $628.00.

THE FRIEND is positively and properly committed to the policy of non-interference in matters financial. Its own affairs in these days of inflated prices tax its powers. But it can commend to the notice of all who may read this brief message the real importance of this object lesson at Mt. Holly and can recommend a day's outing with 99 Branch Street as an objective as one which will yield a worth while treasure.

THE AUTUMN CONFERENCE OF FRIENDS IN JAPAN.

The Conference was held from Eleventh Month 2nd to the 5th, inclusive, about fifty miles north of Tokyo, at the village of Tsukuba.

There were three meetings daily; a most inspiring sunrise prayer meeting a half hour from the hotel in front of a Shinto shrine among hills and waterfalls; addresses during the forenoons and evenings. The afternoons were for rest, mountain walks and councils.

There are three organized Monthly Meetings in Japan and nine other congregations, or twelve centres altogether, with two or three out-stations each, besides members scattered here and there throughout the country, and also many attenders of meetings not identified with any congregation. The Conference is a general meeting, not a delegate body, and Friends and others from most of the congregations were present, though somewhat irregularly.

The first meeting was addressed by the President of the Conference, a valued Friendly minister, Chiomatsu Suzuki, on "The Epistle to Philemon."

Two very inspiring and instructive addresses were given by Susum Tajima, pastor of a large, growing Presbyterian church in Tokyo. The subjects being "The Foundations of Belief in God," and "Foundation Truths in Romans I to V."

Owing to the unusual number of people in the hotel, the first address was given in the audience room of the nearby Buddhist temple, and the priest was present to hear it.

Thomas E. Jones of the Friends' Mission, and Professor of Economics in Keio University, Tokyo, lectured Seventh-day on "The 'Remnant' Doctrine" of the Hebrew prophets, and that evening he applied the principles of the same in church history from Christ to the present day. In the former lecture the histories of Israel and Judah, their great prosperity, their corrupting political, social and religious life, and their rapid decline, as set forth by Amos, Isaiah and Micah, were critically analyzed. The speaker pointed out the impending and unavoidable judgment upon the sins of the covenant people by Jehovah, their holy and righteous Covenant God, who, despite their sins and iniquities, will save the "remnant" who trust and obey him. The doctrines of righteousness and holiness proclaimed by the prophets were then applied with telling effect to our own times.

Every session of the Conference was opened with devotional exercises, and in the sunrise prayer meetings and First-day meeting for worship the presence and power of the Holy Spirit were realized in silence and song, in prayer and preaching. In the meeting for worship, a young man without prompting other than by the Spirit, confessed Christ for the first time as his personal Saviour.

The last-named meeting was held on the mountain side a little way above the village—the Japanese like to worship among the large trees on mountain sides. Returning to the hotel in two minutes we observed a meeting of some twenty old men and women in the temple near the altar pounding irons and calling in concert on the name of Buddha. O that they might know Him in whose Name alone one may be saved!

First-day afternoon Thomas E. Jones and Paul W. Gordon walked to the top of the mountain with a few students. It was a time of serious interchange of spiritual experiences. Professor Jones is most admirably advancing in his mission among young men, particularly with Keio University students. He takes a few on monthly excursions to the mountains or seaside. When the residence for his family and the Boys' Dormitory have been completed next spring, this work should enter upon a period of great service for Christ.

In attendance upon the Conference were Gilbert Bowles, Thomas Jones, Rosamond Clark, Margaret James and myself of Tokyo, Herbert Nicholson of Mito, and Gurney and Elizabeth Binford of Shimotsuma, where these two heroic missionaries are opening up a new mission with promising beginnings under trying conditions. In the intervals between sessions we were often in council among ourselves and with Japanese workers concerning serious problems in the work. His American friends will be pleased to know that Mansaku Nakamura, who visited Whittier, Wichita and Richmond a few years ago and was for a time in Philadelphia and the East, is a genuine Friend and an able leader among the ministers of Japan Yearly Meeting. Besides his local work in the strategic center at Tsuchiura, he visits other meetings and takes tours in the Railway Mission work supported by English Friends, which is superintended by Elizabeth Gillett, a very useful service.

Serious as some conditions really are, there are very favorable signs. Just recently a number of pupils in the Girls' School have publicly and spontaneously confessed Christ as their personal Saviour in the meetings for worship, and they and some of the teachers may be expected shortly to request membership in Hijirizaki Monthly Meeting, in Tokyo.

The Japanese are very religious, as their innumerable gods and shrines bear witness. There are many genuine "seekers" after God and Truth, little suspecting that man by searching through all worldly wisdom can never find Him, that He is to be truly known only by revelation through the Holy Spirit. Herein is the call for a new, or rather a renewed order of prophets, who shall declare Him. Among what people may they arise if not in the Society of Friends?

For years I have increasingly felt that the greatest need in the home churches and on the mission fields is the personal recognition and realization of the Holy Spirit in the lives of Christians and most of all in the Christian colleges. Last summer I was favored one Sabbath to preach on this theme to a community of missionaries. It was appreciated. Some missionaries had never heard a sermon on the Holy Spirit: some only in a formal way, defining the offices of the Spirit rather than urging the realization.

Glimpses of Iowa and Iowa Yearly Meeting.

Historically, Iowa Yearly Meeting of the Smaller Body had its inception in the year 1878, when the little group of Friends then constituting its nucleus officially withdrew from their former associates in church fellowship and polity, "in consequence," as stated in their Book of Discipline, "of the innovations in doctrine and practice that have been introduced in our meetings, or rather forced upon them, by those controlling the decisions of our meetings, etc."

The Yearly Meeting thus organized was vitally and numerically strengthened by the accession of a whole Quarterly Meeting known as Hickory Grove, established in 1868, and previous to 1917 subordinate to Ohio Yearly Meeting. The body thus formed is composed of three Quarterly Meetings—Bear Creek, composed of meetings for worship known as Bear Creek, near Earlham, South River, near Ackworth, and Paullina; West Branch Quarter, comprising the meetings for worship held at West Branch, and at Stavanger, near LeGrand; Hickory Grove Quarter, having as its subordinates the widely scattered meetings of Hickory Grove, near West Branch, Springville, at Whittier, Coal Creek, and Pasadena, Cal.

The distances of these several groups of Friends from one another while in itself a source of weakness as regards the solidarity of the Yearly Meeting as a working unit, tends to make the occasion of its holding one of highest religious and social interest and importance to the membership. Especially does this apply to the neighborhood where the meeting is held that year.

It was, then, with feelings having a strong under-current of deep interest and anticipation that the writer—an accredited visitor from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting—took his seat in the plain but very comfortable little white meeting-house already alluded to, and into which he had been received with courtesy unfeigned. How strangely different and far away seemed the great historic house in Arch Street, with the stir and hum of the city of Penn surging about it, where, last spring, hearts were stirred with an outreaching of Christian fellowship towards this group of Friends! From the porch as you enter, you may gaze out upon the rolling prairie country that reaches out to seemingly infinite distance beyond the wall of the horizon. And lest we forget this country's slogan (shall we not say?):—

"The rustle of the bladed corn"—

a very field of the golden cereal comes up to the yard fence to look upon the line of automobiles which it had helped to make possible.

But we must now compose ourselves, as fitting to the occasion. The Yearly Meeting has begun with that of a meeting of Ministers and Elders in the first of three sittings of that body distributed throughout the week. Here we meet the "nursing fathers and mothers in Israel"—

Whose lives consistent with the cause they bear,
By their devotion steeped in prayer,
May raise the ladder Jacob saw,
Bring Heaven to earth and read God's law;
And with the vision fresh in view,
See how He builds His church anew.

The business of a meeting of Ministers and Elders may be of a dry, perfunctory character, without edification to the church, or it may be a very charging place of spiritual power, and those who participate made to realize what it means to "sit in heavenly places in Christ Jesus;" a sense whereof was manifested on this occasion, in the tender, uniting power of His gospel-promised presence.

That the meeting had claimed the interest of Friends from afar was shown by the attendance of three visiting ministers, whose credentials were read, and they cordially invited to feel, in the exercise of their gifts, the same freedom they would in their home meetings. These Friends were Marianne V

Wood and Louisa Richardson, traveling in company as members of Canada Yearly Meeting, and Walter L. Moore, from Philadelphia. Epistles were received and read from each of the Yearly Meetings with which Iowa is in regular correspondence—namely, New England, Canada, North Carolina, Ohio, Western, and Kansas; also from the General Meeting at Fritchley, England. The Epistle of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, addressed to the Smaller Body groups was also read, as was one from a group of Friends in Germany. There was also read a letter from Edith Newlin, a member of the Yearly Meeting who is engaged in Christian service in the Far East. This letter was of particular interest for its lucid description of the political and religious situation in China.

The sitting of the Meeting of Ministers and Elders was immediately followed by a public meeting for worship. This for the membership at large was really the beginning of the Yearly Meeting, and by a visitor was naturally looked upon as an interpretation of its interest. The house soon filled with a group of people whose demeanor showed they were expectant of the highest privilege the occasion might afford.

A session of the Representative Meeting held in the afternoon, brought together a group of Friends that showed forth a lively regard for the health of the body which it represented, and for its possible influence upon the world at large. A subject that chiefly engaged its attention was the report of the Peace Committee. Another was that of capital punishment, in the consideration of which the members were encouraged to bring their influence to bear upon the Governor of the State, to persuade him to exercise the executive clemency permitted him, by commuting the death sentence to one of life, or long-term imprisonment. A resolution of the New York Bar State Association, asking that the indiscriminate sale of fire-arms to the public be prohibited by law, received the hearty sympathy of the meeting, and Friends were encouraged to write personal letters to members of the Legislature of that State on the subject. At this, or at another session of the Representative Meeting held later in the week, the situation of the political prisoners held at Fort Leavenworth, Kas., came under consideration. It was felt to be right to join with many other liberal-minded people in the country in an expression of sympathy on their behalf as the way might open. At this time it was made known to the meeting that as Ella Newlin, a minister, in company with her husband, Abner L. Newlin, an Elder, had in prospect the attendance of Kansas Yearly Meeting soon to be held, they had felt that possibly their visit to Kansas might also include the military prison at Leavenworth. It has been since learned that this visit was paid to the prison, and that while at first the warden treated the Friends in a very harsh and independent manner he afterwards mellowed, and finally invited them to attend the chapel service next morning, though without any encouragement that opportunity would be afforded for addressing any of the prisoners. But when morning came the prevalence of a better feeling on the part of the warden and the kindly welcome of the chaplain so cleared the way that opportunity was afforded for some religious service on the part of Ella Newlin which appeared to be well received. It should be mentioned that in this arduous service the Newlins had the sympathetic company of Archibald and Anna R. Henderson, who had accompanied them throughout their visit to Kansas. The courtesy afforded these Friends by the chaplain of the prison, whose name is Allen, as contrasted with the manner of the warden throws into relief the difference that lies between the way of militarism and that of the Gospel in service.

The general Yearly Meeting began on Fifth-day morning, in joint session. The opening devotional period was felt to be one of particular spiritual refreshment and preparation for the work of the church which was to follow. From this time on until the concluding sitting on Second-day the business was conducted in separate session of men and women Friends. As the general round of business was similar in character and method of handling to that with which we are so familiar, it will not be dwelt upon, save to indicate some particular features. Thus to the visitor, it was interesting to watch how the business of men's and women's meetings was kept harmoniously and promptly moving along by the simple, unobtrusive device of the passage of notes from the clerk's tables through the medium of messengers so seated that their office could be performed without leaving their seats.

The epistles from the several Yearly Meetings with which this Yearly Meeting corresponds were again read, as were also the minutes of the three visiting ministers, the letter from Friends in Germany, and the general epistle of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to Friends of the Smaller Body Yearly Meetings. With the reading of these several epistles it seemed the spirit of an all-embracing love in the blessed fellowship of the Gospel descended upon the meeting which was not lost throughout its several sittings. A committee was appointed to draft replies to all the epistles, as way opened therefor, and also one to prepare returning minutes for the visiting Friends.

The appeal issued by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, entitled "Christendom for a Warless World. To the Churches of Christ in All Countries," being presented to the meeting, was received, read, approved, and directed to be endorsed on its behalf.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

BLACK AND WHITE—BOOKER WASHINGTON.

From Everyland. By Arthur P. Sheppard.

The old horse plodded steadily along, seemingly heedless of the little black figure that straddled across its back just in front of a big sack of corn, heedless even of the fact that the small rider had become convulsed with sudden anxiety and was clutching wildly with one hand at the sack behind him.

But it was a rough struggle. The sack was too heavy—every jolt of the useless road shifted the corn still further, and at last it slid off the horse's back, bringing with it the still frantically clutching figure. The horse stopped when the sack fell, and after looking round for a moment, began contentedly to crop the grass by the roadside.

In a moment the little Negro was on his feet, ruefully surveying the heavy sack and the tall horse. It was the same thing nearly every week, when he took the corn from the estate to be ground, and now he would have to wait, probably for hours, for someone to come along strong enough to lift the sack.

He felt very miserable. He was only six years old, and he was two miles from home and the woods that lined the road looked dark and terrible! Probably it would be quite dark before he got the corn to the mill and ground, and then he would have to come back those three long miles. He threw himself down on the sack and burst into tears.

Suddenly his loud sobs stopped and he looked anxiously round him. He had heard his mother and the other slaves on the estate say that the woods were full of soldiers who had deserted from the army, and that the first thing a deserter would do, if he found a little negro boy, would be to cut off his ears! He shivered and huddled down behind his sack, crying quietly.

He lay so long and so still that he nearly fell asleep. Suddenly he heard foot-steps. Would it be a white soldier? No, it was one of his own people, a fellow slave. He jumped up from the grass, and in a few minutes found himself once more on the horse, the sack this time securely fastened behind him. But it was late when he reached the mill, and quite dark when he went through the woods again on the way home, and every bush and tree seemed to conceal a deserter. His heart thumped terribly and he clung to the old horse's neck, wishing that he would go a little bit faster than his never-changing walk.

At last he saw the cabin lights on the estate, and in another minute the horse had stopped at the office. The overseer grumbled and swore at him because he had kept him waiting for the flour, and gave him a couple of cuts with his cane to teach him not to waste time again. Tears sprang to the little chap's eyes, but he ran off much relieved. Often, when the overseer was in a worse temper, it had meant a flogging.

He soon reached the tumble-down cabin that was his home, and pushed open the crazy door that creaked on its broken hinges. He was met by the glare of an open fire, at which his mother was cooking something in a huge pot. She was cooking for the whole estate. "You're late, piccaninny," she said, "but don't cry. Yo' shall have a sweet potato and a lil' lick of molasses on yo' bread." Warm and comforted, the little chap soon fell asleep on the bundle of filthy rags in the corner on the earthen floor, where his brother and sister were already sleeping.

It was the fall of '72. . . . The old stage coach lumbered up the road that wound steeply through the mountains of Virginia, the passengers chatting together and smuggling more warmly into their wraps to escape the chill autumn winds. One passenger, however, sat apart from the others, and seemingly unnoticed in his corner. He was the only colored person on the coach, a lanky boy of fourteen, dressed in ill-fitting, shabby clothes, and carrying all his luggage in a little satchel. No one would have recognized in him the chubby little slave boy who had rolled off the horse with his sack of corn eight years before.

Very quietly he sat in his corner, apparently oblivious of the disregard of his fellow-passengers, sometimes listening to scraps of conversation that told him something of the great world into which he was venturing, sometimes lost in dreams which lit his eyes with a strange excitement. Nothing mattered now, he thought, except that at last he had really started on the great adventure, for which he had hoped and dreamed for years.

TEMPERANCE.

The material for this issue has been furnished by Benjamin F. Whitson.

PERSONAL liberty ends where public injury begins.—SHERMAN ROGERS.

A REMARKABLE ASSEMBLAGE was that held at Toronto, Canada, Eleventh Month 24-29, under the auspices of the World League Against Alcoholism. We may have seen little or nothing about it in the newspapers, but here assembled one thousand one hundred and eleven accredited delegates from sixty-six different countries. Their common purpose was human welfare, not locally, but over all the earth. The flags of more than fifty nations had sponsors in the assembly. Every state in the United States was represented, and in no country on earth is the effort to outlaw the liquor traffic regarded as hopeless by men and women of social vision and Christian faith. It must have been an inspiring and auspicious occasion, especially when at the closing session the whole audience of three thousand people arose and with upraised hands pledged individual co-operation and life service to emancipate all peoples from the liquor traffic. Here is a League, not of nations but of citizens, with a world-vision. It is big with promise every way.

ONLY NINE YEARS AGO in the city of Columbus, Ohio, was held a national convention demanding Prohibition throughout the United States. The realization of that hope seemed then about as unlikely as world-prohibition seems to-day. We had at that time only nine prohibition States, but we ventured to mention seventeen other States as "near prohibition" because fifty per cent. or more of the territory was "dry" by local option. The leaders at that convention were "men of faith and men of vision," but it is not likely that any one of them expected such a sweep of sentiment for national prohibition as followed. It was declared then that "the liquor traffic is national in its organization, character and influence." It was declared to be "a federal evil, too powerful for State authority; a national menace requiring national jurisdiction and treatment." We have now a broader vision of the evil which, as heretofore, "overflows the boundaries of States and refuses to be regulated or controlled." The world is facing to-day what our nation was seen to be facing then,—"abject surrender of the right of self-government or the annihilation of the liquor traffic." We of America should say to the world to-day what our leaders said to America at the Columbus Convention in 1913, "As to our choice, free men cannot hesitate." And just as the Toronto Convention pledged its loyalty to the larger freedom so did the Columbus assemblage, and so may we,—"Trusting in Almighty God and calling upon all patriotic citizens to give this cause their unqualified support."

IN EVERY LAND the suppression of the liquor traffic is a live issue. We hardly realize the truth of this unless we have traveled or are in some way brought in touch with religious or social work in other lands. From Adelaide, Australia, we have from our dear friend Wm. C. Allen, The Patriot, official organ of the South Australian Alliance, pledged to "The abolition of liquor traffic." From Berlin come a pack of German literature with a letter from our friend Agnes Tierney, saying the question is a very live issue there and that a local option bill is likely to be passed soon. Letters of inquiry come occasionally from Denmark, more frequently from England, and sometimes from China and Japan, all confirming the fact that the issue is "for God and home and every land." The most concise and at the same time comprehensive view of the world situation is the International Record, edited by Guy Hayler, London.

SHOCKED THE WETS.—A London Associated Press dispatch of Twelfth Month 13th says that the election in Great Britain with all its surprises produced nothing that attracted wider attention and comment than the defeat of Winston Spencer Churchill, former Secretary for the Colonies, by the Prohibition candidate, E. Scrymgeour, noted as the street corner orator of Dundee.

There are many more such surprises in store for Great Britain. The cause of Prohibition is a winning cause. The time is coming when there will be no nation of the earth under the domination of liquor controlled politicians.—The American Issue.

THE SUPREME COURT DECISION.—The decision by the Federal Supreme Court that offenders against the Prohibition policy may be prosecuted by both the State and Federal Governments for the same overt act is one of the severest blows ever dealt the old remnant of the once prosperous liquor fraternity. The court rules that the violation of the Prohibition law constitutes two separate offenses in States where Prohibition codes are in effect, an offense against both State and Federal law.

This ruling further supports the validity of, and elucidates the "concurrent power to enforce" the clause of the amendment. It will prevent the booze criminals from obtaining immunity from paying penalties that might be imposed by the Federal Government, by rushing into State courts. A double dose of bitter medicine is not pleasant to anticipate and no doubt the mere knowledge that it may be prescribed will have a wholesome effect.

The Ohio Supreme Court has gone even further by ruling that the Prohibition law violator may also be prosecuted and punished in municipal courts—as well as in State and Federal for the same overt act. This is sound reasoning in accord with the United States Supreme Court ruling and suggests a tip to other States. Give these booze criminals "a plenty" and they'll quit their criminal practices. Hitting them three times in the same place will help some.

The ruling is opportune, coming at the time when the Governors are consulting with the President on ways and means to better enforce the law.—The American Issue.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS.—The Eighteenth Amendment has to do with "intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes." In 1920 the liquor men asked the Government to define the alcoholic strength of liquors that should be considered "intoxicating." The fixing of one-half of one per cent. as the "intoxicating" basis had their approval, and this continued the basis until the Prohibition Amendment was adopted. The Volstead Act simply incorporated this long accepted basis as its own. Now the liquor people that for so long enjoyed the protection given by outlawing unlicensed sellers of drinks in selling anything containing one-half of one per cent. of alcohol are complaining because under the Volstead Act they are themselves made outlaws if they do so.

But even if this were not the content, no law could be enacted that would permit the manufacture of any drink with 23/4 per cent. alcohol in it, because this could easily be proved in court to be "intoxicating."

Still further; there are sixteen States in the Union that under State prohibition have gone farther than the Volstead Act and will not permit the manufacture and sale of any beverage with any alcohol whatever in it. A congressional act that would legalize 23/4 per cent. would not legalize it in those sixteen States. In addition to these, are eighteen other States that by State legislation have made the alcoholic content the same as the Volstead Act does, and a change of the latter Act by Congress would not legalize anything of 1/2 per cent. or over in those eighteen States. That leaves only fourteen States that would be affected at all by any beer and wine legislation that Congress might enact.

Two and three-fourths per cent. beer is almost exactly the same beer that the country enjoyed (?) before prohibition came, and beer constituted about nine-tenths of the entire drink sold in the saloons. The agitators for light wine and beer are therefore asking us to repeal nine-tenths of prohibition in the face of the Prohibition Amendment. Well, we won't do it.—The Index.

BOOK REVIEW.

"ON THE TRAIL OF THE PEACEMAKERS."*

Since the beginning of the war Friends have been constantly using the word "Reconstruction." Those who are anxious to reconstruct the world with lasting materials of spiritual quality will read with open hearts and sympathetic interest this book by Fred B. Smith. Formerly a Y. M. C. A. secretary, he went abroad on "a mission of friendship and peace." He comes back feeling that the sentiment of the world is overwhelmingly against war, telling in his racy fashion of the conditions he found in the Occident and Orient.

The Japanese, while resenting white domination of so much of the globe, are nevertheless in favor of world disarmament and international peace. The Chinese are not averse at all to joining if they feel that they will be treated with justice. Great Britain he found "calm, thoughtful, serious, feeling conscious of the crisis, but going ahead steadily in its great services for international peace and brotherhood. For though sometimes wrong, short-sighted, selfish—Great Britain is a true friend of world peace."

Continental Europe is "wrecked financially, living in a state of complete confusion about the future and horrified at the possibility of another war."

America has two courses ahead of her. First—to allow a small group of selfish men and politicians to make her policy "America first," sticking closely to the Monroe doctrine and forgetting that in these days no nation can live to itself. This way can lead only to disaster. Or America may take her place in the world, assuming her share of responsibility not only in diplomacy but in the great realm of spiritual leadership. For only can she become great by living for others and not for herself.

How can this be accomplished?—only by association of the nations and a policy of open doors and world interest. This is the opportunity for Christian leadership before the American people, to free itself forever from war alliances. The Federal Council with its thirty-one denominations united must lead the way. The Sermon on the Mount must be applied, for war and Christianity cannot both survive.

His conclusions are:—

(1) The sentiment of the world is overwhelmingly against war and in favor of permanent peace.

(2) Present methods of settling war issues are rapidly adjusting the stage scenery for another slaughter of the innocents.

(3) Need of a world-wide campaign of education to tear the halo completely away from the war story.

(4) There will never be continuous peace till some form of open democratic diplomacy is discovered and adopted.

(5) There is need for some method which can lift the negotiations out of the sordid rut of economics.

Finally, if America takes the Christian leadership and participates in world affairs "the moral of the distressed nations would be lifted 50 per cent., the depleted and depressed money markets would jump up 50 per cent. and the peril of war would be removed almost completely."

If the author of this appealing book could have his way, then "Peace on Earth, good-will to all men" would become a glorious reality.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

The Peace Committee in the two weeks preceding Christmas was busy circularizing Pennsylvania with a Peace poster, prepared by the National Council for the Prevention of War. About four thousand were distributed with a covering letter to colleges, schools, libraries, women's clubs, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A.'s, etc., throughout the State. The International Relations Committee of the Philadelphia Federation of Churches prepared a strong appeal along Quaker lines, for immediate constructive peace work in the churches. This was sent by us to the churches of Philadelphia and vicinity, and to other city church federations throughout the State.

The Christ of the Andes shown on the poster commemorates the peaceful settlement of boundary disputes between Chile and Argentine and, cast in bronze from melted-down cannon, was placed on the boundary line in Third Month, 1904. This indeed—A Symbol of Peace Between Two Nations—has become in truth, "A hope of Peace for all the World."

Our World, an international paper which carries good-will on its every page, has in its First Month issue a picture of the statue, The Christ of the Andes, with a poem by Henry Van Dyke, written especially for the occasion.

CHRIST OF EVERYWHERE.

"Christ of the Andes," Christ of Everywhere,
Great lover of the hills, the open air,
And patient lover of impatient men
Who blindly strive and sin and strive again,—
Thou Living Lord, larger than any creed,
Thou Love Divine, uttered in human deed,— Oh, teach the world, warring and wandering still,
The way of Peace, the footpath of Good Will!

—HENRY VAN DYKE.

AVALON, Eleventh Month 22, 1922.

There is an inclination among workers for peace to become discouraged, in view of the distressing condition of the world. But there are, indeed, "signs in the Christmas fire"—signs of a new year. Among these we would mention the movement on the part of peasants and farmers in many countries to own their own homes and farms. This, fraught with economic and social consequences, will prove a pledge against future war.

The World Alliance for Friendship Through the Churches is active in its Warless World campaign. With men like John R. Mott and Francis E. Clark swinging into line the forces of the Y. M. C. A. and Christian Endeavor, a new strength is gained.

America is not far from becoming a member of the World Court, connected with the League of Nations, where it is already ably represented by John Bassett Moore as one of the Judges.

The War Veterans of eight Allied nations have made their own peace program, which includes—open publicity of all international agreements affecting the entire people; execution of treaties in good faith; opposition to territorial aggrandizement; and an international court to outlaw war. These men, not statesmen, not diplomats, not rich—simply the men who fought the last war and know what war really means, are taking this new program to their own countries.

We believe this is one of the hopeful things for a New Year of progress toward Peace.

SERVICE AT HOME.

The Home Service Committee of the American Friends' Service Committee is finding opportunity for young Friends to give a year of volunteer service to work with some organization dealing with one of our many social problems. The work is intended to give young people an opportunity to express their ideals through service, and also to bring them into contact with some great social needs in order that they may have a more intelligent understanding of those problems and may be better equipped to aid in their solution.

A Junior Home Service Unit has just been organized by the Park Avenue Monthly Meeting in Baltimore under the direction of Bliss Forbush, the Meeting's secretary. The Unit is an application to junior needs of the home-service idea outlined above. It is to consist of ten members of the First-day School from fifteen to twenty-one years of age, and is to be chartered by the American Friends' Service Committee. Each member of the Unit is to give two hours of work each week, under the direction of a leader, either in training or in practical service work. The subject to be taken up by the Unit this year is that of playgrounds; their management, games to be played on them, first aid and knowledge of contagious diseases, and other kindred topics. From Fifth to Ninth Months the two hours each week will be put in on duty at one of the public playgrounds which is under the direction of the Meeting.

WINTER COMES TO VIENNA.

Winter has come very early to Vienna this year, and the cold combined with increasing unemployment and stagnation of business makes conditions very serious. It is true that the krone has been stable for nearly three months and that prices in some instances have dropped. Cost of living according to the official index figure has gone down by eight per cent. from Ninth Month 15th to Tenth Month 15th, and by another six per cent. from Tenth Month 15th to Eleventh Month 15th, but the purchasing power of the population is lower than ever. The foreign visitors have left, and it was they who caused at least an apparent prosperity, and through whom employment in the restaurant and hotel trade, in the clothing and leather industries, and in luxury-shops, was kept up. I went to see a friend who owns a fashionable leather-shop on the Stefansplatz the other evening, and he told me that since the morning I was the first person who had entered the place. Everybody realizes that this is only the beginning of a very difficult time and that the reconstruction of Austria, even if one takes the most hopeful attitude, will cause a great deal of suffering and hardship.

We are receiving more and more appeals every day from people of the middle and the artisan classes; a pensioned teacher with a family of four children, who asks for a suit for his elder boy to enable him to attend school; a woman painter, who requests us to buy or at least exhibit some of her works, for which she is now unable to find a sale; an eighty-year old house-owner, who on account of the low rents enforced by law at present, is starving on an income which six years ago would have been wealth; a nurse who has lost all her belongings on a retreat during the war and who is now working in a Protestant Children's Home for a salary insufficient to cover the bare necessities of life.

I just heard of a family where the husband—a mason—has been trying to find work for weeks without success. His wife is consumptive and bed-ridden. The child, aged six, spends the day in the "Settlement," where it gets at least two warm meals a day, and for this the father pays more than two-thirds of his scanty unemployment allowance. He applied for a job—snow-shovelling in the streets—and was refused, as there are already hundreds of people on the list.

Great efforts are made among the Viennese to relieve the suffering in their own country. A relief committee under the auspices of Chancellor Seipel is raising funds for wood and coal; the Viennese Children's doctors appeal for clothing for needy school children, the various hospitals and Children's Homes; the Homes for blind people and for the old make collections through the Vienna Press; the War Invalid's organization arranged for house to house collections; collection days and charity concerts are frequently held for the First Aid Society, which is supported only by private subscriptions.

And yet all these efforts are insufficient to meet the need, and besides the amount of poverty which is bound to exist in every big city, there is great distress among people, who under normal conditions would be independent, and who will probably become so again if they are assisted at present.

THE VILNA WILDERNESS.

Confirmation of previous reports concerning conditions in the Vilna district of Poland has been brought by Harry and Rebecca Timbres, former members of the Friends' Mission in Russia, who have just returned to America. In passing through Poland, they joined an investigating party on a visit to the Vilna district. The following paragraphs are taken from their report:

"When the refugees return from their exile in Russia to their former homes in this district, what do they find? A waste of battle-torn trenches; land covered with endless reaches of barbed wire, and filled with shells waiting to explode and kill the peasant who sets his spade into the soil. Forests of birch, whose roots will defy eradication for the next ten years, cover the fields that were once waving with grain. It is impossible adequately to describe the wilderness left on a modern battle-front. It took six million men working for three years with the most efficient machines science could invent to make that land what it is to-day; now a few thousand peasants, starved, half-naked, return and with their bare hands try to recover from it their lost homes.

"Barbed wire is everywhere. It is sunken into the lakes killing all the fish. It lies deep underground, where it was driven by exploding shells, and catches and breaks the plough of the peasant. It makes of every forest an impassable thicket, and of every hillside and plain a forest of bristling steel.

"Never did pioneer face such a prospect with so few resources at hand as the refugees who return to this wilderness. They arrive with nothing and find nothing. They are starving when they come. They have no money, no beasts, no tools, hardly any clothing. Their only diet for the last two years—in some cases even longer—has been grass, roots, and potatoes. "Their dugouts are little better than sties. During the war they were probably quite comfortable, but now, four years later, the logs are rotting and the heavy roofs are caving in. The mass of earth on top forms a reservoir, so that water drips inside in wet weather and dry. Thirty per cent. of the people have tuberculosis.

"The frequently-asked question, 'Why has the Government not helped them?' is easily answered; there has been no Government. Speaking more exactly there has been too many governments. The administration of that territory has passed through seven powers since the beginning of the war and six of these changes have taken place since the armistice. None of the successive governments have been sure enough of their tenure to do anything in the way of improving the territory. The inhabitants, drifting back, have had to shift for themselves. Last spring the district was definitely turned over to Poland, and the Polish Government has now begun to give some help in the way of loans of money, of seed-grain and grants of timber. But Poland with her currency so far depreciated, has so many problems that she cannot give adequate help."

The Friends' Service Mission is undertaking relief work in the Vilna district this winter, and the American Friends' Service Committee needs contributions for the support of this work. It will supply raw wool and flax so that the peasants can make their own clothes; seeds, tools and horses so that they can put out crops and haul timber to rebuild their homes; glass, nails and other building materials; encouragement and inspiration so that they shall not lose hope.

"WHAT MAKES SECURITIES SAFE?"

(From Babson's Reports. Offered by J. Passmore Elkinton.)

Keep an eye on fundamentals. Is there a client who would have thought it possible ten years ago that the highest grade government and municipal bonds of Germany would be practically valueless to-day? In 1912, City of Berlin bonds were selling freely on a four per cent. basis and moreover were on the circulars of the most conservative bond houses of Great Britain, France and America. No one dreamed that they were not absolutely safe. The same feeling prevailed regarding German corporation bonds. Germany was looked upon as most prosperous with a sound banking system and a most stable financial structure. The mark was considered in the markets of the world equally stable with the dollar or pound sterling.

It is true that those who held German stocks, have thus far not suffered any appreciable loss. Those who owned farms, factories, and other real estate have not suffered appreciably by the decline in the mark. As the value of the mark declines, their operating costs, especially wages, decline correspondingly, and in most cases, they can increase the price of their products to make good any threatened decrease in profits. Germans who held stocks or equities have not generally suffered; but those who owned large amounts have greatly prospered by the mark's decline. For instance, if we calculated marks in terms of dollars, a man who owned a building in Germany worth $500,000 in 1912, with a mortgage thereon for $400,000, could to-day pay off that mortgage for 25 dollars.

The conservative German investor of 1912 is to-day practically penniless. Those who held bonds and mortgages and owned no money are to-day stripped of all their wealth. They still have their safety deposit boxes and these boxes are yet full of the highest grade government, municipal and corporation bonds, upon which interest is being paid. The interest, however, is being paid in valueless marks, and as the bonds mature, they are being paid off in valueless marks. The ordinary bond was of the 4000 mark denomination and 4000 marks are to-day worth less than $5.00. And the same loss comes to the humble savings bank depositors as to the wealthy.

One thing more: Is it any more impossible for our government, municipal and good corporation bonds to be equally valueless ten years hence? The United States is surely no more prosperous to-day than Germany ten years ago. Our banking system is no better, while our industrial organization is even less efficient. Even our form of government—Democracy—is yet in the experimental stage, and has many struggles to meet and overcome before it will be safe. Surely, it is easily possible that the American dollar may depreciate as much during the next ten years as the mark has during the past ten years. Statistically, there is only one reason why this is not probable. This reason is the character of the American people. The German leaders were essentially materialistic, while our leaders are essentially idealistic.

The only reason that the statisticians find for feeling more confidence in the dollar and in American bonds, is that Americans are of a different character from the Germans.

We do not advise religion as a safeguard of property. For any person or nation to become interested in religion for such a low purpose would be the best evidence of a general lack of religion. On the other hand, this surely is a matter which should awaken us all to a greater interest in true religious education, save evangelistic work and an earnest attempt to change the motives, desires and hearts of men and women. Civilization rests not upon any system of government, industry or finance, but rather upon the heart attitude of the people.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

A SMALL book of some 16 pages has recently been in the hands of many Philadelphia Friends. We expect for it a wide circulation. We refer to William Littleboy's article entitled "Our Beloved Deaf," which appeared in The Friend (London) between five and six years ago, and was afterwards reprinted in revised and enlarged form as a booklet. Three impressions of the booklet have been exhausted and a fourth has just been printed and will be on sale at 304 Arch Street.

THE following over the signature of a Norwegian Friend, has recently appeared in print:—

"In connection with what I have read in print concerning Friends in Norway, I should like to add that Friends here will be glad to receive visits from Friends abroad. The best time for visiting our country is during the autumn and winter months, as it is difficult to gather people in meetings during spring and summer time on account of the light evenings and holidays.

"At present meetings for worship are held at Stavanger on First-days, morning and afternoon, and on Fifth-day morning. Once a week there is an evening meeting for younger people. Other meetings, as those of the Christian International and the Peace Society, find an open place in the meeting-house.

"Though the number of members is small, the Society in Norway has been upholding Quaker principles and is also recognized for doing so. A newspaper says, 'The Quakers [in Norway] are most likely the religious Society that has cleared the broadest way for liberty of faith and confession within the Norwegian community and legislation.' This has to a great extent been done by suffering for Truth's sake, in prison and out of prison, from the beginnings and up to recent days."

THE historic houses of Washington, D. C., were open for inspection one day last autumn during the meeting there of the Garden Club of America. One of the most interesting of these is the Octagon house built in 1798 and later occupied by President Madison, and Dolly, his Quaker wife, after the burning of the White House in 1814 and where the President signed the Treaty of Ghent. Tudor Place, on Q Street, in Georgetown, is a fine example of Tudor architecture, with colonial features. It was built in 1810 and owned for many years by the Washington family. Dr. William Thornton, born in the West Indies, 1761, of Quaker parents, was architect of these as well as of the United States Capitol.

ELIZABETH BRAITHWAITE EMMOTT, whose "Story of Quakerism" has done much in making that history acceptable to young people, has prepared "A Short History of Quakerism" which will be published by George Allen & Unwin. The book is based upon the history as recorded in her brother's two books, "The Beginnings of Quakerism" and "The Second Period," and Rufus Jones's two volumes, "The Later Periods of Quakerism." The introduction is written by R. M. Jones.

GERRARD ROBERTS, an English Friend, writes that he met R. R. Moton, Booker T. Washington's successor to Tuskegee Institute, recently in London, where the latter had just lunched with the Bishops of Canterbury and of York, and that Dr. Moton paid well deserved tribute to Timothy Nicholson and other Friends for their work for the colored people. Major Moton said his ideal for the solution of the world's color problems is through education by a ring of such institutes as Tuskegee and Hampton around the world.

THE Penal Reform Society of Pennsylvania, along with many good citizens of the Commonwealth not members of the Society, would like to see many County jails moved out of the county towns into the real country.

Dr. Kirchway, who succeeded Thomas Mott Osborne at Sing Sing, is Director of the Penal Reform Society of Pennsylvania, and is now touring the state starting local organizations. This is a subject on which Friends need to be well posted, for the question should reach our legislature in the very near future.

THE Philadelphia Public Ledger recently contained a tribute to the gifts of J. Russell Hayes, from which the following is taken: "Many volumes of J. Russell Hayes' poems are dear to the hearts of all lovers of nature as well as those of the people of Chester County, particularly 'The Brandywine,' 'Brandywine Days,' and 'Old-fashioned Garden.' Mark Sullivan, widely known as a writer and popular speaker, recently said that Hayes' volume, 'Old Quaker Meeting Houses,' is a favorite book of himself and Herbert Hoover in their quieter hours."

AMERICAN schools claim to lead their English cousins in things scientific, but we have not heard of any alumnus of a Friends' school here who has been quite so much to the fore along this line as the following statement from an English Correspondent claims for L. McMichael, a former scholar at Ackworth school in Yorkshire.

L. McMichael, was one of the first promoters of wireless in London, he came to the school recently, making his presentation in person and gave a detailed explanation of the mechanism and its powers. Music was heard plainly that was being played some fifteen miles away; Ackworth came into touch with Madrid and Bagdad, and received time signals from Paris and from Berlin. The wonders of these transmitted electric waves were further exhibited when L. M. McMichael fixed his wire to aerials within the hall and again, with the aid of a sound amplifier, signals from ships in the North Sea were heard.

A RECENT letter addressed to Allen D. Hole gives the translation of a letter of thanks from Frau Marianne Hainisch, mother of the President of the Republic of Austria, after having received a copy of "St. Stephens House" from the author, Anna B. Thomas. She says: "You have accomplished a notable thing in your book, 'St. Stephens House.' It is a monument of love in a time of unparalleled confusion. The work of the Friends' Emergency Committee will be a model for all time of how to overcome hate and to work for international peace. Many thanks for it. I hope it will be translated into all languages."

Frau Hainisch is a little lady of over eighty who has spent her long life in kindly deeds and is still working on amidst the weakness of advanced years and the terrible conditions now existing in Austria, Anna B. Thomas explains, and one is impressed upon seeing her, as upon seeing the Grand Duchess of Baden in Germany, also past eighty and overflowing with love and good works, that "One is our Master, even Christ, and all we are brethren."—From The American Friend.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION.

ON your drive, will a Rhoads Belt give more economical service than other belts that may be bought for less money?

We have many reports of the actual working of Rhoads Belts. These go to show that the careful skill used throughout the thirty processes of manufacture, does produce belts of high quality.

They are the kind of belts that should cost you less per year because they last longer, grip tighter, and give you greater output.

GOD'S CHILDREN, TOO.

Once upon a time two little girls squabbled over their play. Edith went home hastily and then Dorothy stormed into the house and stamped hard every step of the way upstairs to her own room. The house grew very still. Presently a door opened and Dorothy came downstairs singing.

"Has the storm all blown away?" asked her mother.

"Oh, yes," answered Dorothy. "It has. I almost forgot that Edith is one of God's children, too. But I remember now and I'm going out to play again."

A few days ago two older girls stood on Chestnut Street watching a parade.

"I hate this man," said Dorothy. "He's a wicked old sinner! He has ruined my people. I can never forgive him."

Horses pranced past; the band played. Then a great automobile rolled along. In it sat an old man, wearily lifting his hat to the crowds. Some bits of white paper fluttered down from a high office window. A few people cheered. The car rolled on.

Dorothy turned impulsively to Edith and said, "I almost forgot that he is one of God's children, too."

Think of the difference it would make if we used this attitude as the base of all our activities. If the irritating person next door, the criminal, the "wicked old men" who have the power to throw the world into chaos again all became "God's children, too" to us, our work for world peace and local harmony would be irresistible.

BITS THAT COUNT.

Let us try adding to our list of New Year resolutions: "Do something for somebody each day;" yes, and not only add it, but practise it.

As a group of young people we all want to do something for somebody else; we have proved that by our work during the war, and by our response to various other calls for social and charitable work.

For various reasons some of us are often unable to take part in these duties which appeal to everyone as worth while. Instead of making the best of our situations we sit back and do nothing, or else put the small things, for which reward is perhaps not evident or immediate, at the bottom of the list, to be done only when some urgent stimulation forces them to the front.

Perhaps the opportunity which looms before us as our "bit" is something which no one else has done, or which might cause criticism—we're all sensitive about being criticised. Perhaps we might inconvenience ourselves. Selfishness is a very dominant reason for our lack of service to others.

I remember distinctly an experience which I had last summer on a crowded trolley car. A tired-looking old colored man stood opposite where I was sitting, with his arms full of bundles. The bundles kept slipping and the paper was coming off one. Should I offer to hold his bundles?

I slept soundly that night, but I have thought many times that I didn't deserve to, and have rebuked myself many times for not doing what I thought was "my bit." I was afraid of what the people around me would think. Have you ever had such an experience?

One of the things from which we get most joy out of life is our contact with other people. To get this joy from contact with other people we must first make them happy; and one of the best ways of doing this is to do something for them. Since our environments and situations are so different and opportunities so numerous, it is impossible to make a tabulated list of what we might do. How wonderful it would be if we each one of us could get the spirit of doing whatever we could, as often as we could, every day.

Probably we all think we don't have time to do another thing. In these days of rushing, every minute counts. But what about the minutes we waste each day in working at useless trumpery? or the opportunities we are afraid to tackle? or those we are not keen enough to realize?

Let us open our eyes and be alert to our opportunities! We all have a part to play, which no one else can fill, in this big game of life; why shouldn't we begin to score to-morrow by doing our "bit?" Then by the end of the year we shall be twice as happy; and again we shall head our list of New Year resolutions—this time with confidence—"I'll do something for someone else each day."

ANNA M. BENNING.

The War on War.

No thinking person can contemplate the world situation with equanimity; no well-informed person, without the most profound concern. We do not require the warnings that are coming from statesmen and military men alike to know that our civilization is drifting to its doom—literally to its doom.

Nationalistic hatreds are sown thickly abroad to mature in fifteen or twenty years. This is Fact number One. The development of the aeroplane is Fact number Two. The development of poison gas completes the story. Thomas Edison says that one fleet of aeroplanes with gas can wipe out London's seven millions in three hours,—or the millions of Paris or Berlin or New York. The French with their two thousand two hundred aeroplanes and our Lewisite gas could probably bury the lower half of England—or of Germany—under gas in the first night of war. Thos. Edison says that no defense from such a raid has been discovered. The only recourse is retaliation.

"As I read my morning paper," said a thoughtful man, "I am inclined to think I have sinned in bringing a child into the world."

"I should be a traitor to my country," says General O'Ryan, "if I were not doing all I can to abolish war."

Nothing else that we can do in the next fifteen years matters if we fail in this. Home, family, business, useful reforms, other good causes,—all are wasted time, if the war that is preparing cannot be averted.

This is no time for light-hearted optimism. Only the despairing cynicism that says, "War always will be," is worse. The jackals and the coyotes will be barking amid the ruins of our civilization if we drift on. We can and must take the steps that will avert the doom impending.

We have not time, be it said, to "change human nature." It is not necessary. We have substituted law for war without changing human nature in communities, state and nation. Disputes here are taken to the courts and settled in orderly fashion. Our task may be said to be that we take one more step and substitute law for war internationally.

Progressive world organization, whether through a league of nations, or an association of nations, is the cornerstone of any intelligent peace programme, and has been so regarded by lovers of peace from William Penn down. The round world is smaller than the thirteen colonies were when they made their great experiment in partial world organization. The oceans are hardly more than rivers. Neither prosperity nor influenza nor the opium traffic nor anything else that affects human welfare any longer regards national boundaries. We must face the facts.

World-wide reduction of armaments to police forces is the second part of the programme. Peace and economy alike demand it, common sense has long cried out for it. Blind competition in armaments, that profits only the makers of munitions and the builders of battleships, is ruining the world. We need our money to build school houses. All nations do. Armaments endanger the peace of the world.

World-wide education for peace constitutes the third and last part of our peace programme. Without this, all the rest goes for naught. Our American love for France comes out of our study of the Revolutionary War in childhood. Our love for Poland dates from the same period—Kosciusko! and a prejudice against England was probably acquired at the same time.

The education that will make peace permanent must rise above national prejudices, must go behind the wars to their causes and find how they might have been prevented, and patriotism must have a more solid and secure foundation than military victories.

The National Council for Prevention of War, in supporting the preaching of this doctrine, is gathering the forces that make for Peace into a movement that is bearing fruit. Sentiment is crystallizing in practical measures. If we stick together, America, as President Harding said, will "lead the world to outlaw war."

Space is too brief to tell here of the progress of the year. Our army and navy personnel were cut, with the result that Japan has announced a reduction of twelve thousand in her naval personnel, plus six thousand civilian employees in naval arsenals. "No More War" day was a nation-wide success, and not only deepened America's determination to be done with war, but led to President Harding's receiving tens of thousands of letters and telegrams urging recognition of the World Court at The Hague, and further definite steps toward peace. Secretary Hughes has announced that the will of the people thus mightily expressed bids fair soon to be carried out.

Now the obvious need is support for America's closer co-operation in European reconstruction as soon as France permits, and for progressive world organization through either the League of Nations or the projected Association of Nations. At the same time, while pushing these measures, the militaristic reaction must not have free play and education for peace must not be neglected.

The Council is giving especial attention to its educational campaign this winter. Its text book, "War on War," has been well received. The first edition of twenty-five thousand copies is nearly exhausted and a second edition will soon be issued. Four of the Atlantic City hotels—the Chalfont, Haddon Hall, the Dennis and the Morton, have bought together sixteen hundred copies for free distribution among their guests.

The "Appeal to Teachers," has been asked for both from Scotland and from England. Two thousand copies have been sent by the Friends' Peace Committee to an English educational publication, on request.

A wide range of literature for teachers and parents, including peace programmes and the stories of heroes of peace, is being prepared.

At the same time, extension of the organization is going on. The Executive Secretary has spoken in twenty States to more than fifty thousand people in the year just ended. Branches of the Council are being formed both locally and by States. Individuals and members of other organizations are being inspired to act as apostles of the cause far and wide. The Bulletin has a circulation of ten thousand. It is an influential group of readers—few more so. It is helping to vitalize and focus the efforts for peace in the affiliated and other groups.

Friends have done much to make the work possible. They have done more than their share. The cost of the fiscal year, recently ended, was about forty thousand dollars. Of this, probably, two-thirds or nearly so, came from members of the Society of Friends. The Budget for the current year calls for one hundred thousand dollars. It is carefully drawn and carries a minimum programme. I cannot imagine this programme being carried out without the solid support of Friends. They must give more than their share. Neither peace nor war can be won by those who reckon the cost. Our acquaintances gave without stint to win the recent war. It is our turn now, as Friends, to give with the same spirit of sacrifice for the cause that will really save civilization.

Without generous support, we cannot go on. We are seeking the aid of Young Friends to conduct a thorough canvass of their meetings. We ask the hearty co-operation of older Friends everywhere in making the canvass a great success. It may be that God has been preparing our Society for such a time as this. May He give us grace and wisdom in our day of opportunity!

WHEN YOUTH MEETS YOUTH.

[The following letter was sent to Berlin for distribution among German Young Friends, by the International Committee of the Young Friends' Committee.]

To the Youth of Germany, who with open souls are seeking, as we are, for themselves and for the Nations a better way of life, the Youth of the Society of Friends of our Yearly Meeting in Philadelphia send greetings of warm fellowship at this Christmas Season.

We would wish our greeting to carry a message of hope and courage to you. We feel very humble in view of our own material welfare in counselling courage, when we know the difficulties of life which you, and which so many of the Youth of Europe and Asia are facing. At times, however, we almost envy you your hardships which challenge the soul and mind of you, whereas we, in our comparative ease, are apt to become of dulled sensibilities and weakened aspirations.

You have in your hands the moulding of a new Germany of fresh and clean ideals. To you is given the great opportunity of conquering bitterness and hatred with understanding and with that love that suffers long and is kind, that taketh not account of evil, that love that never faileth.

May the spirit of the living God clarify your vision and fill your lives with power to fare forth, undaunted, along the great adventuring way of Love, which was trodden by Jesus of Nazareth.

“For even the youths shall faint and grow weary, and the young men shall fail; but they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength, they shall mount up with wings as eagles, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint.” (Isaiah)

We have been inspired by your courage to push bravely forward in our own struggles at home. Our Christmas wish for you and for ourselves is that we may unitedly come to a greater possession of, and abandon to, that love of God which already unites and motivates us all.

COME unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls.—St. Matthew xi: 28, 29.

AMERICAN AND GERMAN GIRLS UNITE IN CHRISTMAS PARTIES.

The International Institute of the Y. W. C. A. is conducting classes in English for German immigrant girls who are arriving in this city at the rate of about seventy-five a month. Last week these classes were converted into Christmas parties.

At the Y. W. C. A. building of the North American Lacc Factory, the German girls, carrying snow-trimmed Christmas trees, sang German Christmas songs as their contribution to the White Christmas Pageant given by the American girls who are members of the various girls' clubs of the Y. W. C. A. One of these girls' clubs gave a Christmas gift to each of the newly-arrived German girls as a token of Christmas goodwill and of welcome to this country. The teacher of the class at this branch of the Y. W. C. A. is Jeannette Keim, of Cynwyd, formerly engaged in the child-feeding work conducted by the American Friends' Service Committee in Germany.

In West Philadelphia a similar Christmas party was held at the home of Maria C. Scattergood, 3515 Powelton Avenue, where another group of German girls has been meeting weekly throughout the winter to study English under the guidance of Elsa Silber of the Friends' Institute and formerly of the staff of the Amerikanische Kinderhilfsmmission in Essen, Germany. Assisting her with the Christmas party were Maria C. Scattergood, Mary B. Moon, of Morrisville, and Elizabeth T. Shipley of Haverford, all former members of the German child-feeding mission of the American Friends' Service Committee.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS OF JOSEPH AND EDITH STRATTON PLATT.

I wish every one could have an opportunity to get a peep into a civilization where the power of Christianity has not been working. It would help us all to appreciate a little more what we are enjoying. We get into the habit of taking it for granted, and don't realize that the only reason why we are not struggling with the same problems as our Chinese Friends is that, somewhere back there, someone was tremendously concerned to see that the great message and meaning of the life of Christ was better understood and made clear to all men. And we are enjoying the fruits. But you, dear friends and loved ones there, are not only enjoying the fruits. You are sharing in the burden where it is the hardest.

J. E. P.

Stella Burgess and I went to call on the wife of one of the Chinese Y. M. C. A. Secretaries here in Peking. It was my first real experience of seeing inside a little Chinese home and I want to share my first impressions with you. It was down a little alley of another alley and we gave a little knock at the gate of the Compound at the same time calling out, "Is Lin Taitai at home?" And a voice answered, "Who is there?" Stella gave our names, though the little wife on the inside perfectly well knew who it was as we had sent word ahead! Then she appeared at the gate with her six months' old baby in her arms, a pink-cheeked little cherub in the arms of the prettiest little mother you ever saw. She bowed and led us to the inner court where she went through another little ceremony before conducting us in to her mother-in-law. She called out in a cunning little voice, "Nai Nai!" (mother). Mother answers and the girl gives her our names, though all the time she has been looking out the window for us! "Come in." Well, we walked into a little cold hut of a room with a stone floor and on back to the living-room, bed-room, dining-room, all in one apparently. The whole left end of the room was a built-in stone platform about the height of a chair. This is heated inside and has a straw matting on top. It is the bed for the whole family at night and everything else by day. On the edge of it we sat. At the other side of the little room was a table with tea cups on it and a chair at each end. Opposite the side of the room where we entered was a wash-bench and some basins.

In the middle of the room was a little stove—charcoal. I guess it must have been, as there was no chimney. The kettle boiled on it and the old lady warmed her fingers over it. I wish you could have seen her playing the part of hostess! I never saw anyone so tickled. Her old yellow, leathery skin just absolutely shone through with light! She had only a few teeth, as I happened to know, for she showed them most of the time in one big smile of delight! She soon had two little cups on the table and got out her tiny package of company tea and clawed out a little heap of it with her funny, gnarled old fingers and put it into the pot. Then she graciously served us both, apologizing all the time for their "crazy, dirty, disheveled, little old miserable house." (This is the way they do, even though the house may be a mansion.) The little mother sat on the edge of the bed with her baby and giggled with pleasure, most of the time, leaving the duties of hospitality chiefly to the real head of the family! When we got up to go, of course, they both attended us to the street gate, where we bowed ourselves away, with many smiles and nods from the little old woman! Well, that was a great experience, and I won't soon get over thinking about the hundreds of homes like that, only not so happy or so clean. There is that little wife, of an especially blessed life, and yet what was her life? She lived with her mother-in-law, who decided everything. Even her baby wasn't her own. There was not one attractive thing about the house, as such. There she sat, on the Kläng by day and night, doing what the old mother decided—probably she does not read or write, or often go outside of the courtyard. How empty her life must be, but in comparison with the general run, greatly blessed, for the old mother-in-law is kind, and there are not several other families in the room, too. I suppose the homes of our Moukden secretaries aren't nearly so attractive as this one, and we don't wonder the word "home" for them brings up no happy associations, but only the thought of noise and dirt and confusion and difficult relationships and responsibilities and heavy burdens and little love or none! What can the sight of our home do for them, except to give them a bitter glimpse of what they have missed in their lives! It weighs on our hearts more and more. As soon as the women of China wake up there is bound to be a terrific reaction, and one of the things one discovers here in Peking is that it has already begun. Girls are refusing to marry at all—the more educated ones, and men too. There is the beginning of the complete breakdown of the family system. Here is where I do see how we can help. When the crash of ideals comes it is for us to step in and rescue whatever was fine in the old ideal of home, and offer something in the place of that which stifled personality and fullness of life. If only we can!

THEY DO NOT LIVE.

They do not live who choose the middle way,
Whom ecstasy and anguish have not known,
Who scale no trembling heights, nor plumb the lone Depths of an aching darkness in bright day.
They miss the passion with the pain, the gay
High tides that sweep the spirit to its own,
The lifting surge of music, the dear tone
Of a loved voice in pleading or in play.
They miss the hurts and stumblings; surely fear
Is never theirs, nor groping in the night;
In their serene cool weather come no dread
Torrents or tempests to corrupt their sight,
Nor any rainbow; neither do they hear
The sea, nor does the thunder wake these dead.

—IRWIN EDMAN, in Harpers.

NOTHING is more expensive than penuriousness; nothing is more anxious than carelessness; and every duty which is bidden to wait returns with seven fresh duties at its back.—CHAS. KINGSLEY.

OUR LIVES SUBLIME.

Some weeks ago the writer happened to overhear a dialogue between a middle-aged and a young Friend which ran something as follows, and thought the two points of view might prove of interest to others.

Middle Age—I did not say that you Young Friends have lost or never had an interest in literature and art, but that you seemed so possessed with the idea of service to mankind that you did not enjoy these things as we did thirty years ago.

Youth—But surely a sincere striving for the uplift of humanity is of more real value to the world than a cloistered and selfish pleasure in books and pictures. Of course we should like to sit placidly by our firesides and invite our souls, but we feel such an attitude unprofitable.

Middle Age—Well, I get to thinking sometimes when I see you so wide-eyed and eager, so weary with your conferences and committees, and distraught with your conflicting interest—I get to thinking of Emerson's "What! so hot, my little Sir." I question whether you are doing quite so much for the world as you think you are! I am not sure but the dignity and grace and spiritual qualities engendered by the absorption of beautiful and lovely things is as valuable as your "lives of service." Perhaps just being happy and kindly and loving your neighbor as yourself is service.

Youth—Well, I must get off here. I have two Committee meetings this afternoon and a lot of evening work. I really haven't time to talk!

WESTTOWN.

In last issue a paragraph appeared that prompts an immediate rebuttal. Attention was called to a dearth of teachers and a wealth of business men in this generation. The trouble with choosing a principal for Westtown is not with the candidates, of whom I believe there are a number, but with Westtownians. Naturally, we want a man who will reflect our ideas of what Westtown was, is and should be. Secondly, we want someone who satisfies our picture of a successful principal. We do not care to trust our School to a young man because he may be too young, nor to an elderly man because he may be too old. Frankly, we modestly prefer a man of just the right age, experience and temper. A member of our own Yearly Meeting and well primed on all the subtleties of the Westtown History, Committee and Quaker politics. Such a principal would, indeed, be a find almost too good for this world!

The next head-master of Westtown should preferably be from the teaching profession. Such a choice would not only insure a man of scholarly point of view, as head of the School, but he would be a direct inspiration to both staff and pupils. There are men, in the teaching profession, who are in harmony with the best of Quaker ideals, who would illustrate high character and who would have the strength to carry the School up and forward for the period of an head-mastership. It is the privilege of Alumni to aid and support such a man, after he has been chosen by a committee delegated to make the choice.

PRINCIPLE HONORED.

We sometimes think of the past or those of the past in something of a sacred manner; in many ways, perhaps it is well to do so, but I often think that we neglect our present-day opportunities in not giving first-hand experiences under present conditions and environment.

A Quaker youth reading of a staunch, consistent Friend of the past, is most likely to say, "Well, it is different now. I am placed in a different atmosphere, I cannot be a Friend and keep my position and standing."

It has seemed so strange to me that as soon as a young Friend discovers that he or she has a talent which the world is seeking after and is willing to pay a goodly sum to receive, that he seems to think that the first requisite for him is to forget his Quaker training as fast as he can. Yet without the soundness of principle and uprightness this training gave him in his early life, there would not be much in him for the public to admire and seek after.

It is my firm conviction that a youth of especial talents in the Society of Friends can be most useful to the world by not departing from the principles and practices of our Society.

I know of a certain Friend who associates with the State's best and foremost people—governors, supreme judges, and others of similar high standing, at meetings, banquets, etc., but not once has he departed from the "thee and thou" of the Quakers. He is introduced publicly and privately as "the Quaker from _____" and it is surprising how many people of note, both men and women, say to him, "I also am from good old Quaker stock and I am proud of it."

I know we cannot move the world swiftly to our way of peace and righteousness, yet many of our greatest men and women are conscious that the world would be much better and in smoother running order if they lived up to their convictions.

The purpose of this little article is to emphasize the importance of living our profession in our daily lives, whether we mingle with high or low.

I am certain that thus we will not only receive the respect of other people, but we will be a strength to the weaker ones—a witness for the Christ whose precepts we strive to make our principles.

JOHN E. HINSHAW.

FALLSINGTON FELLOWSHIP REUNION.

The Fellowship Group composed of Young Friends from Falls and Trenton Meetings met for a winter reunion on First-day evening, the thirty-first of Twelfth Month.

Unlike most Fellowship groups we do not hold regular meetings during the winter, as the majority of our members are in college or at Westtown or in business in Philadelphia during those months.

During the summer we meet every two weeks on First-day evenings for worship and discussion study, and these meetings have been so rich in inspiration, co-operation, consecration and comradeship that we are always sorry when, each fall, the time comes for us to take up separate lines of work.

During the Christmas holidays we were all at home once more and of course everyone wanted a reunion; consequently, with suppers in baskets and boxes we met at the home of Joseph Edgerton. There were twenty-two of us, and such a jolly, friendly supper! After supper there were hymns and Christmas carols and then a real Fellowship meeting. Sarah Bishop who led the discussion pointed out to us that in order to have worth while meetings during the summer we must begin to plan for them now and not wait, as many of us have done, until the first meeting. Let us decide upon the kind of meetings we want to have, the things we most want to get from them and then try to find the best medium through which to reach our goal. Each one must do his or her share, by reading books suggested for study or looking over proposed courses, and be ready with an opinion which will simplify the decision next summer. There were several suggestions offered for consideration which naturally will suggest others, and there was a strong feeling that we should gain through our Fellowship meetings something very definite and concrete which will enable us to do the Master's work more effectively.

In the very real and living silence with which our evening closed these words were spoken which seem to express beautifully the aim of our fellowship together, that we may in greater measure fulfil the text: "But be ye doers of the word and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves." (Jas. i: 22.)

M. GERTRUDE EDGERTON.

GIVE us such lifting up of soul as shall cause us to see the littleness of earth and the vanity of time, then give us such ideas of duty and sacrifice as shall bring us down to the earth again to do its meanest work as by appointment of heaven.

IN THE YOUNG FRIENDS' COMMITTEE.

The Executive Board of the Young Friends' Committee met at four o'clock on Sixth-day, First Month 5th, at Friends' Institute. In the absence of the chairman, the Secretary was asked to preside.

The Meeting was opened by a reading from the Bible. Then followed the roll call. The minutes of the last meeting were read and adopted.

The Editorial Committee reported it was at work on this issue of the Young Friends' Number. It encourages contributions from anyone who is interested in one or all the phases of Young Friends' activities.

The Social Committee reported that the two meetings planned for the Christmas holidays were held. A meeting is planned for Second Month 16, 1923, at which time Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin will meet with Young Friends and their friends.

The Extension Committee has added some names to its membership, as it was authorized to do at the last meeting. One meeting has been held; another is planned for the near future at which time a schedule for visiting meetings will be planned. The matter of visiting colleges will also be given attention then, and a committee will be appointed for this most valuable service.

The International Committee, after conferring with William B. Harvey, has learned that older Friends are entirely desirous of giving Frederick Libby every possible encouragement and support in his work, and are glad to have the co-operation of Young Friends in this. Young people in the different neighborhoods will be asked to take an active part in helping to keep up interest and collect funds in the Meetings and in the neighborhood. A drive for $100,000 is being planned, and the International Committee will meet with Frederick Libby next week to discuss ways in which we may be helpful in making the effort a successful one.

Two hundred and fifty copies of a letter from Young Friends have been sent to Germany. From Berlin they are to be distributed to Friends and others interested.

Letters were sent to several households where it was hoped foreign students might be entertained during the holidays. There was little response to them. The whole matter demands great tact and care, and interest in this kind of international service must grow as our horizons broaden.

At a recent supper meeting, to which Friends interested in mission work and student volunteers were invited, Dr. Sharp, Executive Secretary of the movement in this country, spoke.

The Public Ledger for First Month 4th contained an editorial "Against War." The Chairman of the International Committee read a letter to the editor, expressing our approval of the editorial. With the full consent of members present, this letter was sent from the Young Friends' Committee.

The Finance Committee reports that returns have not come in as fast as it was hoped they would. There is at present $442.50 in cash, $79.00 pledged. This does not include the latest returns from several meetings.

Edith Darnell reported for the Committee to appoint our representatives for the summer conference committee. Those appointed are: Mary J. Moon, D. Robert Yarnall, and Faith Borton. These Friends met with representatives from seven other Eastern Yearly Meetings on the sixteenth and seventeenth of last month. It is planned to hold the conference in the early summer or early autumn. Each Young Friends' Committee is responsible for advertising in their meeting. The plan to send a letter to all our members, including fly-leaves of the conference plans was approved by the Board.

Robert James was appointed by the Conference as treasurer for the Conference.

Invitations to attend a conference to be held in Baltimore on First Month 27th and 28th were given us. We do not feel able to send representatives to this conference unless our summer conference representatives are called to Baltimore at that time.

It was reported that our letter with check had been sent to Tom and Esther Jones.

Rowntree Gillett is very glad to visit any fellowships or young people's groups if he is needed or wanted by them. Any group desiring a visit from him is asked to communicate with Mary Moon.

The meeting then adjourned.

FAITH BORTON,
Recording Secretary.

FROM OVERSEAS.

Two letters have been received from England, from the Woodbrooke Extension Committee, and the Young Friends' Committee, respectively.

DEAR FRIEND:—

You will remember that before the war a helpful interchange of visits between English and American Young Friends was taking place. Ever since the war ended there has been a desire to renew these visits, but for various reasons the time to do so has not seemed ripe hitherto.

Largely as a result of William Littleboy's visit to America we are feeling that we should like to send a deputation of Young Friends to you next summer and a joint Committee representing the Woodbrooke Extension Committee and the Central Young Friends' Committee has been appointed to get such a deputation together and to find out whether the proposed visit would be acceptable to Friends in America.

It seems to us that the deputation should consist of at least six Young Friends, and we hope it may be possible to send more, say eight or nine. We also think that they should all be prepared to spend at least six weeks in the States, some, we hope, may stay longer. Our idea is that some should arrive in time to attend the Richmond Conference in Seventh Month, and we hope that some may stay long enough to visit a few of the colleges early in the autumn term. It is also hoped that they might spend a good deal of time among Friends in Philadelphia.

With kind greetings,
Yours sincerely,
(Signed) ROBERT DAVIS.

DEAR FRIEND:—

The English Young Friends' Committee has for some time past been feeling keenly desirous of drawing into closer association with the Young Friends' organizations in America. When therefore we received at our last meeting the letter from the recent Richmond Young Friends' Conference, addressed "To Young Friends Everywhere," we felt that the time was opportune not only to reply to the Richmond letter, but also to send a loving greeting to other Young Friends on the American continent.

For we are becoming increasingly conscious that the Young Friends' Movement in America and in England is one movement. We are one in aim and ideal, and to a larger extent than ever, one in general outlook. And we are one in the realization of the vital importance both for ourselves and for the world of a living experience of contact with God.

And therefore, as we look on the needs of a world that is perishing for lack of the knowledge of the power of God's love, we desire to draw closer than ever before with you who are bound on the same quest as ourselves, and who are following it along similar lines. We would welcome suggestions from you of more direct means of co-operation in the exchange of ideas and methods of work.

For the English Young Friends' Committee,
GERALD LITTLEBOY,
Hon. Secretary.

"THE CHILD IN THE MIST," an address delivered by Henry T. Hodgkin at the National Missionary Conference held at Shanghai, China, last spring, is published in full in the Episcopal paper, The Churchman, in the issue of Twelfth Month 9th. The child in question, which was the theme of the inspiring address, is the national Chinese Christian church, which is flowering as the fine product of missionary effort from the days of Morrison to the present.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' EASTERN CONFERENCE.

Young Friends everywhere will be interested in knowing that an eastern Young Friends' conference is to be held in the early summer or early fall. Dates will be announced soon. This conference has been planned by and for young Friends of both branches. It will probably be held at Westtown School, Pennsylvania. The working plan for the conference is the result of a week-end committee meeting, held in Philadelphia from Twelfth Month 16th to 17th. At this meeting twenty-two young Friends represented the young people of eight Yearly Meetings. Approximately six thousand form the constituency of the approaching conference.

The young Friends' conferences held in the Middle West have done much to make a homogeneous Society of Friends in America, and eastern Friends hope to carry the spirit and activity of this movement into every Friends' community on the Atlantic coast. They have planned the Young Friends' Eastern Conference for this purpose. They hope to deepen and strengthen the spiritual life of young Friends in every meeting of all branches, and to find a way of life that is more truly expressive of the Spirit within.

The following were present at the Philadelphia meeting, and form the Central Committee. From Philadelphia: Mary Atkinson, Edward Wright, Eliza M. Ambler, Lindsley Noble, D. Herbert Way, Elizabeth Ann Walter, Mary J. Moon, Faith Borton, D. Robert Yarnall; from New York: Phoebe Seaman, Ruth E. Craig, Paul J. Furnas; from New England: Eleanor Gifford, Elizabeth W. Paige, Elizabeth Perry; from Baltimore: Herman Barnes, Louise Hiatt, M. Millicent Carey, Louis C. Moon, Edith S. Blackburn, Richard Taylor, Ethel Reynolds.

The officers of the conference are as follows: Paul J. Furnas, Chairman; D. Herbert Way, Vice Chairman; Lindsley H. Noble, Secretary; J. Robert James, Treasurer. For further information apply to Elizabeth Ann Walter, 154 N. Fifteenth Street, Philadelphia, or to Mary J. Moon, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia.

NOTES.

THE delegates to the Earlham Conference last summer held a reunion week-end at Westtown during the holidays. At the delegation meeting it was resolved to encourage the coming Conference of Eastern Young Friends, as well as to continue the enthusiasm for Earlham Conference.

It was also resolved to support wholeheartedly the work which Frederick Libby is doing for the prevention of war.

THE annual party to fill Christmas stockings was held at Twelfth Street, Twelfth Month 21, 1922. The ex-Twelfth Street Social Committee gave us $60.00 to spend for toys, with the result that we had stockings for one hundred and seventy-seven little folks when our work was finished. Most of these went to Benezet House and to Bedford Street Mission.

ON Sixth-day, Twelfth Month 29, 1922, a Christmas party of Young Friends was held at 20 S. Twelfth Street. After a cafeteria supper, accompanied by exchange of news, the group, consisting of about one hundred and fifty young people, drew around the log fires, and several Christmas carols were sung. Then in the flicker of the firelight, and with glowing candles on window sills and mantel shelves, we listened to an inspiring Christmas message from J. Rowntree Gillett.

In the important Austrian paper, the Neue Freie Presse, there appeared recently a delightful appreciation of the late Edward Backhouse (well-known to so many in America as the Secretary of the All-Friends' Conference) and his wife, from the pen of Frau Scheu Riesz, the well-known Austrian poetess and educationist, whose husband is a prominent figure in the legal world in Vienna. Frau Scheu, it will be remembered, has closely co-operated with the relief work in Vienna and is an ardent internationalist.

FROM THE NEAR EAST.

[The following letter from Daniel Oliver to a Philadelphia Friend is dated Twelfth Month 1st, last, and has just been received First Month 9th. Withholding the name of the individual addressed, we give the letter virtually in full.—Eds.]

MY DEAR FRIEND:—

I cannot believe that thou hast forgotten us in Syria—and yet no answer comes to my letters to thee. I am writing again and will try to get my letters all through another channel in the hope that it may reach thee. I hope thou art well and still as active as ever in leading in good work to help the unfortunate, the hungry and the starving. There never was a time more than now that we needed thy help in the Near East, and I cannot believe that thou wilt fail us. I have cabled and written to THE FRIEND, and if both got through, as I hope they did, thou wilt know the position. (Both of the communications appeared in THE FRIEND last month.) I have also written by this same mail to Wilbur K. Thomas, and I am hopeful from his letter to me that he will help us also.

Wm. B. Evans and myself visited an Armenian Camp of refugees in Beyrut last week. There were 5,500 in the camp. Later 300 arrived from Mersene; 1000 were coming in from Constantinople. Before that 1500 Greeks and Armenians arrived from Constantinople but were not in the camp we visited. How can I describe to thee the impression made on us when seeing all this mass of people who had just escaped with their lives, having suffered the loss of all things, and lost many, many of their loved ones also? There was a sea of mud everywhere. Some had old tents, some had small wooden huts, others old sacks thrown over pieces of wood trying to get some protection from the pouring rains and cold winds. All seemed in rags and the friend who was taking us around (Sarraffian, himself an Armenian, who was once, years ago, a refugee, but now a merchant in Beyrut, and devoting his time and energies to helping his countrymen and women in distress) told us that one of the greatest needs was clothes and blankets. A large number are absolutely destitute, and are getting a little soup in the middle of the day. We propose, if funds are forthcoming, to bring two or three hundred families up to the mountains and get them settled in the empty houses in the villages, that is, those who are laborers or farmers. Those who are artisans and trades people, the best place for them would be the cities, such as Damascus, Homs, Hamana and Aleppo. The problem is a tremendously big one but it is largely a question of funds.

The only true solution to my mind is not to give doles of food, and have these poor people remain stranded in the camp in Beyrut, producing a kind of slums, but to get family by family on their feet, by getting them somewhere where there is some prospect they can live and earn their living. In any case, for the winter months they will have to be fed and cared for. Very few indeed can earn their living now, as there is no work to be had.

This is a most urgent cause and I appeal to thee to throw thy whole heart and soul into it. If I were at home I would give my time night and day to spreading the information and arousing interest, but we are here far away from home. We are face to face with appalling misery and need, and our ability to relieve distress depends entirely on Friends at home. For the sake of Him who died to save us all, and for the remnant of a suffering, dying nation, who have endured horrors and anguish compared to which history has no example, please do thy utmost to get funds that we may immediately step in to do something to relieve at least some hundreds of the worst cases.

There is another matter I wish to ask thy help with. We need very much a woman friend to help my wife with her side of the work, and we have thought and thought who could come and who would come. If someone would be willing to come for a year, as Wm. B. Evans did, I think, then, it is very likely she would stay longer. The interest of the work grows on one.

If thou can help us to find a suitable, capable helper for Emily Oliver, thou wilt be doing our other work here a great service.

We count on thy help, and with our united love and warm greetings, in which Wm. B. Evans joins,

I am,

Sincerely thy friend,

DANIEL OLIVER.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

BLACK AND WHITE—BOOKER WASHINGTON.

Much had happened since those far-off baby days. In the first place he had got a name! To the one name, which, like other slaves was all he possessed, he had himself added an imposing surname—a tremendous addition to his self-respect—and now he was known as Booker Washington.

In the little salt mining town of Malden, in West Virginia, to which the family had moved when they were set free, he had worked for twelve hours a day in the salt furnaces with his brother and step-father. Night after night, when he had come home to the one-roomed, tumble-down cabin, no whit better than the home of their slave days, he had sat up, long after the rest of the family were fast asleep, poring over a reading book by the glimmer of a little rush light, stumbling through the alphabet, painfully spelling out tiny words, never giving up hope.

Then one day, working in a coal mine, he had heard some men talking of a little school that had been started in Hampton, five hundred miles away, a school for Negroes, where even the poorest might get an education. Trembling with excitement where he crouched in a dark corner behind the men, he made up his mind that by hook or by crook he would get to Hampton Institute. Two more years had passed and now he was actually on his way, all his possessions in the satchel on his back.

Suddenly the coach stopped before a ramshackle, unpainted house that did duty for a wayside hotel. It was getting dark, and the travelers gladly tumbled out to the prospect of a good supper and a warm bed. When they had all gone in, the boy shyly approached the office. Already the modest store of money with which he had started was gone, but perhaps he could beg a little food and some place to shelter him for the night. The hotel-keeper had welcomed all the other travelers kindly enough.

Suddenly the man saw him. "Here! Get out of this," he exclaimed.

"I haven't got any money," the boy began, "but——"

"I don't care whether you have money or not, you can't stop here. We don't have niggers in this hotel."

The boy turned away disconsolately. But there was no bitterness in his heart, and soon the thought of his adventure drove the disappointment from his face. Seeking what shelter the hedge-rows could give him, he spent the night in walking up and down. In the morning he climbed to his place on the coach again, cold and hungry, but eager with anticipation.

Three weeks later, ragged, tired and dirty, Booker Washington knocked at the door of Hampton Institute. Walking, begging a ride, half-starved, sleeping under the boarding of a raised sidewalk, working on the quay of a river-side town in order to earn enough money to go on, he had at last arrived. That plain, three-story brick building was to him a discovered El Dorado.

Soon he found himself with a number of others of his own race standing before a lady who, he heard, was the head teacher, and who was interviewing them in turn. Presently she spoke to Washington.

"Can you pay anything towards your education?" she asked.

"No," he replied, "but I am willing to do anything to earn money for it."

The teacher looked at him keenly. She had kind eyes, but they seemed so penetrating. The boy hung his head. He knew that he must look a ne'er-do-well, dirty and unkempt, but if only he could have a chance! He looked up again. Whether it was the look in his eyes, or whatever it was, the teacher did not refuse him, but told him to wait.

It seemed to him that he waited hours. He saw many admitted and his heart sank with disappointment, others were turned away, and then he was thankful that he still had a chance left.

Presently the teacher spoke to him, "That recitation-room there needs sweeping. Take the broom and sweep it."

(To be concluded.)

TWO OF "THE LITTLE CHILDREN."

Perhaps it was these two little children that you helped with a recent gift to the work of the Friends in Russia. It is children like these that you can help at any time by contributing to that work, for they are typical of thousands of orphaned little famine victims whom the Friends' workers are laboring to serve and to save. One of the workers tells in the following words how they were discovered:—

"When I went to the door of our outpost house at 9 o'clock in the evening, to show out a village committee with which I had been in conference, I found standing there in the darkness a wee patient girl of four carrying a two-year-old brother. How long she had nursed him she did not know, nor where she had come from. She only knew that they had no longer parents or home, and the all-important fact that this distinctly heavy babe was 'my brother' and that 'my brother' was a hungry boy and liked much food, particularly bread, whereas she herself could live on grass!

"My cook and the interpreter fed them on milk and bread, while my partner in the district and I discussed who could carry the child to the only home not already overcrowded. I disapproved of his doing so, because he has not had typhus. He quite agreed with me—but insisted on carrying the child! But after a while it began to cry—and then it was quite promptly handed to me!

"Naturally it did not cease the very moment I took it, and the anxious little Mother-sister trudging along with my interpreter, demanded fiercely, 'Why do they hurt my brother?' To the assurance that we were not hurting him, she replied: 'Yes, they are, why do they make him cry, first one and then the other? Give him to me.' However, by the time this imperative little order was given, I had soothed the babe and our reputations were saved. Poor wee heroine! She is too young to lie, so I quite believe she had begged all she could for 'my brother' and eaten grass herself."

A START TOWARD A NEW LIFE.

How much and what kind of help have the refugee families who returned to devastated villages last winter received from the Friends' Mission in Poland? One of the workers on the field answers this question as follows:—

"Upon arrival the wife received a refugee ration for her family. She was given embroidery or spinning to do in order that she could earn money with which to buy food. The Mission helped her to buy such food cheaply. She was given clothes for her new-born baby. When autumn came she was given an opportunity to buy some warm clothes for a nominal sum. If any members of the family were taken down with typhus in the winter or with malaria during the summer they were aided by the Mission Nurses.

"The husband received from the Mission the loan of horses for one or two days' plowing in the spring, and had the right to borrow Mission harrows and cultivators to work the land plowed. He also received one or two poods of oats, barley and buckwheat (a pood equals 36 lbs. avoird.); three to four poods of potatoes, one kilogram of flaxseed, one-third kilogram of peas and beans, and in the late spring plants for his vegetable garden. Later in the year he received the use of horses for two more days of plowing, and from three to six poods of rye to sow. He was given an opportunity to buy a horse and one or two sheep very cheaply and to buy at a reduction price spades, hoes, scythes, sickles, saws, files, axes, glass, and some other house-fittings. Plows have been lent to him for a time, and later he will have the right to buy one.

"The refugee families are thankful for the help thus given them. It is a start toward a new life; and it is not only the material help which is of value to them, but also the encouragement which they receive—the feeling that there are those who sympathize with them in their suffering and who are really their friends."

SERVICE NOTES.

He lives in one of the villages in which the Russian Mission has been distributing food—a patriarchal old peasant. He survived the famine only by eating all his livestock and poultry. When spring came, he began to look about for means of restocking his farm. A crow built a nest on his roof. Seizing the opportunity, he borrowed two hen's eggs and put them under her, withdrew the little chicks when they hatched, and substituted two more eggs. This he continued as long as the crow could be induced to remain. Who said that the Russian peasant lacks initiative?

MANY Russian peasants last autumn dug graves in which they themselves expected later to be placed. They felt certain that the famine would bring death to them before the end of the winter. They desired to be decently buried, and knew that when the famine was at its height, those who survived would not have strength to give them a decent burial. So they dug graves for themselves in advance. How many of those graves will be used depends largely upon how much relief is sent to Russia from America this winter.

A GERMAN letterhead bearing the Service star and dated Berlin, Twelfth Month 18, 1922, contains the following message:—

"The Berlin Centre sends Christmas and New Year Greetings to their Friends in England and America."

The following signatures are attached:—Joan Mary Fry, Elizabeth Rotten, John P. Fletcher, Agnes L. Tierney, Alfred C. Garrett, Eleanor Evans Garrett, Philip C. Garrett, Carolina M. Wood, Elise H. Behrend, and Ernst Lorenz.

A CHECK for $14.25 is forwarded by a teacher in Paullina, Iowa. She writes: "$6.25 of this amount was contributed by my school of thirteen children. Instead of giving each other Christmas gifts and having an expensive party, they decided to give the money to the Russian children. It wasn't much, but with some of them it meant a real sacrifice. Our best wishes go with it. We have just succeeded in having an article about the relief work published in our town paper, and we hope to send more funds later."

THE Jamestown (North Dakota) Alert reports that Governor Nestos of that State was asked concerning the probability of holding an inaugural ball. He replied that in view of the needs of the poor in the State, and of the "distress and suffering of the starving and half-clothed women and children in Russia, Ukraine and the Near East," he believed that the people of the State would secure more real happiness out of contributing for the relief of these sufferers the money that would be spent on a ball. The Governor expressed his hope that the people would contribute still more largely to the relief organizations. The Northwest Russian Relief Committee, which has subdivisions in Minnesota, North Dakota and South Dakota, and which has received the hearty support of Governor Nestos, distributes its funds through the American Friends' Service Committee.

HOT CAKES!

This is the season for griddle-cakes and waffles. They need syrup to make them good, and you can have good, pure cane syrup in the following manner:

A Friend who manufactures such syrup has offered the American Friends' Service Committee a contribution of 100 gallons. The syrup is a golden brown and is delicious, not being refined to an insipid sweetness. It will add savor to your meals, and the price is only $1 a gallon, postpaid.

Send your order promptly, as this offer includes only 100 cans. While you are enjoying better syrup you will at the same time be helping feed hungry children abroad.

Remittances should be made to the American Friends' Service Committee, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

SHIPMENTS received during week ending First Month 6, 1923—66 boxes and packages; 2 anonymous.

Contributions received for week ending First Month 6, 1923—$14,148.65.

NO PLACE FOR DOUBT.

"Having eyes to see, they see not; having ears to hear, they hear not; neither do they understand."

Not long ago I sat in a room in our home with telephone receivers to my ears and heard a message from a man in Philadelphia. A slight adjustment of the instrument, and I heard the voice of a man in Newark, N. J. With another change I heard "Pittsburgh" talking. These messages had been sent broadcast into the air, that all who were equipped might hear.

I have at home a photograph produced by a mineral in a peculiar manner. Every precaution was taken to prevent access of "visible" light. Yet the images of a key and a coin are perfectly clear and distinct. The source of the light was a mineral, absolutely invisible in the dark room where the photograph was made. It is a light that is readily detected by a properly "sensitized" medium.

Such facts as these can but convince us that there are phenomena in the physical world about us which "Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard." Yet there are those who even in the presence of such facts remain incredulous and we marvel at their doubts. We say it is folly to deny the existence of such "sights and sounds." It is likewise folly if any of us doubt the spiritual sights and sounds which our Heavenly Father grants to those whose souls have craved that their eyes might be opened to see Him in the beauty of His holiness, that their ears might be opened to hear as Moses heard by the burning bush in the wilderness, as the child Samuel heard in the temple, as George Fox and hosts of others have heard Christ Jesus speaking "to their condition."

I have a friend, who hears the human voice without difficulty, yet he never heard a cricket make a sound. He does not deny the occurrence of such sounds. Helen Keller neither hears nor sees, yet she is keenly sensitive to beauty of form and sound as revealed to her through her highly "sensitized" fingers.

There is no place for doubt in the face of all these things. Through all the ages God has touched the souls of men. His opening of the spiritual eyes has been quite as real as was the touch of Christ for the blind Bartimæus. His strengthening of our feeble and halting and faulty walk through life is just as vitally necessary and real as was our Saviour's healing touch for the palsied man of Galilee.

Great as is our spiritual debt to our Heavenly Father for the vision and guiding voice to which He has sensitized and attuned us, we can look forward with confidence to greater blessings from Him. His promises are sure. We can count upon their fulfilment. We can "speak that we do know,—that which our eyes have seen, that which we have heard, and our hands have handled of the word of life." And we can gladly believe that "Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man to conceive the things which God has prepared for those who love Him and His appearing."

Let us go forward with joy and confidence in Him who has been the Author, and who will be the Finisher and the Rewarder of our faith.

CHAS. W. PALMER.

FORTY-SECOND ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOARD OF MANAGERS OF THE FRIENDS' INSTITUTE, 1921-1922.

The Institute has been a busy place during the past year. The activities of the American Friends' Service Committee are continuing with more volume than is generally realized. The service of our little building, here at Twelfth Street, is known of in the wide field of many countries. The home department of this work has been organized during the year. This endeavors to interest the young people in giving a year of service to some home charitable organization or international work. The Message Committee has been formed during the year, also, endeavoring to carry to Europe something of the message of the Society of Friends.

The Young Friends' work has developed nicely during the year. Meetings have been held with an attendance of about 150 young people at Thanksgiving time and Christmas vacation, when we served supper and had an evening address here at the Meeting House. Besides these, a meeting for worship was held the First-day before Yearly Meeting week, attended by about 350 Young Friends. A camp supper was held later in the spring, at Crum Creek, after which Rufus Jones spoke to the company. We were thankful to have William Littleboy in our midst last winter. His itinerary was largely in the hands of the Young Friends' Committee, and their Secretary was glad of the opportunity of visiting Young Friends' groups, in different neighborhoods, as they were called together to meet him. She also spent a week-end in New England, visiting Mount Holyoke and Wellesley Colleges, meeting with the Young Friends' groups there and helping them feel the strength of the Young Friends at home. Three visits were planned from this office to the students at State College, two of them being made by Young Friends. The Mission Committee held several small supper meetings, addressed by returned workers. The Young Friends' Numbers of THE FRIEND are still edited from this office. During the summer, the delegates to the Richmond Conference were looked after. The Young Friends co-operated in getting up a neighborhood conference held at Birmingham.

The correspondence which comes to the office is interesting and varied. We are very glad that the Richmond Young Friends' office keeps us in touch with Western Young Friends studying or working in the city. We have had requests from an Austrian wanting to get in touch with Friends in his native country, to which he is about to return. A letter came from Australia asking our co-operation in work for universal peace. A girl in the Y. W. C. A. in China, wrote asking for information about Friends' doctrines. There have been several inquiries from people coming to the office wanting to know more of Friends' beliefs. Numerous visitors from a distance have asked to see our Meeting House; in some cases they have been Friends and in other cases descended from Friends, and in one case they were two young Catholic boys, who had read much about Friends.

There have been over 10,000 visitors to our rooms, and 283 Committees have held meetings during the year. It has been difficult, at times, to accommodate our Committees as satisfactorily as we should like. We feel thankful for the co-operation which has enabled us to make the most of our rooms.

We feel that the Institute is furthering a real need in our Society, and we appreciate the loyal support of its friends.

On behalf of the Board of Managers,

MARY J. MOON.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

ONE of the leading editorials in the Philadelphia Public Ledger for First Month 4th is given below. We welcome most warmly all such expressions. That the sentiments herein contained should reach the thousands of readers of the Ledger is cause for thankfulness. Again in the Ledger of the eighth appeared over the signatures of two of our own members a brief message of appreciation:—

AGAINST WAR.

Leaders of men and of callings in New York have issued an appeal to their countrymen to side with them in declaring and working against that state of mind which leads to war.

To get rid of war there must be a public opinion in all lands determined that war, with its imagined glories and its hideous reality of carnage, shall cease to be. The present appeal is clearly and simply put. There are many on earth who were not sufficiently lessoned by the recent four years of abomination that swept in the whole of the world directly or indirectly. They have not felt the weight of the suffering of non-combatants during and since the active hostilities.

If mankind, after nineteen centuries of the Christian gospel and ages of piety that never knew a creed or any sectarian confines, still wants massacre instead of justice and charity and gentleness, the voice of mankind will so pronounce and decide. If lawlessness is desired and not law: if vagrancy is preferred to labor; if insolvency is to supplant credit; if brute violence is to prevail over morality and peace; if misery for one and all shall replace tranquility and happiness—then let those eager for battle have their way. But that is not the choice of the sometimes forgotten and often inarticulate millions. It is the way of selfish politicians and demagogues not entitled to their will.

One declaration of citizens, however thoughtful, however eloquent, will not turn the scales in a right decision. But many such protests have a cumulative force that must be heard above official arrogance, the rattle of the sabre or the clang of the iron heel. A warless earth may seem a millennial dream in our time, but it must come, and it is an aspiration to be cherished till the dawn of peace.

WORLD'S PEOPLE WANT PEACE.

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

The Young Friends' Committee of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends desires to express its hearty approval of the editorial "Against War" which appeared in the Public Ledger of the fourth.

It seems that at last the vox populi is beginning to be heard with ever-increasing strength amid the din of strife. The peoples of the world want peace—they are longing for it. But how shall their longing be made known one to another unless some organ give it voice?

What is better able to do this than the press? We are, therefore, more than glad to see that the Public Ledger is fulfilling its vocation, and we would encourage you to continue this work, so that the millennial dream, which you rightly say "must come," will come more quickly.

With you we cherish this aspiration and would add our voice to the universal call for peace.

SIDNEY O. NICHOLSON.

Chairman Philadelphia Young Friends' Committee.
PHILADELPHIA, First Month 8th, 1923.

GET RID OF THE "WAR MIND."

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

It is our duty no less than our pleasure to endorse most cordially the editorial "Against War" in this morning's Public Ledger.

We must, one and all, get rid of the "war mind." We must cease to take counsel of fear and suspicion and must trust in the strength of those spiritual forces which should be the moving power of a Christian nation.

All preparation for so-called defence by great guns, poison gas and the "horrid engines" of war should be condemned by our churches, by our legislators and by all the moral agencies of our people. Let us cultivate in all our relations, social and political, that spirit which is from Christ Jesus, our Redeemer, and which alone "will save the sanctities of life and sweeten the bitterness of human passion."

On behalf of the Representative Meeting,

GEORGE M. WARNER, Clerk,
WILLIAM B. HARVEY, Secretary.

PHILADELPHIA, First Month 4, 1923.

In a recent letter from Agnes Tierney we read:—

"I must speak of the importance here at this time of having plenty of Quaker literature. Used as I was to the difficulties of getting any thing serious read at home, I was unprepared for the hunger and thirst here for solid reading. It seems to me that for the spread of Quaker ideals, furnishing literature is really the important work.

"If we could quickly get into all the universities a shelf of our best Quaker literature it would probably be much used. I say 'quickly' because of course the interest has been aroused by the feeding, and again because so little new literature comes into Germany now. I pay 350 marks each day for my lunch. That is a trifle over four cents. Think how many meals it would cost a German professor to subscribe to the Atlantic Monthly. The majority of them can't pay 350 marks for a meal—far from it.

"If there is any way in which you could get doctors to send their literature here it would be a wonderful thing. The doctors cannot possibly afford to subscribe to foreign periodicals. Gilbert McMaster tore a leaf out of the Survey giving tuberculosis statistics of New York and addressed it to Dr. Rost. He got an affecting letter of thanks from the medical head of all Germany saying how much it meant to them to have a report like that."

PART I of the new London Book of Discipline can not be referred to too often. Joan M. Fry, in a letter to Berlin, writes. "Our Study Circle is of great value to us all, and is slowly growing in size. We are working at a translation of the new Book of Discipline. Ernest Lorenz first makes what seems to me a very good translation; he reads this aloud, and as many of us follow in the English as our books allow. Then comes the most lively discussion, for we are intensely particular to get the right word, and it is delightful to see the eagerness with which we all search, and we are not all by any means of the learned classes. With very few exceptions every one takes some part, and there is much divergence of opinion, much seeking for the real meaning in both English and German, and thereby a very deep appreciation of what is contained in the matter read. But what pleases me most of all is when, after much discussion, we arrive at some solution that satisfies us, and the light that comes over the faces in the circle is a real joy to see."

SHARING THE GOOD WORD.

We like to share good news and especially when the news is fresh. News about well-being, happiness, and health never really grows stale if it is true. Mere matters of fact lose their interest, whatever anyone learns about the way to prosper and succeed never becomes old so long as it proves true.

One of the earliest secrets of civilized man was that the outside affairs of people can often be improved best from the inside, or the spirit. We have noticed so often that if we improve the spirit we improve the whole tone of the man. One of the sure methods of physicians, teachers, business managers and politicians is to stimulate courage. If people feel right inside, clean, fearless, hopeful, the outer performance goes better. That is why religion of the right sort is so full of energy, such a blessing to sincere people.

We believe that inside the universe, as inside men, there is a spirit that is the real universe just as it is the real man. And we believe that this spirit of the universe, the real, eternal quality of it is God. The spirit of man is the lesser spirit, or child, of the spirit of God and is doubly so when the relationship is made firm by consent. The way in which child and father come into touch with each other is variously called, prayer, communion, &c. Real religion is a relationship of harmony, or obedience, between the child and the Heavenly Father. It seems the simplest thing in the world to say that this is what ought to be, all the time. We know that there are many practical hindrances, arising chiefly out of selfishness and short-sightedness.

Friendly interest in each other's welfare is a great help. We can help one another to improve, where we are short-sighted, and to quit our old selfishness. Finally advice, even if it is open criticism, ought not to be misunderstood. One can often do more work in company with workers who are doing the same kind of work because one draws from the experience and stimulation of more than just the self.

It is the same in the art of living as the children of one Heavenly Father. When we lend help by advice, or example, by courage, or a brotherly word, we are ministering to each other and this ministry, back and forth, is good for us. Whenever one receives one ought to give. In the give and take of such living all grow better and no one worse. It is a kind of riches that increases as it spreads so that no one is ever poorer for being generous. One may feel that there is very little to give, but still the little ought to be given in the right spirit. It is all right to be modest in our estimate of ourselves so long as it does not prevent us from doing something. Of course when one person is more skilful, wise, rich, and willing it is natural to look to such to give while we are satisfied to be receivers. But that will not help on the spirit that we need. Let the rich give abundantly, but let each one of us give all we can and then it will be better for us all.

Now all this applies to Christian ministry which we regard not as a specialized profession, but as a widespread responsibility. The whole fellowship of human beings owes ministry, each member to the other. We can see better how this works by taking a smaller group, say a meeting of people who know each other. There will doubtless be some one person, man or woman in the group, who is especially successful in drawing the thoughts of the others to the best thing. Such a person helps us to purer thinking and living. We may nominate such a person as the most helpful person we know. He may be a minister. Certainly if a number of people believe the same way about it he is likely to be so considered whether formally appointed or not. We may be so fortunate as to know five or six similar persons who do us good morally or religiously. We may believe that God is using such agents to make his meaning plainer to our lives. This is a sacred matter because it affects the deepest and most sacred realities of our natures. When people are so stirred and helped they qualify for the best kind of life there is here or elsewhere.

It warms the heart to realize these good possibilities which God has provided. And when we are convinced of them we want to share them and even talk about them. It doesn't seem like professionalism, or cant, but follows naturally from gratitude and the facts. Life would be ever so much more worth while if we recognized these good facts completely and spoke of them oftener. This is the divine instinct of ministry, not to let good and truth dry up and wither away, but to keep them among the live concerns of our daily experience. Let us keep them there by doing them and by speaking of them. Speaking helps make doing plainer and doing justifies talk. So in this broad sense we are all ministers if we seek, by doing and speaking, to make the good prevail in our lives. Each clean stroke of effort to be good helps other people in their battle against evil. Nothing succeeds like success they say. Nothing goes better than goodness when this spirit is with it.

We point with gratitude to the greatest minister the world has known, the Savior, our Lord Jesus Christ. He by both word and deed made all this plain. He gave himself completely for this, even to the death, that He might shake men out of their sleep and madness and bring them, humble and sorry for their sins, back to an understanding of the blessed God. This was the greatest news ever known, that the family relation might be restored and that mankind might live on the bright side in the light and love of the Heavenly Father.

There are a great many different ways of saying these truths and there are even more ways of acting them out, and the more earnestly and sweetly we go about it the more real life there will be for all of us. And no one will be any more glad than God himself. By paying attention to these things and keeping each other reminded of them we are doing a great service. Some can do a little of it and some more, but all ought to keep at it. This is ministry. It does not depend on college degrees, or sex, or race, or age, but on the success with which the Spirit of God joins with the spirit of man, redeeming, making greater, and making eloquent, in speech and actions.

We are social beings, made to be so, and we realize the best character by social methods. That is why the give and take of life, and ministry as one of the finest forms of it, can do so much for us. No one is infallible, we make many mistakes, but the illumination of the Spirit in experience, our own and other people's experience, will correct us. Ministry is not an exhibition of any one's superiority, but the following of a law, natural to social beings. If any one shuts up the fountain of his giving forth he is likely to be choked in his receiving. We keep alive in the great life God gives us by keeping the circulation good, the giving and taking of spiritual nourishment which God has ordained through human experience.

All that has been said applies to our daily course. But suppose that we gather in a meeting with a desire to honor God and to deepen our lives, may not these same facts be effectively true there? Surely if God wished to meet the needs of such feeble folk, gathered in simple earnest devotion, He can and will. It may come about by deep stirring and revealing of the mood of each one in the quiet meeting, or it may be by disclosures which shall come to us by the voice of one, or several, in our number. We have so many self-directed enterprises that we like to gather once and again and submit our reverent assembly to the democracy of the Spirit common to us all. We have many occasions for instruction, lecture, and discussion, but we like to reserve a stated meeting for searching what the Spirit of God may have for us, without too much program and fore-determination.

In the Far East.

William C. Allen.

THE NATIVE PEOPLES OF JAVA.

One cannot tell about "the people" of Java—one must write about "the peoples" of Java. It is an exceedingly complex subject. The country includes many races. Broadly speaking, the principal objects of my observation included the Dutch, Malays, Javanese and Chinese.

The wise statesmen of Holland made a very good bargain when they accepted the island in an international "settlement" many years ago. They have wonderfully developed it since that time. Of course they have exploited it—as an American sea-captain once remarked to me about "our possessions": "What are colonies for if you don't make money out of them?" It seems to me that in the main the Dutch have administered the government very well. There are beautiful roads and an excellent railway service over the country. I did not see any personal abuse of the humbler folks of color by the white people. Law and justice apparently prevail. There are no indications of extreme poverty, of suffering, such as are witnessed in most countries of the Far East. The peoples of Java generally look well-nourished and appear to have all the clothing that their hot climate demands.

The Javanese are the descendants of the original races, as far as history reveals. They are small in stature, slight of build, seldom do you see a stout person among them. They have jet-black hair. Some of the little women are very pretty, with flashing eyes and splendid carriage, as they walk under their gay parasols dressed in the brilliant tints of the land. The men are more lazy in their movements. Should I criticize them? Suppose my ancestors had for centuries lived in a climate where the temperature kept close to ninety degrees, day and night, throughout the year? Yet they are a merry lot. Apparently they enjoy their short lives to the full—possibly more than do our money-grabbing, care-ridden, over-dressed, over-eating white people.

The heart of ancient Javanese life throbs about the quaint old city of Djokja. Here are made the exquisite cloths, and brass and metal-work, that are famous as fabrics and curios throughout the souvenir-loving world. Here still reigns the Sultan over millions of his people. Do we say "reigns?" Yes, and no! This native potentate maintains somewhat of the glories of the past with modern "improvements;" but, whilst he is still accorded many rights as to the interior administration of his kingdom, his kind Dutch friends appoint for him from Holland an "Adviser," who sees that political affairs run smoothly on their own behalf. In doing so they doubtless contribute to the peace and happiness of the native population as well as to their own comfort and safety.

When in Djokja our missionary friends secured for us permits to visit the Sultan's palace. This covers many acres and in reality is a compound wherein are many buildings. There are 15,000 residents in the palace, including servants, and their families, and servants' servants to the last degree. Leaving our carriages at the entrance we walked through the principal gateway and were obliged to sit there on a narrow board seat for almost one hour whilst waiting for our official guide. Finally he appeared, resplendent in military costume, decorated with green epaulets and cap, and wearing a long sword. One of the first sights was a structure about fifty by fifty feet in size, under which the Sultans used to sit to administer such justice—or possibly sometimes injustice—as suited the imperial fancy. Close by, in plain sight, so that no mistakes could be made as to the punishment meted out to offenders, was the wall where executions took place. Whilst here, at one corner of the building, we saw a high official sitting on the floor with a few attendants about him. He was most polite and affable to two of our party as he talked with them and gently caressed his toes whilst doing so. When we approached the private apartments of his majesty our guide, with reverential manner and subdued voice, told us of the uses to which were applied the surrounding reception halls and verandahs, all open to the air. The ceilings were of varied bright colors, the rows of big European arm-chairs looked strangely incongruous amidst the Oriental scene. At this juncture a group of fifteen young girls—princesses and children of the Sultan—crowded at one end of a porch behind the lattice-work and with jolly talk and gesture commented upon us. They had come down to see the strangers. Who most enjoyed the mutual investigation it would be difficult to tell. The Sultan has numerous wives and many children.

When we left the sacred precincts and reached the houses containing the transportation facilities of royalty our guide became very cheerful. He blithely discoursed on the difference between the royal antiques and the royal motor cars. With much gusto he expatiated on the big carved gilt chair used by the Sultan, placed atop of enormous poles, and carried by forty men. No less interesting were the brides' chairs used by the new wives of the Sultan when they became the latest addition to his extensive matrimonial outfit. They, too, were golden. As we wandered through this building several of the attendants commenced to burn incense in little ovens under or near the chairs. This was to counteract the profane and dangerous effect of a visit from the unbelievers—let us trust it did so!

The Malays are not so good-looking as the Javanese—possibly they are not of quite the same mentality—they are a careless, indolent, passionate race. Yet somehow I like the Malays, probably because they are fearfully aggravating when, with the greatest innocence, they seem to do everything amiss. They are the servants everywhere. They are not strong physically. I have seen three of them pant for breath, in an agony of exhaustion, as they pushed and pulled an ordinary trunk up the steps at a ship-side. One American porter would move more quickly and easily handle the load. They were to be pitied—not condemned.

The Chinese are a very important factor in the life of Java. They are always in evidence. Although their features are easily distinguished, and though they mostly wear the national garb of China, they have lost their mother-tongue and speak

Malay or Dutch. They are the merchants of the country. They are not afraid of heat, dirt or labor. Many of them have become very wealthy. Some of the finest residences of Java are owned by their prosperous business men. Their financial operations extend throughout the Far East, to Europe and America. Yet these people of invincible courage in trade, of gifts for organization, of possibilities in culture, are not permitted to live just as they desire. Two centuries ago some Chinese were implicated in an insurrection against the rule of Holland, and since that time have, as punishment for the mistakes of their predecessors, been segregated. Yet the Chinese quarters of the Javanese cities are in some respects the most interesting of all.

The poorer folk of Java live out-of-doors most of the time. They buy their morning meal from the itinerant food-seller in market-place or highway and cook their evening meal at home. What we thoughtlessly waste at a modest American repast would seem to them fit dainties for a king.

The sarong is the national garment of the native races of Java. It is made of "battak." It consists of a single piece of fine cotton cloth, about forty-two by ninety inches. The process of manufacture is peculiar. Up little streets, away from the bustle of the outside world, you enter a battak establishment where a few women toil all day as they sit upon the ground. They draw the weird, strange designs on the cloth and patiently cover with wax the parts they wish to protect from the dye into which they dip the fabric. Then the wax is removed and the process is applied to another color. Thus gradually are evolved some of the most beautiful and striking patterns in the world. The blaze of colors are so harmoniously blended as to make a perfect tone such as only an Oriental can create. The varieties of battak are infinite in use and decoration. Men and women wrap the sarongs around their slender forms, from the waist down, and tuck in the corners to hold them in place. Clad in glowing or softer tints, with smaller pieces deftly folded round their heads in turban-fashion, millions of the Java people fairly illuminate the lovely landscape, and city walks, with the vivid beauty of their garments.

And how—with all their natural indolence—these different peoples are oftentimes compelled to work. You behold them in the sugar-cane fields toiling in the sticky earth under the fiery blaze of the overhead sun. You see whole families wading in the waters of the rice paddies, with ever-bending backs, as they plant each little wisp of rice in regular rows in the muddy bottoms. The father of the family receives for farm labor a daily wage of about twenty cents in American money, the mother—with maybe a baby strapped to her back—about twelve cents, whilst the children add their share of effort and receive nothing. You white people who love sugar and rice, and feel they cost too much, think of this paltry pay for toilsome service! Our obligations to struggling humanity are very great, the wide-world over!

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

BLACK AND WHITE—BOOKER WASHINGTON.

The boy picked up the broom eagerly and went to his task. This was his chance, he felt sure. How thankful he was that for more than a year he had been house-boy with the strictest and most thorough mistress in Malden. He knew how the work had to be done. Three times he swept the room out, then four times he dusted it, walls, benches, tables, desks, every corner, every place where there could possibly be any dust. Then he reported himself to the teacher. Immediately she got up to inspect his work. She felt the rungs of the chairs, and the tops of the pictures, she ran her finger along the wainscot. Yes, he thought, she must be a lady from the North like his old mistress, she knew where to look for the dirt. But he had made sure that there was no dirt to be found.

At last the teacher turned to him and said quietly, "I guess you will do to enter this Institution." Tears stood in the boy's eyes and he trembled with excitement.

"You shall have the post of porter," she said, "and that will help you to pay part of your board and tuition. It will be hard work, though. You will have to get up very early, and you won't have as much time for study as some of the others."

But to Washington these were trifles. The only thing that mattered was that he had been admitted to Hampton Institute.

The next morning, with the other new students, he went to see the Principal. He had heard of General Armstrong who had fought in the war against the South, and who was now helping the Negroes to become educated, and he was rather nervous at the thought of meeting him. But when his turn came, he found himself in the presence of a big, broad-shouldered man, with fair hair, keen blue eyes and a kindly smile, who took him by the hand and spoke encouragingly to him. If ever the Negro boy had felt any bitterness against the white race, it melted before those smiling eyes.

The great hall was packed with people to its utmost limit. It was the opening day of the great Cotton States Exhibition at Atlanta, Ninth Month 18, 1895, and an event of unusual importance was to take place. For the first time in the history of the Southern States a Negro had been asked to speak from the same platform as white men and women at a public national gathering. The speaker was to be Booker Washington, the most brilliant graduate of Hampton Institute, and for fourteen years the Principal of the Tuskegee Normal Institute in Alabama, a man who thirty years before had been a slave.

One or two speeches were delivered and then the chairman called on "Professor Booker T. Washington." A tall, bronze-colored Negro rose and walked to the edge of the platform. There was a roar of applause from the colored people and faint cheers from the whites. Straight and sinewy he stood, high forehead, piercing eyes and strong mouth, the justification of his oppressed race, the slave who had made good!

What would he have to say? In a hush of absolute silence he began to speak. He had only spoken for a few minutes when a tremor of excitement ran through the audience. This was no counsel of despair or hatred or revenge that he was giving them, no clamor for his people's rights, no denunciation of their wrongs. It was an appeal for friendship and love. "To my own people I say, make friends in every manly way, with the people of all races by whom we are surrounded. The Negro is given a man's chance in the commercial world. To the people of the white race I say, too, extend the hand of friendship to the eight millions of Negroes whose habits you know. As we have proved our loyalty to you in the past, in nursing your children, watching by the sick-bed of your mothers and fathers, and often following them with tear-dimmed eyes to their graves, so in the future we shall stand by you with a devotion that no foreigner can approach."

The audience leaped to its feet in a wild burst of applause, white men and women of the South cheering as loudly as any of the colored people. Tears ran down the faces of many of the older people, as their thoughts carried them back beyond the years of racial strife to the memory of some loved master or mistress or some devoted slave. The westerling sun blazed in Washington's face till his eyes glowed as those of a prophet. He brought his words to an end. "Blot out enmities and suspicions of race," he cried. "This, this will bring into our beloved South a new heaven and a new earth."

He stopped, and a roar of applause surged to the roof. The chairman, who was the Governor of the State, leaped to his feet, and crossing the platform seized Washington's hand. So they stood before them all, the leaders of their races, with hands clasped.

The slave had had his revenge!

It is poor policy to join more societies or movements than one can actively support. It is better to be a live member of one organization than dead wood in several.

ON THE WATERS.

Our acquaintance had been very slight, off in '18 when we met. When I was sent down to investigate conditions in Normandy I had taken a chambre meuble in a big old Norman house, built like all Norman houses, round a court-yard, and sheltering many families. The two big front rooms directly on the street were taken up by a music-store; my room was immediately above. As I came and went I was forever running into the friendly little man with the bald head who was the proprietor of the store, and his smiling wife; and I never passed the door without a greeting from Louise, the slender young lady with massed black hair, who acted as clerk.

From the beginning our relations were cordial, but in no way intimate. I made a happy impression upon Madame one day by giving her part of a packet of corn-starch from one of my home bundles, thus making it possible for her to supply her soldier son on his "permission," with chocolate pudding; and one day Louise brought me a rose. But that was the extent of our interchange until, months later, I went to say good-bye, just before leaving for the Verdun-area.

In that last interview I made a great discovery. This little group were all internationalists, all filled with enthusiasm at President Wilson's vision of a better world, all realized clearly that the war was the result of a lack of international law, and that no one group could be held responsible. It was a very great discovery; the first of the kind that I had made in France.

So after my departure post-cards came and went, and at the signing of the Versailles Treaty came a letter from Louise, condemning the policy of the Allies, and lamenting that the lofty hopes of the days of the Armistice had come to nothing. It was a wonderful letter from every point of view, doubly wonderful considering that it came from a young working-girl in a provincial French town, in one of the most reactionary sections of France. I translated the letter and sent it to The World To-morrow and The World To-morrow gladly printed it.

In 1921 I was back in France, and this time I found myself among the little group at the music shop as an old and confidential friend. It was one evening as we dined together in the little salon behind the music-shop that I told about the Quakers and for what they stood. They had never heard of them before and listened with amazement. I was sitting beside the proprietor of the music-shop. Beside me sat Louise, and Madame emerging from the kitchen with a tureen of steaming soup, stood with it in her hands, intently listening.

Anne was there, my traveling companion, and a young demobilized soldier with a grave and thoughtful face.

They heard me through. Then the older man rose from his place and took a volume of an encyclopedia from a book-case. "Quaker," he said, or rather, as the French say it, "Quaw-care," and he opened at the short paragraph which the word headed.

He read it through while we all listened. There was a space of silence. Then the old man spoke with conviction:

"I am a Quaker," he said.

"I am a Quaker," Madame echoed putting the tureen on the table.

"I am a Quaker," Louise said.

And the young soldier with his eyes full of memories of the battlefield said solemnly, "I am a Quaker."

We all sat silent for a while. Then we ate the soup.

It was only an expression of sympathy, of course, but two days ago I received the following letter from Louise:

"I have already spoken to you, of a young friend of mine who is very intelligent, while he is a convinced Catholic, and for that reason a narrow nationalist. I have undertaken his conversion, very gently, without his even suspecting my motives, and I have succeeded beyond my hopes. I taught him to know and to love the Quakers by lending him all the books that I possessed, thus helping him to compare their lofty and humanitarian philosophy with that to which he had been educated. Now since his eyes have been opened, now that his horizon has been broadened, he is eager to be united with them. He has written to them and explained the aspiration of his soul, and they have begged him to come and see them. This he expects to do.

"I must tell you of his first effort, which does him great honor, as you will see. I had received from the Quakers with their bulletin certain leaflets concerning the children of Poland. These I gave to my friends, including him among the number. With the help of this pamphlet he made a collection among his comrades and succeeded in raising fifty francs, which he at once forwarded. It is not the small sum of money that counts, I think, but the effort, for my young friend is only twenty years old, and we all know how little young people are apt to consider anything but their own pleasure."

After all, is there not another France than that which Clemenceau represents?

Glimpses of Iowa and Iowa Yearly Meeting.

When the meeting again assembled in the afternoon the men's side was organized for the transaction of business by the continuance of William P. Young as clerk and Lewis L. Rockwell as assistant.

Without referring to the particular sitting that engaged them, the following matters of business were of especial interest to the visitor. What is commonly referred to as "the state of Society," was considered through the reading and answering of the thirteen Queries of the Iowa Book of Discipline. The general tenor of these was about as obtains elsewhere among Friends who retain this method of endeavoring to come to a realization of the religious life of the church. Real simplicity in dress and manner of living is a marked feature of Iowa Friends as contrasted with bodies bearing the name who live nearer to older communities, where greater wealth and the usual distracting influences of urban life abound. Two of the Queries refer, though rather indirectly, to the numerical strength of the Yearly Meeting in several particulars. Thus it appears there are at present 199 families, 229 parts of families, and 223 children of school age. In all these particulars the figures given indicate a favorable increase over the preceding year. Within the meeting there are fifty-six Elders and ten recorded Ministers. It was upon this last feature that the visitor could not suppress a secret prayer that "the Lord of the harvest would send more laborers into his harvest field."

The subject of education received close attention in the meeting through the annual report of the Boarding School and Educational Committee. As in other places, the strong and effective competition of the Public School system, arising out of its convenience and superior equipment, has made the continuance of the primary schools of the Yearly Meeting increasingly difficult. As a result, about half of its children are being educated in the public schools. The term Boarding School has reference to that established a number of years ago at Hickory Grove, near West Branch, largely through a fund contributed by the late Joseph Scattergood, Sr., of Philadelphia. This school has languished through both lack of funds and patronage. Its graduates not being accredited to higher institutions of learning, is a deterrent factor to both parents and teachers, of which the remedy would seem to lie in the direction of endeavoring to secure increased attendance until the overhead charges are more nearly met by the tuition fees, and by following this, or carrying along with it, a strenuous effort to increase the endowment for helping to carry the fixed charges and raise the standard of instruction, so that it and the other advantages of the school may draw patronage. The Yearly Meeting needs the school to quicken its pulse along just the lines for which such a school should stand, and of which Westtown, for Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and Barnesville, for Ohio, are outstanding examples. Westtown and Barnesville are both too remote to serve the purpose (by reason of the cost of reaching them and of attendance thereat), for which we believe the Scattergood School should be made to stand. A good beginning has already been made on this suggested line through the organization known as the Scattergood Association, made up of graduates and active young people of the Yearly Meeting who have the cause at heart. A meeting of this association, held on an evening, was one of the features of the week of Yearly Meeting. The house was filled with interested Friends who listened to a literary program of essays and recitations given by pupils of the school in a very creditable manner. An address was also given by a visiting Friend, who used as his subject,—"Present-day Opportunities in the Society of Friends."

Without attempting to portray all the business that claimed the attention of the Yearly Meeting, which made it worth the while, and held the devoted interest of the membership throughout, we reach the end of the calendar week, when Friends are ready for a respite from the exactions of business and committee sittings, and look to the two meetings for worship held on First-day as seasons of expected spiritual exaltation and refreshment; and this not for themselves alone, but for the general public of the neighborhood. On both occasions the house was filled nearly to its utmost capacity; both were blessed with our accepted evidences of the Divine Master in the midst—devotional silence, a full, deep flow of Gospel ministry, tendering of hearts, eyes bedewed with tears, solid behavior, and maintained interest to the end. Who that was there can forget the picture! Mothers with their babes in arm, little children whose faces betrayed not physical weariness, but the solemnizing effect, as it were, of that same Presence who in the long distant past took the little ones in his arms and blessed them. Youth was there, with its hopeful outlook upon life; vigorous manhood, too busy, perhaps, with its worldly affairs, in general, but now undergoing the baptism of the spirit and, if we judge aright, the man was there whose intellect had thus far warded off the visitations of Divine grace to find his soul tossed amid the darkness of unbelief. At the close of the morning meeting all were invited to remain and partake of the meal provided in the dining-room and rooms of the adjoining school-house. This extension to the neighborhood of the social as well as religious privileges of the occasion seemed to make it a very agape of Christian fellowship.

Second-day morning came with the knowledge that it was to be the last day of the spiritual feast. With dignity and despatch the several remaining items of business claiming the attention of men's meeting were transacted. In much tenderness of feeling a reminder was spoken by one to his fellow members, that in all probability there were those present who would not be on earth by the time of another Yearly Meeting; hence, may all be found "with their lamps trimmed and burning, awaiting the coming of the Lord."

The shutters were now raised, revealing women's meeting in readiness to join in the concluding business. This consisted of the reading and endorsement of the epistles addressed to the several Yearly Meetings with which Iowa is in regular correspondence, a reply to the one received from Friends in Germany, and, certainly of deepest interest to the Friend from Philadelphia, an affectionate, full and lively response to that from his own Yearly Meeting. Minutes of return for the three visiting ministers were also read and approved; these were couched in language that bore the stamp of more than formal courtesy; more than that, they portrayed the winning influence of that Power which, let us believe, at the present day is working to bring again those who bear the name of Friend everywhere into that blessed fellowship of the Gospel, wherein we can truly say,—“One is our Master, even Christ Jesus.”

A minute of exercise, embracing some of the leading features which had characterized the meeting during its several sittings, was read, reviving many occasions when the spiritual pulse quickened, and heart answered heart in closer Christian fellowship.

A recent rule of the Yearly Meeting provided for the holding of its sessions alternately at Whittier and Paulina, but this year in obedience to a request from West Branch Friends it was adjourned to meet there the coming year.

Though the week had been so full of religious engagement, and three meetings for worship in its course had been held, it was felt by some that an especial opportunity of the kind should be given for the youth. This was held the evening after the adjournment of the Yearly Meeting, and proved to be a season of uplift, care being taken in the seating of the meeting that even this particular should be a reminder of its object.

In the crisp air of the following morning we bade farewell to the little white meeting house seated in its neighborhood of hospitable homes, with its outlook upon country that less than fifty years ago was one vast sweep of untilled prairie. Not to one only, we feel assured, had the days spent there been as a tarriance on the "Mount," where we had seen the Saviour glorified, and through the uplifting sense of that experience could use the words: "It was good to have been there."

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

FLORENCE TRUEBLOOD STEERE.

JAPAN.

We are constantly blundering internationally. When one thinks of the decision of the Supreme Court on Eleventh Month 13th, that no Japanese may become a United States citizen, one wonders sometimes how Japan can feel as kindly toward this country as she seems to.

Is it fair to allow black people from Africa to become citizens and then after complimenting the Japanese on their "culture and enlightenment" say that it is the purpose of Congress "to confer the privilege of citizenship upon that class of persons whom the fathers knew as white and to deny it to all who could not be so classified?"

The heart grows sick with forebodings at the thought of the seeds of international discord that we are sowing in our attitude toward Japan.

Thank God for Gilbert Bowles and his Quaker idealism, but what can a handful of men like him do to counteract the spirit of nationalism which those of the East must read into the press messages of this country?

Are we who profess with our lips the belief that God "hath made of one blood all nations of men," teaching our young people to believe that opportunity for all alike and beyond the nation is a greater grouping of the world?

JAPAN, in returning Shantung, has indeed shown a truly international spirit. A recent editorial in The Times says, "The only real pressure brought to bear upon Japan was moral: in creating this power the church in America played an important part."

Dr. Gulick is again in Japan speaking daily. Such men as he and Fred B. Smith are cementing the bonds of Christian friendship between the two nations.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, in a sermon in the cathedral of Geneva on the eve of the opening of the assembly of the League of Nations, said:—

"There is in the peoples of Europe to-day, for all their divergences and strifes, a higher level of average knowledge and intelligence. A better understanding—I will not say of one another, but about one another—is beginning to prevail. There is a little, just a little, less class ignorance in one country of what people say and think in other countries. That elementary knowledge is the outcome in part of the Great War itself. The soil has been upturned. Right seed rightly sown could grow now more readily than ever before, and a common currency of thought, though not yet of opinion, is beginning surely to be perceptible.

"The hour is ripe for the husbandry of a League of Nations—ripe for the sowing and then for the growth of popular thoughts unattainable before.

"The League reaches far beyond national patriotism, though it embraces and ennobles it. We are set upon realizing in actual fact or fulfilment among men an ideal of righteous governance by common consent for the common good.

"And meantime we may surely say that militarism has fashioned its own coffin. We are here to clinch the nails. Every thinking man who is worthy of the name, whatever his creed, whatever his nationality, is with us in the resolve. Civilized humanity, yea, and uncivilized, is on our side. It is, or ought to be, unthinkable that we fail.

"We are here to-day as Christians. If only every man and woman who holds that holy faith could realize for himself, for herself, what the love of Jesus Christ our Saviour means, would there be need for a League of Nations? Before the impact of that love whatever is vile or cowardly or self-seeking would go down and righteousness and peace would stand. And it is there. Use it to that great end. Concentrated here on holy ground in this nineteen hundred and twenty-second year of grace—year of Christ—we call God to witness that, as Christians, we will neither doubt nor flinch nor fail. Once let the Christian men and women upon earth, West and East, North and South, kneel to God side by side, stand shoulder to shoulder before men, to say what they mean shall happen, or, rather, what shall not happen, in the round world again, and they are irresistible."

ISAMU KAWAKAMI has published in Tokyo a pamphlet entitled, "International Morality and Japanese Nationalism."

He mentions a pessimism a superficial observer might feel concerning the international situation, but underneath the surface he finds much hope in Japan's desire to be abreast of the leading nations of the world,—indeed, to be one with the other nations.

This is his closing paragraph:—

"The liberal-minded people of Japan are sometimes hindered by the narrow nationalism of other peoples, yet they are also stimulated by it. Even the most narrow nationalists of Japan are anxious to keep abreast of other nations, and will follow whatever they believe to be the world tendency, whether it be imperialism, or justice and good-will. If another Washington Conference can decide upon the reduction of the army there is good reason for believing that Japan will be glad to follow."

THE Annual Meeting of the Executive Committee of the "Federal Council of the Churches of Christ" was held in Indianapolis in the Twelfth Month.

This sentence from their pronouncement on America's International Obligations, has a fine appeal:—

"We therefore appeal to the Churches to become centers of public education on the moral necessity of the United States assuming its full share of responsibility in existing tasks. Our government should either avail itself of international provisions for organized international co-operation or present some better way."

THE New York Evening Post shows that the United States has reduced its Army Expenditures to 90 per cent. of the pre-war level, Belgium to 76 per cent., Italy to 62 per cent., Great Britain to 50 per cent. and France to 42 per cent.

THE Springfield Republican says that Jane Addams, who is starting on a tour of the world, spoke in London at a meeting a few days ago. She said that the United States was at present a "recalcitrant" nation, but that it must be more before long enter the League of Nations. Her reasons were:—

- The influential farmer bloc in Congress.
- The changed attitude of bankers through the East—evinced now the need of the United States taking her part as a world power.
- The influence of the newly enfranchised women who because of their interest in the undernourished women and children of Europe will make their voices heard.

"Where religion goes", says Cardinal O'Connell epigrammatically, "only one thing can follow logically—the bayonet." But it cannot be said that where the bayonet goes religion is likely to follow."

THE Philadelphia Sesqui-centennial is to be called the "World Festival of Peace and Progress!"

In the three years before the event there is surely much that all may do to make the celebration not only true for this country, but for all the World!

R. BARCLAY MURDOCHNOT of Glasgow, Scotland, writes that he has distributed over 6,000 copies of the "Warless World" Letter and that he was unable to supply the demand for leaflets for "Peace Sunday."

THE MINISTRY.

William Penn, in speaking of Friends, said that they met together, "Not in their own wills, and waited together in silence and, as anything arose in one of their minds, that they thought favored with a divine spring, so they sometimes spoke."

In the Society of Friends, vocal ministry arises quite naturally from silent worship. Having dwelt devoutly and earnestly upon that which was from the beginning, they find the "seed" beginning to grow until utterance of that which is welling up within them can no longer be denied.

It is difficult to define clearly in the philosophy or in the psychology of religion what is conveyed by the term "seed." Yet some understanding of the word is necessary for it is a fundamental thing in silent worship. Perhaps it might be expressed as a process of unfolding or of development of the idea of God. The worshipper experiences what are beautifully called "openings," that is, he has, from time to time, an ever fresh insight into the things of the spirit; avenues of approach to the Divine are made clear; vistas of Truth are opened up before him; he is apprised of his vicinity to a most excellent Life. "In silent worship there are infinite enlargements on every side, directing us to higher and yet higher leadings—the infinitude of the private man." In some degree he sees Life as God sees it. His mind and heart are filled with an overwhelming sense of the Father's love. His whole being is pervaded by a sense, clear and unmistakable, of the presence of God.

Then, as words are given him, the spirit of God speaks through him. But the speaker must not outreach the Divine promptings. He is merely the mouthpiece. He must keep within his "measure," as early Friends were wont to say. George Fox once wrote, "Now none must go forth into words, after they have moved and quenched that which moved them." And in another place in writing about the necessity of an absolute reliance upon the growth of the "seed," he says, "Now, when the seed is up in every particular, then there is no danger. But, when there is an opening and prophecy, and the power stirs before the seed comes up, then there is something that will rush out and run out, and there is the danger and there must be the fear and the patience."

The vocal expression of what one perceives in the opening of the seed is Inspirational Ministry. The need for utterance arises from a heart and mind filled to overflowing with a knowledge of the Divine Love. Then there is no let nor hindrance—the individual is spoken through.

Many of our members shrink from speaking of that which lies close to their hearts; they hesitate to give expression to that which they are deeply moved to say. Very often this reluctance springs from a sense of personal unworthiness. They fear that others will measure them by what they say—that their everyday life will not come up to their words. This is a false humility, a wrong attitude to assume. What you say is not of you but of God. You are simply the channel through which the message flows. You impart that which is given you to say.

"The power of the Lord was over all," is a phrase we often meet with in the writings of early Friends. All of us at one time or another have felt the Divine Power in our meetings, though no words be spoken. We have the blessed assurance that, "When two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them." "My dear Friends," wrote George Fox, "keep your Meetings, and you will feel the seed to arise, though never a word be spoken amongst you." An incident in point is related that at a very large Meeting a Friend arose in his seat, "and when he was moved to stand up amongst them, he saw that they had no need of words. For they were all sitting down under their teacher Jesus Christ, so he was moved to sit down amongst them without speaking anything."

A Letter from a Vienna Home.

Through the kindness of Maria C. Scattergood we avail ourselves of the opportunity of sharing with the readers of THE FRIEND a glimpse into the daily life of a family in Vienna. M. C. S. visited intimately during the past summer with this family, and many references are made in the letter to substantial favors furnished them which M. C. S. would not wish us to publish. The first section of the letter is dated Twelfth Month 5th.—Eds.]

I am sending another very, very big wish; the wish for a real, good International World Peace! I hope God will grant it soon.

The other day I got a second number of THE FRIEND, and I am sure I have to thank you for it; you have no idea how much good it has done, not only to me, but to our whole group; for in thinking over the things I read in these numbers, so many ideas have been started in my brain by different articles that I had to tell about them in the meetings. Last week I told them about "As Others See Us" (No. 21), and about the little boy's answer—"They ought to make us feel that we must be as good as these people think we are!" This boy's answer (I told them) made me wish, and long, not only to know him, dear thing, but above all to know those with and among whom he is living.

Twelfth Month 8th.—I have been interrupted and could not find a suitable time to finish the letter. Well, to continue the above, I proceeded telling how this little incident had started in me quite a series of thoughts, that, in pondering over it, I came to realize anew and with more force and clearness how much the living example meant in good and evil. It is proved by great psychologists and pedagogues that children in their first years, say to their fifth or sixth year, never tell a conscious lie; they have an unlimited imagination and tell fictitious stories and indulge in fancies and fables. Near as they still are to the wonderland they have just come from, they are not always able to hold well apart imagined day-dreams from reality, and how, when they get older and come to know the difference, how then do they come to tell lies?

If they never heard others tell lies, would they of themselves do so? No. This is one of the many instances which show what every moment of our own life means to our fellow-men. . . . This was my line of thought as I sat in meeting pondering over many things, and when I told them about what I had just thought, two others stood up and said how glad they were to have had me tell them this American boy's saying, and my thoughts about it, and how this had started many new and beautiful thoughts and ideas in them. So thanks for having sent me THE FRIEND.

We have started a new movement in our small group; to find out those who are suffering in silence and to help with our own (poor!) means; to go to them and help them with their work if they are ill or old, and to try to obtain work or other effective help for them, or only to visit them if they are lonely. It is, of course, the most difficult task we could have set ourselves in many respects. First of all, the finding of such persons, then the infinitely fine tact of making our presence or help a boon, not a nuisance to them. We will also go to hospitals to ask for lonely persons who may have come there and who have nobody to come see them. . . . I forgot to say what another good thing your sending me THE FRIEND has brought me. Some of the new Friends, the new heads of the Friends' Mission here, were present at the meeting when I spoke about the answer of that American boy in THE FRIEND and they asked if we would be glad to have the London Friend from the Mission when they are through with it there. They said they were very pleased to see how we can fertilize each other's thoughts and souls, even from afar off, and be useful to each other.

In Number 21 of your FRIEND I was very much touched with the obituary (or is it account, you call it?) of George Cadbury; he was a great and good man. And one more article has touched the very strings of my soul, "A Simple Faith" (by G. Wharton Pepper, Senator). What a definition of faith! I must read that over again some more times, and then I shall tell them at the Meeting about it or perhaps read them a translation of it which I shall make, for of course I could never get that high soaring, soul-lifting language of his, which is, nevertheless, so simple and the more touching for it.

Now here inclosed is a "Bookmark," which my husband has painted for you. He has meant it as a Christmas present, as we are not otherwise able to show our gratitude for your many kindnesses. If you would rather give it away to some one who has perhaps more use for it if you have already got plenty of such nothings, do so by all means. . . . Now I was also very much interested about that "Story of Whales and Quakers." Wouldn't I like to visit once some such places as this old Meeting-house near New Bedford! Apropos of Meeting-house; we shall have to move from the Neue Hofburg with our office and meeting place; we've been hunting for something adequate for such a long time. But of course as so many people have to live in discarded railway-wagons for often more than a year, for want of lodgings, until they are found or rather assigned something better, you may guess how much chance we've got. Professor Boech is just trying to come to an understanding with the Neue Frauenklub, hope he will succeed in inducing them to let us have some portion of their rooms. . . .

Twelfth Month 14.—Third part of my letter; it was too late to finish it, and now I'm glad I had to wait; I was sent for by the Mission Cashier and was handed—What do you think?

was handed sixteen dollars and fifty cents, coming from Philadelphia. Well, I didn't say a word, for I couldn't; I just signed my name and came away as one stunned. A quick superficial reckoning told me what this would buy—not only the umbrella for my husband to replace the one so often mended and now past use, but also warm felt slippers for both of us for at-home wearing, and coal. There is a relief action of the Republic President's going on for coal, but my husband did not permit me to send in our petition. For, said he, this is for the very poor, who have nothing at all, we have at least some warm clothes to protect us, let them have the coal. If God has meant us to have some too, it will come by itself. Well, he was right, it has come by itself. I have already had a fire in our living room and in my husband's office, one day in the one, the next day in the other, so that we can go and warm ourselves at one of the stoves every day. Now I must tell of our having moved to the League's at last, they sent the auto from the Mission and three of us did the removing and general packing in four hours. Professor Boech is snugly settled in a small office, which has a large room adjoining it, that we can use for Meetings and smaller social gatherings. But I have come to the end of my tether or the letter will become too heavy for the post.

MARIA KICSLER.

JAPAN NOTES.

The meeting of the Executive Board of the Friends' Foreign Missionary Association on Sixth-day, First Month 12th, developed many matters of interest. For several reasons the Bowles' furlough is to begin the coming summer, instead of two years later. Rosamond Clark, who has been mission treasurer and secretary to Gilbert Bowles, also returns this year, and it is proposed to engage for this work George Burnham Braithwaite, son of George Braithwaite, of the Japan Book and Tract Society. This young man was born in Japan, and both speaks and reads the language. He has recently returned to Japan from England, where his studies have specially fitted him for secretarial work. He is willing to abandon much more lucrative commercial work in which he is now employed in order to work with the Mission.

There is a good prospect of securing the services of Sarah Ellis in view of the prospective retirement of Alice Lewis Pearson next year. Sarah Ellis was in the school for a number of years, and was very efficient. She has been caring for her parents, both of whom have now died.

Building operations are progressing well. The new meeting-house is practically complete, excepting the seats. It is a beautiful building. The Institute, made partly of the old meeting-house, is also nearing completion. The Jones' house is under roof, and the stucco is being put on the outside. When the roof timbers were put in place, a feast was given to the workmen according to Japanese custom, and a photograph of the house and participants in the feast was sent. The attic of the house is found quite large enough to make a good room, so there will be room enough for all needs.

The cellar of the boys' dormitory is dug, and the contract for the building has finally been let to the same man who is building the house. Funds have been sent for land and house for the Binfords, but it has so far been impossible to buy land in Shimotsuma. It is proposed to build on a leased lot if one suitably located can be had on a twenty-year lease.

A movement is on foot in Japan for the formation of a National Council of Christians, to include all Protestant denominations, and both Japanese and missionaries; the hope being that such an organization may replace the many councils and boards now existing, and tend to the better co-ordination of Christian effort. A resolution favoring the creation of such a Council was passed at the summer meeting of the Federated Missions, and sent to all the missions represented. The Friends' Mission at their meeting in Eleventh Month last approved this resolution, and it was now approved by the Board.

A member of Tokyo Friends' Meeting, Renzo Sawada, with his bride, recently passed through the United States on his way to a diplomatic post in Argentina. William Harvey told of his efforts to get in touch with them, with the view of arranging a reception in Philadelphia. Their time was so brief that this was found impossible. Renzo Sawada has had long experience in diplomatic work in Europe.

William Harvey also spoke of the approaching visit of Henry Hodgkin, who is on his way to undertake in China a secretaryship in the new National Council, a body which it is hoped will have its counterpart in Japan within a year or two. Notices will appear shortly in regard to the meetings arranged for Dr. Hodgkin.

The Secretary reported that the Annual Report is ready to be mailed out.

FROM EDITH NEWLIN.

MITO, Eleventh Month 26, 1922.

"My Bible classes grow in size and in numbers, till I'm overwhelmed. At first I was afraid to try grade children, but I find them very easy and responsive. The boys' class doubled in one week; they thought it was so interesting to have a foreign teacher, and then Christmas is coming. There are thirty of them now. Ouchi San is helping with them too, and it keeps us both busy. It is two miles to that place, and I'm tired out always after walking the four miles and talking in Japanese for ten or fifteen minutes to that lively class above the noise of the street crowd listening outside and the class in the back of the room. But it is perfectly joyous work to feel the response they give in answer to my questions. I've been giving some peace and temperance talks and the response from the boys is most inspiring. That school has about sixty children now.

"On Fifth-day F. M. Ouchi San has a group of Sixth year grammar girls and I give them English. Then there are coming most urgent requests for a knitting class from the kindergarten mothers. My time is so full I do not know how I'll squeeze it in, but if I can I want to. Some of the mothers are just beginning to get interested in Christianity, and if I can be with them a little more will get something started there too. I have a class of four girls on Second-day evenings; I'm going to win them to a higher life in the process if possible. We have free talks afterwards around the hibachi.

"To-day there were about forty at meeting, all young people—H. V. N. and Kameyama's young men groups, my household and Bible class and the Kameyama family."

FROM ELIZABETH BINFORD'S LETTER.

The First-day school is a great success, and yesterday 69 boys and 68 girls sat in very correct rows on the mats.

At 3 was the Shinto funeral of a rich man of this street, and at 4 was the funeral of Judge Harada's only son. They used to live in Tinto and the mother was a member of the W. C. T. U. The boy graduated from Middle School this year, age 19. Father and Mother were both lovely Christians. The boy was reared a Christian. She was telling me he was so disappointed when they were moved here to find there was no church here, and how happy he was when he heard we were coming. I called 4 times and took fruit and fruit juice. He liked the grape-juice and the morning he died the servant came running to get some over. At 11.30 the servant came again and said it was all over. We went at once. The boy wanted us to conduct the funeral. It was the most Christian funeral I have seen in Ibaraki Province. There was no incense. Judge Harada said, "we don't want anyone to have a chance to bow to the dead."

There were all the official men of the town there—a very fine class—mostly middle-aged men, at least 50 of them went to the crematory and they had prayers there. There were no "ancestral tablets," nothing but the flowers, and the box absolutely undecorated and carried on the shoulders of six men. There was such a sense of sympathy and respect. Gurney and I feel so deeply thankful that we came here in time to be of comfort to these dear people, and that the boy could have the desire of his heart before he died.

WHERE FRIENDS AND NOMADS MEET.

Last month, the American Friends Mission in Russia imported to the famine zone, and distributed there, its first 160 horses for agricultural reconstruction. The English Mission had previously secured several other shipments of horses, and the total number of horses taken into the famine zone by English and American Friends combined is now over 1100. These horses were bought in Turkestan, in the vicinity of the Aral Sea, from nomadic Kirghiz tribes.

The Quaker workers who went south to negotiate their purchase received an interesting insight into the primitive Kirghiz life.

These people live in tent colonies, wandering about and existing almost entirely upon their flocks. The Quaker workers bought part of their horses on visits to such tent colonies. Upon their arrival, a lamb was killed and cooked in their honor, much as used to be done in the days described in the Illiad. After the feast was over, those concerned proceeded to business.

Many of the nomads brought their herds to a center established by the Quakers. Following the custom of the country, when a Quaker worker proposed a transaction he extended his hand, palm upward, to the Kirghiz to whom the offer was made.

If the latter chose to accept, he shook the hand of the offerer. If he considered the price unsatisfactory, he smartly slapped the extended palm. Frequently a Kirghiz would appear to be outraged by the price offered to him. He would draw his herd quickly together and dash away over the country disappearing over the nearest hill and camping there for the night. But the next morning he would be back at the Quaker stockyard, ready to listen to another price and close the transaction. The average price paid per horse was about 170,000,000 roubles, or at the rate of exchange then current, about $15. Free transportation to the famine zone was provided for the horses by the Soviet government.

The peasants are to pay for their horses either in grain from the 1923 harvest, or in service to the community. The Mission, therefore, is not giving them free stock, which might have a pauperizing effect, but is helping them to purchase the stock at terms which they can meet.

A cable recently received from the Russian field urges that all available funds be allocated immediately for the purchase of more horses in order that the latter may be secured and distributed in the famine zone in time for the spring plowing. Funds for this purpose are urgently needed by the American Friends' Service Committee. Providing the peasants with a horse is the quickest way to help him end the famine, since it will give him the means of plowing and thus of raising food.

SERVICE WORK IN AMERICA.

"Mr. _____ has completed his service with us at Ellis Island and I write to express to you our cordial appreciation of the way in which he has served us and the incoming aliens. He has commended himself highly to all who have had to do with him, both for intelligence in his work and the high character which he has shown in doing it.

"We are debtors to you for the service rendered by Mr. _____ and I feel that the world is debtor to your Society for venturing to practice a Christianity which in these days a good many have forgotten to preach."

The above was written by a representative of one of our large religious denominations in regard to one of the volunteers in the Home Service work of the American Friends' Service Committee who served on Ellis Island last summer.

Dr. George W. Kirchwey, a leading authority on penal reform, writes, "My experience _____ has led me to the conviction I must turn to the Society of Friends for the regeneration of the prison system of the country."

Such statements are a challenge to young men and women who are members of the Society of Friends to give at least one year to the service of humanity and to the study of one of our many social problems. Such contracts will mean a religious society quickened to a renewed concern for the welfare of humanity. They will mean also a citizenship alive to the needs of the community and with a first-hand knowledge of the methods of meeting these needs.

The Home Service Department of the A. F. S. C. desires to encourage young men and women to give a year of volunteer service to the study of one of our many social problems through work with some organization or institution dealing with those problems. Information will be given concerning the opportunities available to those who address the Home Service Department, American Friends' Service Committee, 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

WITH DANIEL OLIVER IN SYRIA.

The paragraphs which follow are taken from a letter recently received from Daniel Oliver, who, with William Bacon Evans, is directing a school in Syria.

"At present we are concentrating on the Orphanage work: feeding, clothing and educating the boys and girls. Also a small amount of relief work for Armenian refugees in Beyrout, if funds are available. Wm. B. Evans and myself paid a visit to a camp of Armenian refugees in Beyrout last week. In that camp there were 5500. Three hundred more have since come from Mersene, and 1000 were arriving from Constantinople, apart from 1500 Greeks and Armenians who arrived previously, and who are not in the camp we visited.

"Every day the numbers are being increased. All those we saw were in rags, and one of the most urgent needs is clothing and blankets. A large number are absolutely destitute. Some were trying to hawk about a little fruit or vegetables, and in this way to eke out a living. Many have trades and could work if work were to be had. There is a very large number for whom food and clothing and shelter will have to be found if they are going to survive the winter.

"Our plan, if sufficient funds come in, is to repeat the experiment of the beginning of the year, that is, to bring a number of Armenians up to the mountains and get them settled in the empty houses in the villages around here, or in Damascus. Those who are laborers and farmers could very well be settled in different parts of Lebanon. Artisans and tradespeople would have to settle in the cities. In any case, it means feeding and care for the winter months. There are a great many widows, young girls, blind, old and infirm people. What is to be done with these it is very difficult to know.

"In the camp, some had old tents, some were in wooden huts, and others had only sacks thrown over pieces of wood to protect them from the heavy rains and cold winds. All looked sad in the extreme, for they had all lost everything, including many of their dear ones."

SERVICE NOTES.

A CHECK for $150 received by the New York Committee, which is co-operating with the American Friends' Service Committee, is accompanied by the following eloquent note:—

DECEMBER 25, 1922.

TO THE RUSSIAN CHILDREN EVERYWHERE IN RUSSIA.

Dear Little Friends:—We want to do without part of our Christmas presents and send them to you instead, for we know you often go hungry while we have more than we need. So we are sending you this money which our aunts gave us instead of presents, and wish it were more, and hope it will do you lots of good.

With our love,
J. A. N., AND ELEVEN OTHERS.

THE Kobryn outpost of the Polish Mission reports that the sale of agricultural implements, glass, horses and sheep has been a great success. Several distributions for over 500 people a day have had to be organized. The great need for horses in the district is shown by the fact that in one place where the Mission placed nine horses on sale, two hundred peasants came, each wanting to buy one. In the Kobryn and Drohiczyn district as a whole, 114 horses and 175 plows were sold during the summer.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THE enclosed clipping brings encouragement, even though the very last word in the Literary Digest of last issue before advertisements holds sway.

We must not look for the high seats.

F. B. G. BRANSON.

Can France and Germany ever approximate anything like friendship in this generation? A French author, Ambrose Got, has answered this affirmatively in "L'Avenir des Relations Franco-Allemandes" (Paris: Etienne Chiron). Having lived in Germany most of the time since the Armistice, he is able to analyze the present currents of thought among Germans. He says that just now the real power is in the hands of the parties that stand for moderate but sincere republican ideals, groups whose intentions toward France are above suspicion. He also points out that publicists such as Maximilian Harden, George Bernhard and S. Jakobsohn are carrying on a lively campaign on behalf of a rapprochement. The author urges to embrace the opportunity by going half way to meet the advances of these more friendly elements in Germany while they are still in power.

At a special meeting of the Board of Managers of the Cheyney Training School for Teachers held Fourth Month 5, 1922, the officers and committees of the Richard Humphreys Foundation were appointed, the Board of Managers of the Cheyney Training School for teachers automatically becoming the Board of Managers of the Richard Humphreys Foundation.

Since then three meetings of the Board have been held.

An appraisal of the property turned over to the State by the Cheyney Training School for Teachers showed a value of $97,630.12.

The treasurer estimated that the annual income of the Richard Humphreys Foundation for purposes of appropriation would be about $8,000.00 per annum.

In starting the work of the Foundation it was necessary to make appropriations out of the due course as provided by the Rules. Therefore at a special meeting of the board held Fifth Month 8, 1922, scholarship aids were granted aggregating $2,450.00, also appropriations for a Campaign of Publicity to make Cheyney better known in Pennsylvania, for books and a librarian's salary, for ten Pennsylvania Scholarships of $180 each to be known as the Richard Humphreys Foundation Scholarships, and for First-day School help, and kindred interests, these four amounting to $3,625.00.

At a later meeting $1000 was granted to Christiansburg Industrial Institute and $500 to the Shelter for Colored Orphans. The ten Pennsylvania Scholarships having been granted too late for use this year, it was decided they should be used for the school year 1923-1924. It is understood that tuition at Cheyney is free as at all other Pennsylvania Normal Schools, the $180 scholarships covers board and room.

BERLIN, GERMANY, TWELFTH MONTH 27, 1922.—The Christmas Party given by Agnes Tierney and the Garretts was a valuable occasion. It revealed to me, on the evening of my first day in Berlin, what a loyal group of "Kwaker" people there are here,—about thirty in all—German, English and American. Two were fresh from Russia, and bubbling over with information and enthusiasm for the work over there. The evening was spent in eating, speech-making, etc. While there was much fun, the occasion was to me a time of profound fellowship. One can never realize the spirit of one's friends except through companionship with them. Those who feel the deep spirit of such a group can never forget it.

ESTHER M. WHITSON.

DR. HENRY T. HODGKIN, who will soon leave England to engage in important work in China, is coming this way and intends to be in and around Philadelphia for a few days next month: it is expected that he will address Friends and others interested in Foreign Missions on Sixth-day P. M., Second Month 16, and in the evening he is to meet young Friends of both branches.

Two important meetings are scheduled for Seventh-day afternoon and evening the 17th prox.

It is expected that Dr. Hodgkin will deliver an address at the South Broad Street Theatre on First-day afternoon, Second Month 18th, and on Second day it is planned for him to address the Ministers of Philadelphia at a luncheon to be spread at the City Club.

Fuller particulars will be published in due time.

NOTICES.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION.

ON your drive, will a Rhoads Belt give more economical service than other belts that may be bought for less money?

We have many reports of the actual working of Rhoads Belts. These go to show that the careful skill used throughout the thirty processes of manufacture, does produce belts of high quality.

They are the kind of belts that should cost you less per year because they last longer, grip tighter, and give you greater output.

HIDDEN FROM THE STRIFE OF TONGUES.

A Hebrew mystic in the long ago celebrates in a psalm the blessedness of such as seek their refuge and home in God. He says: "In the covert of Thy Presence wilt Thou hide them from the plottings of man; Thou wilt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues."

Evidently his lot was cast in a time of confusion and cross-currents. But he had found a place of quiet and inward rest which the tumult without could not invade.

What would he have said if he had lived in our complex modern world? Is it not as never before a scene of strife? Was there ever such a strife of tongues as to-day? Men have lost the sense of being "under authority," and the tendency is for every man to do "that which is right in his own eyes," as in the days when "there was no King in Israel," i. e., no central authority.

In every department of life we meet with this strife of tongues? In science, we have continually to exchange the old text-books for new as more modern hypotheses supplant those which have held the field. In philosophy, one system destroys another, so that there is no settlement of any question. In the social order the battle often belongs to craft and cunning, and the true relationship between capital and labor is still an unsolved problem. In the world of politics, the strife of parties for the mastery continues, while in international relations, the strife of tongues threatens to end in a fresh clash of arms.

And what shall we say of the religious world? It is true men are to-day inclined to minimize denominational distinctions. Federation is in the air. But theologically Christendom is an armed camp. Traditionalists pitted against Modernists, Modernists against Traditionalists, and true piety in danger of being crushed between the upper and nether millstones.

It was into a religious world torn by internecine strife that the early Quakers carried their message. It pointed to a place of quiet, to a pavilion of peace, in God Himself. Our meetings for worship, held if not for the purpose of silence, yet on the basis of a silence from creaturely activities, so that the Divine may be uppermost, offer to those tired of the strife of tongues a pavilion, a Divinely provided retreat from the noise and contention without. There we reach conclusions not by the roundabout way of reasoning, but by the nearer way of immediate communion of spirit with Spirit, with the living, eternal Truth itself. We obtain certainty because we realize that with God is the fountain of life, and in His light we see light.

Friends did not start out to deny this or that belief or view or opinion held by others. To do that would have only added to the strife of tongues. They rather directed puzzled and bewildered men to the pavilion, where in the silence, the teaching of God is obtained—the instruction within, which halves the life and transfigures the character.

If our Society has no other service in the world than this, to keep up this pavilion to which weary souls may turn from the strife of tongues, its continued existence, though numerically "one of the least among the thousands of Israel," will be well justified.

THE LISTENING PERIOD.

One day not long ago I was in the room of an Oregon lad who had rigged up a radio receiving equipment. Tacked up on the wall above the apparatus was a printed radio schedule, sent out from Portland, in which every hour of the day seemed programmed. No, not every hour, for on running my eye down the schedule I found one hour marked, "Listening Period." "What does that mean?" I asked of my boy friend. He explained that it was a period in which the various broadcasting stations of the State and Northwest were silent that the receiving instruments in their field might listen undisturbed to messages from afar.

The listening period! How many of us make a place for it in our crowded daily programs? So busily broadcasting are we, each feverishly anxious to send to others our own thoughts and opinions, our own plans and projects, that we hardly so much as pause for mental replenishment or for spiritual refreshment. And perchance if we do pause briefly it is but to listen to the distracting voices and sounds about us. It is the Voice from afar, yet closer than hand or touch, that would speak to our condition if we would but listen.

Sadly and bitterly distraught is the world upon which we look to-day. Busily broadcasted are race hatreds, national antipathies, religious prejudices and social antagonisms. The world is in an uproar of strident, jangling voices in which healing and wisdom are wanting. Oh, if the peoples and nations of the earth would but settle quietly into a listening period and "know that I am God!" From heaven's heights continually come melodies of love and harmonies of peace. May we listen intently for them.

WALTER C. WOODWARD, in The American Friend.

Moorestown Conference.

(Twelfth Month 28, 1922.)

Originating with a concern of Nathaniel B. Jones, a Conference "for our younger members and others interested" and including ultimately both Haddonfield and Salem, and Burlington and Bucks Quarterly Meetings, was held on the 28th of last Twelfth Month, in the Meeting House at Moorestown. Despite the blustery weather, there was a large gathering from the two Quarterly Meetings, of people who gave every evidence, both at the afternoon and evening sessions, of being earnestly interested. All of the speakers who had been invited to take part were able to be present except one, and in the place of Anna Rhoads Ladd, prevented by illness, to the regret of all, from attending, Richard C. Brown, on extremely short notice, made one of the most valuable contributions of the day.

William F. Overman presided at both sessions. The first speaker at the five o'clock meeting was J. Harvey Borton, who introduced our general topic of "Why the Society of Friends?" by a consideration of the world's challenge to Christianity. He instanced Bishop MacDowell's experience at Cornell, when, discussing with one of the students the possibilities of getting the nations of the world together around the personality of some great teacher, it seemed evident that Jesus Christ was the only figure worth consideration. Senator Pepper frankly urges Jesus' method as the one solution of the labor problem. Many others are coming to the same conclusion. The problem of the Orient—China, Japan, India, etc., is the problem of making known the teachings of Jesus Christ. The spirit of nationalism is very strong to-day. True democracy is impossible without enough men and women of Christian character to give the necessary leadership. In thinking of democracy as a fairly simple matter, we forget utterly our Christian heritage. He called our attention to the fact that in 1918 six Student Volunteers went out from England, instead of the hundred a year who formerly were sent. Everywhere missionary effort has had to be curtailed, yet out of the estimated 1,700,000,000 who make up the earth's population, fully one billion are without any outward knowledge of Jesus Christ. In our own country only one Christian out of 2,000 undertakes to go into missionary work. A church that is not a missionary church eventually dries up, Harvey Borton told us, and the Society of Friends is not to-day on the whole a missionary church. In a new way we must dedicate ourselves to the will of God. It is not what we say, but what we are. Our character is what we are in the sight of God—our reputation is what we are in the sight of men. Which counts for more with us?

William Overman called our attention to the reports to the effect that less than 17 per cent. of the population of this country attended any church or First-day School during 1921, and in the ranks of the "working classes" the attendance was less than 5 per cent. He introduced Richard R. Wood, now of Harvard, who told us how many of the prominent preachers he had met at the University were keenly interested to know all they could about the Society of Friends. These men feel, he thinks, that we have a real function, and he then outlined what he believes our three-fold function to be: first, our form of worship appeals powerfully to a certain group; second, our Peace testimony, and third, our teaching with regard to the Light Within. He stressed the peace-time responsibility of pacifists, not waiting until ultimatums have been exchanged, not being satisfied with curative work, but seeking aggressively preventive measures. Trust between nations is essential, working for this is a reason for our Society's existence. Anyone can do relief work, if he will, but the doctrine of the Inner Light, that anyone can get the help he wants direct from God, is something of tremendous importance for the Society of Friends. This often appeals where nothing else does.

Elizabeth A. Haines, a student at Wellesley, spoke next. She said the question is often raised at college, "Why any churches at all?" Religion, the students feel, is essentially a social thing—it must be shared to be worth while. Yet they feel that their little Friends' meeting gives them strength and freedom, in silent worship, and a feeling that they are all responsible. We are all responsible, in a Friends' meeting, and we must be willing to give our best, especially where there are no leaders set apart.

Alice Roberts Evans's subject was "The Ministry." A religious movement that is successful recognizes the responsibility of all, as Elizabeth Haines had pointed out. There is no man-made recipe for the bread of life. Every person, young or old, knows the Word of God when he hears it. It registers in our hearts. She referred to some of the ministers who had most deeply influenced her in childhood: Samuel Emlen, Alfred Leeds, George Abbott. We must never be satisfied with less than the best, with anything but the Word of God. There will not then be so many "kinds" of ministry, as we so often hear described. But we do have our treasure in very earthen vessels, and the following points were emphasized as being helpful to the growth of the true ministry: Speak briefly, and at the right time, being especially careful when a great deal has been said already. Use good, clear language, not threadbare, habitual expressions. Don't be afraid of criticism. A good gardener does not let the weeds grow rampant for fear of spoiling a flower. Criticism is far better than indifference, for it at least implies some thinking. The flowers of truth will survive any criticism. Back of the spoken word there must be the testimony of the speaker's life. The hour of worship is poorly spent if it fails to fortify our conviction that God does speak to us directly.

This closed the afternoon program. The Chairman invited discussion and our Friend Max I. Reich, looking back into the past and forward into the future, and asking what is the excuse for the Society of Friends, and which of the many Quaker voices in the world to-day we ought to follow, compared our group to ancient Israel. Both had a sense of a great obligation; both were Divinely prepared to become what they became; both had to learn to turn away from man, and formal preaching, to the Word of God speaking in the depths of the soul. The early Friends discovered the secret of an overcoming life. Their "inner light" was no philosophy but a Divine reality. The Society of Friends had a Divine beginning. Will it receive again the power and glory of those early days? M. I. R. believed that in the Quaker movement God intended to complete the work of the Reformation. Our chief work to-day is not philanthropy, child-feeding, or peace (important as all three are), but as a people who have felt and known the power of God, to bring others to that power. Can we really say, "Come thou with us and we will do thee good?"

The supper, served with efficiency and despatch in the School gymnasium adjoining, was as important an element in the Conference as are the Quarterly Meeting lunches, in making for that good fellowship between those who, in many cases, see each other only a few times a year.

We assembled again in the Meeting House to hear Richard C. Brown, viz Anna Rhoads Ladd, as above noted, on "The Attitude of Friends towards the Scriptures." Friends have always, he emphasized, looked upon the Bible as the most important book there is. (More copies are still sold than of any other book, and it is still the most referred to, quoted from and alluded to volume in literature.) Everyone over five years of age ought to have a Bible of his own. (It is not too late to supply them!) Having it, we should read it. Even with limited time we must choose between newspaper headlines (and he might have added the "comic strips!") and the Bible.

The early Friends were filled to the brim with the words of Scripture. They argued and debated on Scripture grounds. Of course, such debates were general in the seventeenth century, theology was in the air one breathed. Seventh-day afternoons were often given over to such struggles and the crowds returned home cheering, in much the same way as a football crowd does to-day. Friends have always revered the Bible, yet their views have differed somewhat from those of some other Christians. This was because they were convinced that religious truth is derived not from the Church, the Roman Catholic position, nor from the Bible, as is the view of Protestants generally, but is taught direct of God. Robert Barclay's masterful chapter in the "Apology" was cited. God often does speak to us in the words of a Scripture passage. R. C. B. explained clearly why Friends prefer to call the Bible the "words" rather than the "Word" of God, calling our attention to the fact that in the Old Testament the latter expression often refers more to a prophetic message than to any book, and in the New it is a name for Jesus Himself. The Bible is more precious than all other books. It is an inspired volume. But just what do we mean by "inspiration?" With an illuminating comparison to the workings of a large corporation in issuing its correspondence, etc., the speaker proceeded to illustrate various degrees and sorts of "inspiration." Yet just as nothing in writing ever quite equals a personal interview, so nothing in the Bible is quite equivalent to direct communion with God. A Friends' minister to ask whether he believed in the inspiration of Isaiah replied, "Yes, as much as in my own!"

William Bishop was the concluding speaker. His address was the longest of the day: it was listened to with profound attention, but it was the most difficult in some respects to report upon and summarize, perhaps because much of it was frankly personal and very searching. He began by asking, What is God? A Power, with a plan. Hence a Power interested in all that He has made, because everything is a part of that plan. He unfolded the purpose of Christ's coming, and with a great deal drawn from his own youthful experience, and which the years that have followed would seem but to have confirmed, he set forth the message of Jesus, as he understood it, and pleaded earnestly with the younger element of his audience, especially, that they should, full of joy and faith, live up whole-heartedly to their convictions as to what their Lord was requiring of them. He scouted the idea that, once this path is entered upon, we shall be bowed down by the sacrifices we are making, for we shall be so glad to be doing these things that they will no longer seem like sacrifices, thus bearing out the testimony to our Lord that He "for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame."

This address concluded what, for many, was a most worthwhile occasion; a time that was not at all, as some of the less optimistic had anticipated, "just one more conference," but an afternoon and evening when we were fed, strengthened, refreshed and encouraged.

OUR BESETTING SIN.

In the twelfth chapter of Hebrews we find in the first paragraph the words, "Let us lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us," by which Paul shows evidence that in those days there were such besetments as we recognize to be existent in this our day. He does not state just what that sin was, but we can readily surmise that it was the same that we have now to contend with, therefore it behoves us to search our hearts diligently in order to see whether or not we are free.

Those of us who are in constant contact with the public recognize the outstanding sin to be that of selfishness. By this it need not be understood that each act is for self to the detriment of others, but rather it is evidenced by small or greater acts that have self-aggrandizement as the basis of action without further thought as to the outcome. In the home the same applies, yet perhaps to a much less degree, because, home love is a great factor toward overcoming this tendency. This selfishness may assume various aspects in the home life, one being neglect of the small amenities rather than a deliberate act. Omission of the little acts of kindness and love which go so far to keep up the real home atmosphere may be the actual sin, and that is not uncommon. Thoughtlessness of the comforts of those around us, in the home and elsewhere, show evidence of this sin, and it is these little acts that tend toward the greater ones that eventually disrupt the home life.

Throughout life it would seem important that we carefully analyze our actions both at home and in public to see whether or not we have the first thought for others rather than for self, and there can be no doubt that from such care the response will be conducive to heart satisfaction and improved relationships with those in whose company we are thrown. We must bear in mind that others are measurably dependent upon us as we are upon them in turn, that our lives are more or less interwoven, and all of those traits that make for a betterment of relationships should be encouraged, and those that allow of a growth of the coarser nature should be subdued and controlled. "Make someone happy each day" is a good motto, and yet it does not fulfil the purpose entirely, as it allows of the possibility of stopping right there, satisfied when other deeds of kindness could be done. Selfishness is a many-headed monster and shows itself in so many different ways that influence our characters, actions and motives that it would be a matter of considerable difficulty to fully specify all of its activities. No matter how much we try to cover up our selfishness, the selfish side of our natures will crop out unexpectedly at times in spite of our efforts. Better, yes, far better, would it be for us to seek Divine aid in our efforts to live the unselfish life than to depend upon our own efforts to overcome. With the Psalmist we can say, "Cleanse thou me from secret faults. Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me; then shall I be innocent from the great transgression." (Ps. xix-12, 13). Or as Job writes in the thirteenth chapter, twenty-third verse, "How many are mine iniquities and sins? Make me to know my transgression and my sin."

Small sins may lead to greater ones which in turn will have a great bearing upon our lives, far more than we may realize or suspect, so it behoves us to watch diligently and lend ourselves to daily introspection and prayer for that assistance which alone can raise us from this mire of selfishness and all other besetments and place us firmly upon the foundation that makes for the better life both here and hereafter.

LETTER FROM GERMANY.

BERLIN, W. S. Behren-Strasse 26 a 11.

Twelfth Month 31, 1922.

MY DEAR FRIEND, GEORGE M. WARNER:—

I received thy letter enclosing clippings on Clemenceau's speeches, and read them all with some care; and especially consulted two competent people, as well as observing the trend of opinion as I hear it in general. There is a good deal of talk of more war, to throw off the yoke of France, as it were, which more and more is felt to be intolerably galling. Only last night a good woman Friend told me there were many who wanted "just one more war," to drive France out of Rhineland. But those who think with any care at all see that this is simple desperation, and would be suicidal, and I do not suppose that any responsible governmental or military authority would undertake or even seriously consider such a project. The first person I asked was a very able young graduate of the University of Berlin; he said it was physically impossible for Germany to make war; she could not hold her own for a month, perhaps not a week; that we have no idea of the utter internal exhaustion of the German people; and he said this would be equally true even if the monarchists came into power, that they might be very militaristic, but they could not make a thoroughly exhausted nation any stronger than it was, so that foreign war would be as impossible under them as otherwise. Many people also realize that to make the attempt to resist

France with arms would mean bringing war upon German soil, so that Germany would be devastated as France was. This young man was a soldier in the German army, three times wounded, and two years a prisoner, and he is strongly of the opinion that no young German who saw war itself will ever want war again.

The other person I consulted was a German reporter for the N. Y. Herald. He said that as soon as Clemenceau's speeches were cabled over (about Eleventh Month 21st?) he went at once to two of the leading members of the German Reichstag, and asked them about Clemenceau's charge that Germany was going on making munitions, turning out big guns, and arming herself for another war. They answered to the effect, that it seems Clemenceau does not trust their own allied commissions of disarmament, who continually watch all munition making in Germany. "Does he think (they said) that a great gun can be made in a shack or a cellar? A great gun can only be made in a great factory, and such factories are under rigid inspection of the Allies." The Works' Council at Essen reports that the Allied Commission goes through their works daily. Of course it is true that the Allies permit a certain amount of munition making in Germany, but only sufficient to repel internal insurrections, such as might come from radical communist rebels, or monarchists, as happened in the "Kapp Putsch" in 1920. Gas, making of poisons, etc., of course cannot be so easily controlled. It is confidently asserted that the working-men of Germany would never permit a foreign war. But it must be remembered that if a people is goaded to desperation all calculations may fail, and that is the direction that many Germans feel the French have been driving them the last six months or more. As one German lady said to us, some are ready to attack France and see Germany die fighting for her honor, so to speak, on the principle, "Give me liberty or give me death." Such considerations should spur pacifists not to relax their efforts in this crisis. I was especially glad to read the replies some of our Senators, such as Borah, have made to Clemenceau, for they seemed to have a good comprehension of the real situation, and had information and a point of view such as we hear here; Borah seems to present about the same point of view as we heard at the Women's Conference at the Hague.

I see considerable rays of hope, but unremitting efforts are all the while required.

With cordial regards from our party,

Sincerely thy friend,

ALFRED C. GARRETT.

Texts—Phrases—Shibboleths.

IV.

One Lord, one faith, one baptism. (Eph. 4, 5)

In previous articles an effort has been made to show that a dependence upon a text without reference to the context may at times lead to wrong conclusions. In the second article of this series, it was shown that the text: "Touch not, taste not, handle not," was often misinterpreted as a command not to use intoxicants, although in many other passages the Scriptures inculcate the practice of temperance. So also the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," does not appear to apply to warfare, but many other teachings of the Bible clearly indicate the iniquity of war.

The text, quoted at the head of this article, has long been used as a bulwark for the Quaker belief in respect to the outward rite of water baptism. A long line of able Quaker writers from Robert Barclay to the present day have quoted this text as one of the strongest proofs of the position of Friends. In all four Gospels, John the Baptist is quoted as declaring that while he baptized with water, Jesus would baptize with the Holy Spirit. Here it is evident that two baptisms are mentioned, the baptism of water and the baptism of the Spirit. Shall we accept the doctrine of two baptisms, or shall we choose one of the two? Here comes the proof text, "One Lord, one faith, one baptism." If we are to choose one, it is evident that we accept the baptism of the Holy Spirit and reject the other. Q. E. D. The argument is closed.

With considerable diffidence do I, unversed in critical methods, venture to suggest that it is possible that the application of this text has been misconstrued. Let us note what happened when Paul came to Ephesus, recalling that the epistle in which this text is found was written to the Ephesians. Paul soon found some disciples at Ephesus and inquired whether they had received the Holy Spirit when they had first believed. They stated they had not heard of any Holy Spirit and that their baptism was John's baptism. They were reminded that John told the people they should believe on Christ who was to come after John. They were then baptized into the Faith of the Lord Jesus, and afterward, when Paul had placed his hands upon them, they felt a new experience, they realized that a new life was springing up within them, they fairly shouted for joy, they began to tell everybody the glad tidings, in short, they were baptized with the Holy Spirit. So there appear to have been three several baptisms connected with the organization of the church at Ephesus. The first, the baptism of John in which water was used; the second, a form of initiation into Christian fellowship, which was generally accompanied by some ceremonial water observance, though just how nobody knows; the third, as referred to in Eph. iii: 16, where Paul prays that the Father may strengthen them with his power by breathing his Spirit into their inmost souls, so that Christ through their faith may make his home within their hearts in love.

I think it will be found that whenever the apostles or ministers administered the rite of baptism, it was with water, but the baptism of the Spirit or of the Holy Ghost, came directly from the Father and His Son.

If we read carefully the fourth chapter of the Epistle to the Ephesians, we will observe that the Apostle is exhorting the members of the church to live in harmony, to maintain in the bond of peace the unity given by the Spirit. He refers to the one body, referring to the outward Church, and to the one Spirit which enlightens the members. He refers to the one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism. The word in the Greek which is rendered one in the English version can also quite properly be translated same. In other words, he said to the Ephesians: "You have the same body, the visible church, you are taught by the same Spirit, you have the same blessed hope of joy both now and hereafter, you worship the same Lord, you are united in believing his doctrines, you came into the church by the same ceremony of baptism." Probably Paul in the same sentence would not twice have reminded them of the operations of the Spirit. He enumerates six particular things which were common to all of the believers. These several features of their newly found faith may be noted in the history given in Acts 19. They learned of Jesus Christ, they were informed of his teachings, they rejoiced in the newly found hope, they were baptized with water both as a token of their cleansing from sin and also as a form of initiation among the believers, they then formed the nucleus of the Church of Ephesus, and lastly they received the endowment of the Holy Spirit, the most precious gift conferred on the sons and daughters of men. The apostle then exhorts them to recognize the various gifts bestowed upon the believers, and thus working together as different members, they form one Body in Christ. Doubtless the ceremony of admission to the Church was impressive, and could be referred to as a solemn sign, an outward token, of their union with the visible church, and therefore, to all sincere believers, of their entrance into the church triumphant.

The author is neither a higher nor a lower critic, and forms his conclusions from a comparison of the occurrences related in the Acts with the passage in the Epistle.

He makes no dogmatic assertion, but is willing to concede that the one baptism referred to in the quoted passage may be regarded as belonging to the ceremony of initiation into the Church. This concession in no way lowers the standard of Friends with regard to water baptism.

First, let us note a few instances of the use of water as an initiatory rite. When Peter was preaching to Cornelius and his household, the Holy Spirit fell upon the listeners. This was an event of the highest importance as the Gospel had not previously been declared to the Gentiles. Peter asked at once whether any one could refuse water for the baptism of these people since they also had received the Holy Spirit. So Cornelius and his household were baptized, and it should especially be noted that the descent of the Holy Spirit did not wait for the outward ceremony of water baptism.

Philip met the treasurer of the Queen of Abyssinia while he was reading the prophecies of Isaiah with no clear understanding of the matter. Philip explained their reference to Christ which explanation the treasurer accepted with great joy. Coming to a pool, the treasurer exclaimed, "What is the matter with my getting baptized at once?" The ceremony was performed and the high official went on his way rejoicing that he had been initiated into the body of Christian believers.

When Philip preached at Samaria, there were numerous believers who were baptized. Even Simon, a great magician, who made money by the practice of his arts, was baptized and became an adherent of Philip. Hearing of this revival at Samaria, the brethren at Jerusalem dispatched Peter and John to Samaria in order to confirm the believers. It appeared that, although they had been baptized with water, they had not received the Holy Spirit. When Peter and John laid their hands upon the band of believers, many of them felt the power of the Spirit. It seems that water baptism had not changed the heart of Simon, since he offered money to Peter and John, asking that the gift of the Spirit might be conferred upon him, evidently intending to make use of the gift in plying his trade as a magician and medicine man. Peter at once told him that his heart was all wrong, that he was still in the bond of iniquity, and urged him to repent of his wicked intent. And Simon asked an interest in their prayers. He needed a further experience which the baptism with water had not supplied.

In the course of Paul's second missionary journey, he had remained at Corinth a year-and-a-half and founded the Christian Church in that cultured city. When on his next missionary journey, word was brought to him that the Christians at Corinth were divided and wrangling among themselves, he addressed a letter to them extolling with them on their factional divisions. Some had been baptized by Peter, some by Apollo and others by Paul. There were Peterites, Apollos and Paulites. The most sensible called themselves Christians. Paul's party was probably small. He recollected that he had baptized only two individuals and one family, and declared that he was not sent to baptize, but to preach the Gospel. Evidently in this discussion baptism by water is referred to.

But now harking back to the text, "One Lord, one faith, one baptism," and supposing that we concede a probability that the apostle referred to the ceremony connected with their admission to the organized church, what support can we find for the Quaker testimony concerning baptism? Though we no longer denounce those who conscientiously believe in the rite of baptism by water, there is abundant proof for the position which Friends have taken.

(1) The general trend of the teachings of Christ and the apostles is directed to the disuse of the outward ceremonials and to a method of life based on spiritual ideals.

(2) In the four gospels and in the Acts we have with slight variance of form this saying of John the Baptist: "I indeed baptize you with water, but he that cometh after me is greater than I, he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost." This in itself is sufficient evidence for the spiritual nature of baptism.

(3) The apostle Peter (1 Peter 3: 20-21) speaks of the eight souls in the ark, who in a sense, were saved by water, "the like figure thereunto even baptism doth now save us," but he adds in effect that is not the action of water in the cleansing of the body from dirt, but the "answer of a good conscience toward God," thus indicating a spiritual cleansing from sin.

(4) Paul baptized with water a few in Corinth, but regretted that he did so. This method of initiation had caused factions. He even goes so far as to say: "For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel." Now did the commission of Paul include all that was essential in the regeneration of souls, or did his mission cover certain features of the work leaving some details to other workers? Read Acts xxvi: 16-18. Here Paul states that the Lord had told him that he was to be sent to the Gentiles "to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith. . . ." It is difficult to see that this commission leaves anything out. And yet Paul by his own admission was not sent to baptize with water.

It is not with any desire to revive old controversies on this subject that this article has been written, but for the sake of Truth. Our position is strongly entrenched even if we surrender the text quoted at the beginning of this essay. We should not care to base any doctrine on a passage of doubtful import.

Almost all Christians who practice water baptism, and they constitute by far the largest body of Christian believers, regard the rite as symbolic of the cleansing power of the Holy Spirit, and they are not disposed in this day and generation to quarrel with us if we omit the symbol and strive directly for the reality of a life sanctified by the indwelling of the Spirit.

FRIENDS' PEACE MISSION VISITS FRANCE.

A mission of English Friends spent six days in France during Eleventh Month with the object of presenting to the various pacifist groups the views of Friends on peace and war, and of making contacts with movements and personalities which might take part in a European movement in the spirit of Friends. Agnes L. Tierney and Eleanor Garrett, all of Philadelphia, joined the group at some of its meetings.

Conferences were held with nearly twenty different groups and organizations, and with many individuals. It was found in general that most French pacifism bases itself on international law rather than on religious grounds, and that international pressure and agreement, rather than individual conscience, are given most consideration. A considerable number of individuals, however, took the entire Friends' position in regard to war, while many of the groups were willing to consider the question with an open mind.

As follow-up work, the group suggested a further visit to France early in the new year, getting in touch with a much wider circle; similar efforts in Germany with an attempt to establish direct contact between French and German pacifists; and the prompt issue in French of the "Moral Basis for a Treaty of Peace" and of a leaflet dealing with "A New Method in International Relations" explanatory of Quaker ideas on violence. It was also felt that a more intimate contact with France ought to be cultivated, and that, in order to make this possible, more Friends ought to learn to speak French.

The group remarks on "the unanimously warm welcome given us as Quakers. We knew this in Germany. It was new to us to find how wide-spread was the feeling of friendliness in Paris, how ready people of all shades were to endeavor to enter into sympathetic understanding of our aims, and the respect expressed for the unflinching attitude of the Friends in the face of war. We feel that there is a wide field in France for international Quakerism rightly directed."

THE THREE USEFUL FAIRIES.

(A Story by a Girl of Thirteen.)

This was published originally in the Philadelphia Record.

"Mother, mother, do I have to do those dishes and do those horrible lessons and dust the dining-room before I can read?" "Yes, dear, you must." "But, mother, can I not read before working?" "No," said her mother, "work comes before play, that is an old saying," and with that she went upstairs and left Margaret to herself.

Angrily and unwillingly Margaret went to her work. When she had finished, she cuddled up in a big arm chair to read. But she felt angry and did not want to read. "Eleanor's mother never makes her work," she thought. As she was thinking she suddenly found herself walking along an old country road, when she heard a little cry, "Help! Help!" Margaret went over to the bushes and in a thorn bush saw a tiny figure. "Please pull me out of these thorns, little girl."

"Gladly," said she. She put her little hand down among the thorns and pulled the dainty little figure out. "Pray," said Margaret, "what are you?" "I am the Fairy Tact, and for this kind act you have done for me I will always be at your service whenever you want me." Margaret thanked her and walked on again. She came to a little stream crossing the road and saw a much smaller figure struggling in the water. "Oh, please pull me out!" "Yes," said Margaret, and dipping her hand in the water she pulled out the small figure. "Pray who are you?" said Margaret. "Oh! I am the Fairy Good Will. Whenever you need me, call me." Margaret thanked her and went on her way. Again she heard a little cry for help. She looked under a leaf which had fallen over the little creature. "Oh, please help me from under this great cover which has fallen over me." Margaret lifted the leaf and took the figure in her hand. "What are you? What is your name?" "I am the Fairy Good Work, and for this kind deed that you have done for me, I am with you whenever you need me." Margaret saw that it was getting late and went home trying to think what those names meant and how they could be of any use to her.

Margaret came home and was just in time for dinner, and while she felt inclined to say something which she knew was not to be said at table, she remembered the Fairy Tact and called her immediately. The thought was gone and only pleasant ones came to her. Then her mother told her to wash the dishes, and Margaret began to say: "Oh no," but she got no further. She remembered the Fairy Good Will and called her. "All right, mother, I will." "Now," said her mother, "the sitting-room needs dusting." Margaret went upstairs and started to dust, but said to herself: "Anyway I won't dust, the high places, I cannot reach them." Just then she thought of the Fairy Good Work and called her at once. Immediately she liked to see how high she could reach and that there was no dust left anywhere.

"Margaret, Margaret," called a voice. Margaret awoke with a start and saw her mother. "Mother, have I been asleep all this time?" "Yes, dear," said mother. "I was looking for you to go to the store for me." "Yes, mother, but let me tell you my dream." She then told her mother her dream. "Margaret," said her mother, "did that teach you a lesson?" "Yes," said Margaret, "it did."

And from that time on, she always called her fairies when she needed them.

BOOK REVIEW.

"PEACE MAKERS—BLESSED AND OTHERWISE."* BY IDA M. TARBELL.

We know that Ida M. Tarbell rarely gives so much as one week to anything serious without having something reasonably serious to show for it. She was one of the favored attenders at the International Peace Conference on the Limitation of Armaments. Her reports of the Conference have been widely read and in them she records many of her "observations, reflections and irritations."

These had a refreshing ring of expectancy and were calculated to impress thinking people that in the realms of prayer and toil there was real hope for the universal prevalence of peace.

There is no question as to how she stands on the League of Nations. She is positively committed to it and her book gives emphasis to this. She says: "So far the League of Nations is at once the most idealistic and the most practical scheme men have yet framed, the broadest in its scope and the most democratic in its spirit. It may prove that humanity is as yet too backward to grasp and realize its intent and its possibilities. It may make too great a demand upon their faith, their charity, their love; but nothing can destroy the great fact that it has been undertaken by fifty-one nations, that it is alive, and at work. That fact will stand as a hope and a guide to the future."

Peace-loving Friends, and that includes all of us and many more, will read Ida Tarbell's book with relish and profit.

HENRY T. HODGKIN'S CALL.

An appeal was given before in THE FRIEND and there was so small a response I venture again to quote from Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin's letter hoping there may be some Friends who can and will respond. All of us have such respect for Dr. Hodgkin's judgment and far-seeing choice of work, I feel sure any cause he feels is so important as to leave his home and family in England for two years needs our most earnest consideration. Dr. Hodgkin says:—

"The New National Christian Council for China, of which I have been asked to become Secretary, is hoping to unite in a far more intimate fellowship, if not in organic union, the various Christian bodies in China. This is to be done under Chinese leadership in the main; if so it will be as a colleague to two or more Chinese Christians. Thus a step towards the development of a truly indigenous Church is being taken at the same time as one towards closer union.

"Both are very significant and hopeful. It is strange to me that a Quaker should be chosen as an officer of such an organization, but I put this down to the fact that already it is seen that the spirit is more important than the forms under which unity can be achieved, and also to an openness of mind towards the position we take on war and other questions greater than we usually find in ecclesiastical bodies in the West. This being so, it would be a grave responsibility to refuse, even though one is called away from other work that opens up most urgently. It also leads me to feel that Friends in America may be particularly glad to further this work by their gifts. In the present very serious condition of the missionary societies, the financial position of this new venture is exceptionally precarious. From an English Friend I have already a promise of $5,000. I have wondered if it might be laid on the hearts of American Friends to do likewise. I hope this would not come as a burden to anyone. It is but a suggestion which may find one here and there keen to discover a way of helping this great nation in her struggle towards righteousness and peace."

Dr. Hodgkin is expected to arrive in this country early next month, en route to China, and I should like to welcome him with some substantial support. Contributions may be sent to Charles J. Rhoads, care of Brown Brothers & Company, 328 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

In the Far East.

William C. Allen.

THE DUTCH LIFE OF JAVA.

I have always considered that Denmark was the only country possessing government-owned railroads that were really worth while. Now I add Java to the very lean list. Maybe the self-possessed Danes and Hollanders govern politicians and officials better than other peoples. Be that as it may, the Javanese railways are finely adapted to the service of the country. The lines are narrow-gauged. Forty or sixty miles per hour are speeds frequently attained. The sort of "graft" practiced upon a long-suffering public, in some countries I know, is absent. Thus you can go into a restaurant car during the day and get a very simple meal, or tea and coffee only. At certain hours regular meals are served at an exceedingly low tariff. In American money soup is 7 cents a plate, bread and butter 7 cents, coffee or tea 7 cents, a full course luncheon 80 cents, and so forth. The language difficulties of foreigners are always overcome by polite officials or by the courteous interpretations of your Dutch, but English-speaking, fellow-passengers. It is at strange stations, say after the tropical six-o'clock sundown, that you have to gird on your traveller's armor. Before the train comes to a halt a host of shouting wild-eyed natives rush your compartment and unless you fairly fight for your worldly possessions, will grab them and disappear in the motley crowd. You dare not trust to a possible sorting-out in the dark. One funny thing about the railways of Java is that the trains do not run at night. So, for instance, if you take an express from Batavia for Soerabaja—a 20-hour run—you stop at some city en route between about 7.30 P. M. and about 6 A. M. This is not a hardship, because the hotels are excellent. The reason assigned for this is that the native crews fall asleep after nightfall.

My first experience with the Malay bath was on the Dutch ship going from Hongkong to Singapore. Afterwards we came into full contact with it in Java. In hotels and private homes it essentially is the same. The houses of our missionary friends usually had the bath-rooms in the rear of the houses, where, close by the kitchen and store-rooms, we would find them at the end of long porticoes. A typical bath-room has no windows, light can only enter it over the ample door. There are few hooks whereon to hang your clothing. The floor and walls are made of concrete or stone. All is dark, soothing and cool after the bursting glare of the tropical sunlight. There is no bath-tub, only a deep, concrete well about four feet square, and on its thick wall is an enormous dipper. You plunge that simple implement into the water, lift it high above you and pour the vivifying fluid over head and shoulders. The effect is exceedingly stimulating, somehow it seems better than a shower. The water runs off of the very sloppy floor out into a drain. You recognize that the Malay bath, next to a limpid mountain stream, is the best of all.

Dutch housewives in Java possess servants galore, but servants and sorrows may easily intermingle. The native servants work little and, although they may be loyal, infinite tact and patience are required in handling them. The range of wages is not large. The cooking is done in little pans and ovens over small braziers, each about the size of an ordinary jardiniere. Only one thing can be cooked at a time. These miniature stoves stand in rows on one side of the oftentimes windowless kitchens, on the floors, and over them squat the dusky cooks whilst watching them. Yet amidst these weird surroundings many an excellent meal is concocted which, when served, is supplemented with luscious fruits.

After tiffin—usually enjoyed at one o'clock—a missionary host, unless he saw evidence of going to our room, would smilingly say: "Mr. Allen, you will excuse us now, it is time to go to bed." So all members of the family would retire to their bed-rooms and a midnight silence would settle on the house. The same process was observed in all hotels. By two o'clock gutteral voices or laughter ceased and quietude reigned supreme. But after four o'clock stirrings would be overheard. The deeply-shaded windows would evidence signs of life. Curtains would be drawn. Men and women in pajamas and bathrobes leisurely wandered to the bath.

The custom of going to bed in the afternoons, as practiced by the foreigners in Java, is a sensible one. It means escaping from the enervating heat, which obtains all the year in the early afternoon. It carries with it physical and mental relaxation. I seriously question if most white people could possibly live for a series of years in Java without it. By four o'clock, even if I did not sleep, I was equipped for work for the remainder of the day; whereas otherwise I would have been exhausted by that hour. The natives take all the rest they can and as for the Chinese, they never seem to tire—they put to shame our effete European stock—they go on forever.

By five, Dutch-Javanese life is in full swing once more. The time for recreation has arrived. Dutch ladies, gowned in easy-fitting garments of flimsy fabrics and simple colors, appear upon the scene. The fashionable shopping hour has arrived. The right calling hour is seven. Afternoon tea prepares our Dutch friends for valiant service at the dinner table. This function is generally at eight o'clock, or may be much later. While speaking of table things, we do not forget the coffee. It is a heavy, black syrup offered in little pitchers. Very little is sufficient and the cup is then filled with water and milk to suit the taste. If genuine American cream were only introduced, instead of boiled milk, the beverage would be ideal.

One of the notable institutions of Java is "Rydstafel," or Rice Toffle. What is Rice Toffle? It is a gastronomic wonder of the world. Its astonishing feature does not consist in the strangeness of the dish, or in its cookery, but in the fantastic mixture of a huge variety of things such as only a contemplative Dutchman could possibly evolve. In the hotels it is the great dish for tiffin. A typical Rice Toffle is heaped upon you as follows:—Immediately after giving your order there bears down upon you a line of ten solemn-faced, turbaned, white-jacketed, unshod Malay waiters each armed with his contribution to your sure present joy and possible future sorrow. Some of these men carry several articles of diet, some only one. The first places an immensely deep soup-plate in front of you and into its depths you are expected to put as much boiled rice as you feel confident of mastering. Most Dutchmen take—as a foundation for their repast—enough rice to make an ordinary meal for commonplace men. Then follow the other waiters holding aloft a bewildering array of cooked or spiced things which the true epicure masses up, over and around the original basis of this extraordinary meal. The mound of rice is lost to view under the beefsteak, cabbage, baked bananas, done-over meats, beans, all sorts of curried affairs, chicken, peanuts, fritters, fried eggs, to say nothing of the pickled things and what-not too numerous to mention. Some of the smaller dishes are very hot and burn your tongue. When this mountainous conglomeration has been heaped up the real Dutchman takes his huge spoon and big fork and mixes the component parts with the rice and then he eats it! Foreigners who are not, so to speak, to the manor born generally do not indulge in all the ingredients composing Rice Toffle. But I confess that, with its almost mystic charm of rarely blissful seasoning, it is a delightful compound although you must, if careful to avoid unhappy consequences, approach it with caution and self-control!

An outstanding feature of life in Java is the social and business position of the Eurasians. While England and America have decided to consider the children of their own white men by dark-skinned mothers as social outcasts, the Dutch of the East Indies have, on the contrary, decided to treat such people of mixed breeds as white persons and accord them the same social status granted the Hollanders of purest white blood. In other words, with the Dutch, a proportion of white blood makes its owner a white person—this being the reverse of what the Englishman or American grants. As a Dutch lady remarked to me, "Java is the paradise of half-castes." When we consider that white men have created a condition for their half-caste offspring, for which the latter are not responsible, it would seem as if the attitude of the Dutch toward this sad problem is one of equity and justice.

WANTED FOR RUSSIA—A MOTOR MECHANIC.

The American Friends' Service Committee is in great need of an expert tractor mechanic to replace a member of its unit in the Russian famine zone who has been in charge of the tractor work, and who is being forced to withdraw on account of illness in his family in America. The need is for some one with combined executive and mechanical ability who can keep the thirteen Mission tractors in good repair, supervise their use by the agricultural schools and communes in the district, and train the natives to use and repair them.

To one who is qualified by experience with tractors to undertake this work, it offers an opportunity to render great service both in producing crops to help terminate the famine and in helping to introduce modern agricultural methods into Russian peasant life.

In order to arrive in Russia in time for the spring plowing, the worker who undertakes this service will need to sail from America by the end of Second Month. Further information may be obtained by writing to the American Friends' Service Committee, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

If you are experienced in working with tractors, this is a call to you!

WELCOMING THE HORSES.

Reports from Russia state that subsequent to the opening of relief work no such explosion of satisfaction has occurred in the famine zone as that which has greeted the first sale of horses by the Quaker Mission. Hand-kissing, exclamations of thanks, and "Glory be to God!" were the order of the day.

As the number of peasants desiring horses is infinitely greater than the number of horses that can be provided, only those can qualify to purchase who possess a family of five or more, who have previously owned a horse, and who have no working stock at present. Each applicant must also possess the harness, equipment and hay necessary to keep the horse in good condition and to work it efficiently.

The horses were all branded with the Quaker star and given a number. The numbers were put on pieces of paper and the eligible peasants—after crossing themselves several times—drew their slips entitling them to a certain horse at a certain appraised price. They all joined in the game with relish, for a horse is the first essential to the peasant's existence. Then they signed their contracts, mounted their animals and paraded in front of the Quaker workers before they rode proudly back to their villages.

Many of the peasants are already at work paying for their horses by hauling supplies for famine relief and by performing other necessary services for the Friends' Mission or for the community. Others will make their payment in grain from next summer's harvest. Payments must be completed within one year.

The shortage of draft animals in the famine zone is one of the most disastrous consequences of the famine. It prevents the peasants from plowing sufficiently, and consequently from raising sufficient food to end the famine.

More horses will be purchased by the Mission as rapidly as funds received in America permit.

HOW FRIENDS STARTED A GARDENING SCHOOL IN POLAND.

The "Gardening School" at Dykainow is in a little village of the same name in eastern Poland. It is just beginning to function actively. It promises to be another of the permanent memorials of the Friends' work in Europe, for it owes its existence to the Polish Relief and Reconstruction Mission of the Society of Friends.

The idea of this school was born in the minds of Harry Stevens, a Mission member, and Pan Gregor, the Powiat school inspector. The latter is a man of energy, resourcefulness and vision. He sees in the new school not merely a place in which to teach a few boys how to pull weeds to the best advantage, but a centre from which will emanate a new rural life for the whole district. He sees from it better men and better homes, better sanitary conditions, better animals and tools and culture and all the things that make life more of a pleasure and less of drudgery. He plans to furnish stock from this source to enable every peasant in the district to have his own garden, with the very best kinds of vegetables and fruits and even flowers.

In the spring of 1921 an advance of 600,000 marks was made to the committee in charge of this school. This enabled them to make a start. The land to be used had formerly belonged to the Russian Church. One of the buildings had been a Russian school, while the other was the "parsonage"—both in bad repair. The land was rich and well-drained, but had lain neglected for years. A gardener was obtained from Galicia. He loved his work and accomplished much during the first summer. Enough apple and pear trees were planted to furnish hundreds of thousands of seedlings for budding.

Before our Mission left the district it ceded to the school two-fifths of the grain to be returned from our oats and barley distributions of that year. This, together with what is to be received from some horses to be sold later, will amount to enough to put the school on its feet. The local Sejm has assumed responsibility for its support and upkeep.

During the past summer great progress was made. The repairs to the building have been completed and the land all brought under cultivation. Quantities of vegetables and flowers were produced, both for seed and for sale.

Now, eighteen months after the first work was done, the school is ready to receive its first 25 young students. The course will take one year. During the winter instruction will be given, not only in subjects directly connected with gardening, but also in the sciences and in accounting. The students are to perform all the labor connected with gardening operations, and in doing so will learn to apply the theoretical knowledge of the class-room.

It seems a splendid thing to have helped in founding an institution which will turn out each year 25 "better farmers." When we realize the influence which these men will have on their communities, we know that this school alone would vindicate our Mission's having been in Poland.

ARTHUR GAMBLE.

WHAT KINDS OF CLOTHING ARE NEEDED IN RUSSIA?

A letter has just been received by the American Friends' Service Committee, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., from Hannah Pickering, who is in charge of the clothing department of the American Quaker Relief Mission in the Russian famine zone. In this letter, the writer outlines the present clothing needs in the famine zone, and her suggestions will be found helpful to clothing contributors.

She emphasizes the need for warm woolen goods in the piece, as they can be made into clothing by the women of the famine zone. Each of the Quaker outposts has a sewing-room, and the women do the work in it in return for their food rations. When they make the clothes themselves they can use Russian patterns, and the garments produced are best suited to the need.

Hannah Pickering states that there is great need of clothing for children of school age, six to sixteen. Many of the children cannot go to school because they do not have enough clothes. Warm underwear, overalls and trousers, shirts and dresses are greatly needed; also overcoats, warm caps, gloves and shoes. The last should be heavy and high, with rounded toes.

Adult clothing is in demand for both men and women; warm, solid underwear and outer garments being both needed. There is also need for garments for hard wear, and overalls, warm shirts, warm jackets and skirts will be very gladly received. There is a great shortage of men's gloves.

While everything sent to the famine zone is put to some use, Hannah Pickering states that care must be taken not to send clothing which is not worth the cost of transport. High-heeled shoes, with pointed toes, for example, cannot be given out except in the Children's Homes, as the peasants have very broad feet. Second-hand underclothing is of use only when it is heavy and in good condition. Tight-fitting women's dresses and coats are of comparatively little use, as the peasant women are of large build and are used to garments which fit loosely. Cotton stockings do not last long with the hard wear given to them, and it is recommended that only woolen stockings and socks should be sent. Very much in demand is the yarn to make such socks and stockings. The peasants are used to wearing heavy homespun clothes which will stand all kinds of wear, so that all clothing must possess solid wearing qualities.

"The peasants will do almost anything in return for warm clothing," writes Hannah Pickering in conclusion. "The great shortage of fuel makes the problem of keeping them warm this winter a tremendous one, and I hope the people at home will realize how much good warm clothing means to these peasants who must live through such extremely cold winters under such great difficulties as those now experienced by them during the famine."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

INCOME TAX EXEMPTIONS.—All contributions to the American Friends' Service Committee are deductible on income tax returns. In case this is questioned, kindly refer to letter from the Treasury Department signed by Ephraim Lederer under date of Second Month 28, 1921, and confirmed on Twelfth Month 20, 1921.

THE Trustees of the John Woolman Memorial Association held a well-attended meeting in the Court House at Mt. Holly, N. J., on the afternoon of First-day the 14th ult., at three o'clock. The occasion was in the interest of the American Friends' Service Committee. Henry Tatnal Brown, of Moorestown, presided, and after a general review of the work and conditions in Russia, introduced successively Elizabeth M. Shipley and Mary Hannum, who gave vivid accounts of their work and experiences in Germany.

Great interest was expressed by their hearers, who would have numbered more had not the day been rainy; the sum of $22.50 was contributed toward the work.

THE latest evidence of the interest in China regarding Friends is to be seen in the Eleventh Month issue of the Chinese Recorder published by the Presbyterian Press, Shanghai. This magazine gives a long and appreciative review of Henry Hodgkin's new book "The Christian Revolution," which is being published in China by the Y. W. C. A. and is expected soon in England from the Swarthmore Press. The Recorder also gives a long quotation from the extracts from Part 1 of the London Discipline—"Christian Life, Faith and Thought." Another of the books noticed is "What the Churches Stand for," and attention is drawn to the paper contributed on the Society to this volume by Edward Grubb.

THE autumn term of the Woodbrooke School is just completed. Germany, Holland, Norway, Denmark, Austria, Tasmania and Ireland have been represented among the forty-five students in residence. Some students have taken specialized courses in education, sociology and international relations, while others devote their time mainly to Biblical and religious subjects. Keen interest is shown in the Quaker Study Circle, which is largely attended. A discussion circle on the "Treatment of Crime," arranged by Birmingham Young Friends, also meets at Woodbrooke.

A Quarterly Meeting of Friends recently, instead of contributing only the reduced quota asked for by the Yearly Meeting, had sent up an amount slightly in excess of the larger quota of the year before. The minute of the Quarterly Meeting on the subject, which was read, is as follows:—

"In sending forward our Quarterly Meeting's contribution to the Yearly Meeting Fund we wish to express our regret at the suggestion contained in the minute of last Yearly Meeting that a curtailment of monetary grants from this Fund for the various branches of the Society's work may become necessary. In order to assist as far as we can in preventing such a catastrophe, we have disregarded the reduction of our quota and have sent up an amount slightly in excess of last year's contribution. We desire that the central work and activities of the Society may not be hampered by lack of funds, and sincerely hope that the reduction of grants proposed by the committee on Accounts will not need to be put into operation."

AMONG the latest publications of Friends' books must be noted Rachel Knight's "The Founder of Quakerism." This is the author's thesis written for the degree of Ph. D. in 1919 at Iowa State University. It has personally appeared in part or entire in pamphlet form and is a real contribution to the already loaded shelf of books that treat of the life and teachings of Fox.

At the time of her death in Ninth Month, 1921, Rachel Knight was professor of psychology at the State College of South Dakota. The book was not through the press at the time, so that her executors committed to A. Barratt Brown the task of completing it. The volume opens with a few introductory notes by him.

FRIENDS everywhere should lend the weight of their influence to the prison reform movement that seems to be gaining the attention of the people. Adolph Lewisohn, President of the National Committee on Prison and Prison Labor, has recently paid the following tribute to Friends through the efforts of Elizabeth Fry and her associates in the prisons of London over a century ago.

"Elizabeth Fry set forth the truth that the lot of the prisoner could be made tolerable only by giving him productive work to do, and practically every step of progress in improving the lot of prisoners and lifting the level of prison administration has been brought about by applying Elizabeth Fry's doctrine. The goal at which all efforts for amelioration should aim is that every prison shall be a workshop for restoring prisoners at the end of their terms to civil life in condition to be useful members of the community."

PAUL JONES, formerly Bishop of Utah, who is well known to many Friends through his service as secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, was recently nominated as missionary Bishop of Eastern Oregon. Although he was not elected, his nomination in the house of Bishops caused considerable comment, as he had resigned his jurisdiction of Utah in 1918 because of his views on social questions and on the war. He remains a Bishop without jurisdiction and with a seat and vote in the House of Bishops.

At the rooms of the Gennett Phonograph Building in Richmond, Indiana, Timothy Nicholson made two interesting records which will have doubtless great historical value in years to come. Both dealt with his own recollections of two great movements with which he had been intimately connected. One was the abolition of corporal punishment in Indiana prisons (a reform which later spread all over the world), and the other had to do with the history of the Richmond Declaration of Faith, and the establishment of the Five Years' Meeting. The story of the latter was given, we are told, in a most simple but telling style.

A FIFTH edition of the selection of Whitier's poems with an introduction by our Friend, Howard Hodgkin, has just been issued by E. P. Dutton, New York. Not only is this little book of 250 pages a marvel of cheapness in its attractive green cloth binding, but it is also an interesting example of the "Obrol" printing process, which we understand is partly a photographic method of reproduction.

NOTICES.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING will occur Third-day, Second Month 6th, at 10.30 o'clock. The Meeting for Ministers and Elders will be held Second-day, at 2.30.

ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING will be held at Germantown, on Fifth-day, the 8th, convening at four o'clock. The Meeting for Ministers and Elders will be the preceding day at ten o'clock.

ON Third-day, the sixth of Second Month, there will be another meeting of the Women's Problems Group. The subject will be: "The Cornell Clinic—a new way to health." Preventive medicine and medical examinations of healthy people with the idea of keeping them well are subjects of the greatest practical interest and value to us all. The health of the nation is one of the most serious problems of our social order. All who are interested are invited. The meeting will be at eleven o'clock, at 20 S. Twelfth Street.

A MEETING for worship is appointed to be held at Wilgus Hall, Hattboro, on First-day afternoon, Second Month 4th, at three o'clock. A cordial invitation is extended to all interested.

DR. HENRY T. HODGKIN is to address a number of meetings in Philadelphia, on Second Month 16th, 17th and 18th. Fuller details in next week's issue. Please reserve the dates.

Is Your Home Truly Modern?

Owners of houses built a decade or more ago often find bath-room facilities altogether too inadequate for modern requirements.

The problem in such homes is how to expand Sanitary Equipment in the present structures; to secure the comfort and convenience of additional bath-rooms without rebuilding.

You will find much practical help in a Pamphlet we can send showing how such plans may be carried out at an economical outlay.

THE INNER LIGHT AND THE OUTWARD ORDER.

I remember that a few years ago, during the war, Isaac Sharpless once spoke to me regarding Quakerism in its relation to the world about us. He commented upon the fact that with respect to a number of practices and institutions which in the past men commonly accepted, Friends were notably in advance of their day in seeing the evil of those practices, and in pointing the way to a better mode of life. Our position on war, on slavery, on dealings with the Indians, on capital punishment, on the use of intoxicants are instances of such cases as I think he had in mind. The number and character of these cases seemed to him to indicate that it was not just chance which had led to this; that Friends had not merely stumbled upon these advanced views which, as the years pass, history seems to be vindicating. He felt that some reason underlay these occurrences. How came it that Friends arrived before others at right conclusions on these matters? What was the secret of the moral insight by which they detected wrong where as yet the majority of their fellows saw none? It was Isaac Sharpless's thought that these questions invited a serious inquiry and study which might well prove useful.

I do not know that any complete and clear explanation has ever been given on this point, and I am far from presuming to attempt it. Yet perhaps some suggestion of a clue is to be found in the consideration that Quakerism has combined in an unusual degree a belief in the Inner Light and an emphasis upon Christian practice. The Inner Light—the conviction that there is “something of God” in every man which makes it possible to have direct communion with Him—the dominating experience and the central message of the founders of Quakerism. On the other hand, the early Friends had another central strand running through their faith which preserved them from ineffective Quietism. Their Inner Light was not mere mystical rapture or spiritual self-indulgence, but a source of power for the regeneration of men and the transformation of this actual, present world into a society which should truly express the will of God and the brotherhood of men.

Neither of these religious concepts is the possession of the Society of Friends alone, and neither by itself would have imparted to Quakerism so distinctive a quality as it has. It is the joining of these two vital strands, woven together to make the warp and weft of religion, which give to Quakerism a special significance. Yet if this combination is in some degree unique it is not because these two qualities of faith are in any sense incompatible. On the contrary, it seems that a sense of the imperativeness of Christian practice more naturally accompanies a belief in the Inner Light than it does a religion based upon any outward authority. Perhaps here we are approaching the region in which the answer to Isaac Sharpless's inquiry is to be found.

There are two conceptions which, I think, characterize, frequently, if not always, the religion of those who are most earnestly seeking to transform the world into the likeness of the Kingdom of Heaven. Such persons hold the conviction, in the first place, that love, or fellowship, is the deepest and highest principle for human relationships; and, secondly, they believe that this present world, in which we live and work and eat and sleep and learn and grow, for better or worse, is the realm wherein men must work out their salvation together, and that the cause which Christ has committed to his followers is the cause of making this life a splendid, co-operative enterprise, in which we help one another to grow up, as individuals and as a human family, into the measure of the stature of our Leader. Both of these regulative principles, if they do not actually spring from the knowledge of religion as an inward experience, seem to accompany and belong with such an attitude more naturally than they go with the belief of Augustinian theology that man by nature is a depraved “worm of the dust,” unable to help himself up from his degraded condition, and that his salvation is miraculously wrought for him by means entirely outside himself. So long as you hold that view of your neighbor it is difficult to see how fellowship and brotherhood can mean anything very fine or very vital. But once you see in every man something of the Divine nature capable of responding to God and to the same Divine nature in every other man, you lift human personality and love and fellowship into the highest spiritual realm. Only under such a conception of man does it seem possible for love to become the supreme law of life. And that this belief in and practice of the Inner Light may really work out into a more vital fellowship with all men is exemplified by John Woolman. Of him Herbert Wood writes: “The first effect of his conversion was to make him seek for inward retirement, and it was in and through his personal communion with God that his love for his fellows grew.”

Belief in the Inner Light seems to be, also, the natural soil from which should spring the purpose to build up here and now on this earth the conditions of the good life. So long as men believe that salvation comes, not by inward transformation, but by outward means not related to our ordinary life, it would hardly seem likely that they will be greatly concerned to change the world. They may regret the sufferings of others, and endeavor to alleviate their hardships, and deplore the inhumanities of war, but they will still feel that these things do not touch the destinies of the human soul. If men suffer and injure one another here on earth, it is sad but it is not vital, for it is a temporary thing which does not affect salvation, and in the Heavenly Beyond those who are “saved” will be better and happier. The man, however, who finds his religion in the inward experience of the Spirit, as Quakerism does, will not take this indifferent attitude toward life. It seems to him that to attain Christlikeness men must travel this road of inward growth of character, and he sees this commonplace, everyday world of ours as the scene of the mighty drama of making man in the image of God. Man's life and the conditions of man's life are of the highest importance because it is in this life and under these conditions that man must achieve his spiritual development. The sources of his power to do this are to be sought within, but the outward forces of life about him and his environment are intimately connected with and vitally affect his freedom to develop. The pioneers of Quakerism were fully alive to this connection between the inner and the outer life. Not in spite of, but perhaps because of their faith in the Inner Light "they never lost hold upon the central purpose of their lives—to transform the present world and these actual human fellows about them to the end that the will of God might become the will of men, and that society here on earth might take on a likeness to the Kingdom of Heaven. . . . The peculiar 'testimonies' which played such a striking rôle in the early period of Quakerism had their origin and ground in the deep-seated purpose to break down the slavery of superficial fashions and cramping customs, and to restore individual responsibility, spiritual initiative and personal autonomy. Man himself, in his inherent Divine rights and his eternal destiny, is put in the place of sacred and time-honored systems. Whatever hampers, limits, restrains, spoils human powers is to go down at all costs in life and suffering, and whatever enlarges, liberates and lifts man has a place in the programme of these 'Children of the Light.'"

This religion of Quakerism calls for continual re-interpretation, from age to age, by each generation of Friends. By its rejection of dogma, its realization that final truth can never be fully expressed in creeds, and its reliance upon experience, it should come to its great task free from the domination of tradition. Yet it can escape that domination only if Friends constantly keep it alive and fresh, and reinterpret its meaning for the changing conditions of the world. The suffering and conflict which we see on a gigantic scale today constitute a terrific challenge to the kind of religion which I have been trying to describe. Our part as Friends is to see that we possess and radiate a Quakerism fitted to meet, not the conditions of George Fox's time, or of any period between then and now, but of our own world in our day. We are facing an international situation which confronts us with a chaos of disorder, misery, fear, hatred and conflict. The curse of war is on the world, and threatens mankind with still more terrible savagery. Industrial unrest flows around us in our nation and in our own communities, and tells us that the world of industry and business is another region where self-interest and antagonism and unwholesome conditions are hampering man's march toward fellowship. Unless we are willing to live in selfish isolation or heedless superficiality, conditions such as these will not let us go contentedly about our own affairs. They make demands upon us, and insistently ask us questions. They ask us whether Friends are devoting themselves to meeting these great international and industrial situations with the two-fold religion which is their heritage, appealing to men to seek inwardly for God and the transformation of their hearts, and at the same time showing men how to translate the Christ spirit and give it effect in a practical way of life.

Of one thing let us be sure—that Quakerism, if it is to prove adequate for the requirements of life, must preserve this double quality of faith in the Inner Light and of summons to a way of life. Experience of the Inner Light which is not translated into action for building up a truly Christian society here on earth will not make a winning appeal to the hearts of most men. And mere humanitarian efforts for social reform which do not draw their power from the depths of spiritual life within are not likely to have the moral vision or intensity needed for the supreme crusade to overcome evil with good. What is needed is persons qualified for the work by this two-fold faith. It should be the glory of the Society of Friends to be a fellowship which will help men and women to find and carry abroad that kind of religion.

EDWARD W. EVANS.

The Quaker Church in The Lebanon.

An Estimate of the "State of the Society."

Those who remember that a Quaker outpost has been maintained in and around Brummana for fifty years may be surprised to know that the total membership of the Society of Friends in Syria is less than one hundred. So small a result numerically may seem disappointing. It will be well to leave the argument of counted heads, for while it is true on the one hand that the influence of Friends in Syria is quite out of proportion to their numbers, and while it is well urged that "quality is its own multiplication table," on the other hand it is only too easy to console oneself for failure with easy reflections of this kind. It will be more useful to explain the historical reason for the small membership.

Rightly or wrongly the foreign Quaker ambassadors coming to this country have consistently and on principle refused to proselytize. A large proportion of the Lebanese are Christians belonging to one of the two great traditional churches. There is spiritual life to be found in those churches; are we to despair of their reformation from error and formalism? We have urged our neighbors, as our ancestors in England did, to come away from their dead formalities, but not to leave their churches. We have rather adapted the Quaker answer about the sword, "Stay as long as thou canst." The result has been varied. A certain number of those friendly disposed to the Society still find it possible to attend our meetings as well as their own services and remain in the Roman or Greek Church. Others, while Quakers in all essentials, hesitate to separate themselves from friends whom they hope to influence, and so do not take the step of definite membership. A few decide that it is impossible to be true to spiritual religion without the protest of severance; while positively they want a home and fellowship. As a result of the demand of such the Friends' Church was first organized; but it has always remained small.

There is at present among us a friend—a true Friend in everything—one of the most useful in the congregation. He takes part in the ministry frequently and under sense of guidance. His communications are fresh, stimulating and spiritual. He has never applied for membership, and this not from any procrastination or neglect of facing the question. He has felt that sectarianism is so great an obstacle to the cause of Christ that he cannot countenance it by transference of his name. It is a matter of great regret to miss his help in church meetings, but of course his honest conviction is respected.

There are two sides to the question. It may be said that if we lay no emphasis on membership, we do indeed respect conviction in some cases, but we neglect to help others to have the courage of their convictions. The problem is stated here to show the effect of the policy of the past upon the numerical strength of the church.

We suffer sadly from another fact which is quite out of our control. The continual tide of emigration from this country strips it of its most enterprising youth; and it has been disheartening time and time again to receive a young man or woman into the Society only to lose the new member traveling abroad. Granted the political and economic conditions which produce this emigration it is only natural that this church should suffer severely. The young people whose courage is sufficient to break with associations are sure to be the first to make the adventure of emigration. One can account too for the tendency to join us just before they leave the country. They have decided that they agree with the Quaker standpoint, and want to travel with the full support of the Church behind them. The prospect of departure helps to bring them to the point. The last three admissions to membership have been in order these: a young man who is taking up business in Cairo; a young woman engaged to a Syrian farmer in the Transvaal; and a young man who after sending in his application started for America at short notice before he could be visited. In the last case the meeting was doubtful as to his admission, but he wrote from the far West of the United States pleading his cause so earnestly that with a good report from the members to whom he was known, no doubt was felt that the right course was to admit him. But what chance has the Church in Syria?

We do not overlook the fact that such members may go out themselves as ambassadors, and each might be the nucleus of a fresh centre. We make efforts to retain contact with them and to put them in touch with sympathizers. But it is hardly surprising that there are no records of large results. A young man isolated, say, in a city of South America, needs a remarkable enthusiasm to make any impression beyond the personal influence of a high standard of life. This, we believe, most of the members abroad do exert; and not only they, but other emigrants who have absorbed in our schools some of the Quaker ideal. A recent letter from Brazil spoke of a brother and sister reading together a Christian periodical to keep themselves from drift; and these were not even members. Thus to some degree an extensive if not an intensive work is done in several of the United States, more than one country of South America, South Africa, and Australia.

The small Church which survives these two difficulties, is, we may hope, in quality the stronger. The organization consists of two Preparative Meetings and one Quarterly, of which the latter is the final authority. Founded by Friends from abroad, and for years chiefly guided by them, it has always aimed at free development, and particularly since the war has made marked progress. The foreign members increasingly find that they can take a less conspicuous part in the proceedings. It is infrequent that any English Friend addresses the morning meeting for worship in Brummana; there is sufficient ministry among the Arabic speaking members. The congregation is rarely less than fifty, and in summer is often much greater. In Ras-el-Metn, the meeting is increased by the eighty orphans under the charge of Friends' missionaries, and numbers generally over one hundred on First-day morning. These are real Quaker meetings. There is no pre-arrangement, and intervals of silence, though not often long, are generally understood. A meeting is also held at the house of Dr. Boshara Manasseh in Antelias, where some forty or fifty persons gather every week. Cottage meetings of a simple type are held fairly regularly in three other villages where the ways of Friends are less known.

We are convinced that the Church has a very real life of its own, and would illustrate it in one or two ways. We are told that throughout the war, the First-day meeting in Brummana was not once omitted. This is a really striking fact. Friends in Lebanon had suddenly lost all foreign help, and came under the suspicion of the authorities as having intimate connection with the English. There was much resolution in facing the discouragement of their stripped condition, and much courage in quietly continuing the method of worship which might be looked on with disfavor. When English Friends were able to return they joyfully recognized that the experience had not been lost. Syrians were now prepared to carry a much larger responsibility. In one direction a definite transference has been made; some village school work formerly under the charge of missionaries has been handed to a Committee of the Society. Even in the manner of accepting this charge the Church knew its own mind; for while the proposition of transference was expected to come before the Quarterly Meeting, it was seized first by a Preparative Meeting which showed strong desire itself to carry the duty and privilege. Another matter which has lately been prominently discussed is union with other Evangelical Churches in the country. An English Friend made the suggestion that as a preliminary step toward mutual recognition, our business meetings should be open to other Protestants. This provoked much interested debate, in which it appeared that the Syrian view did not favor indiscriminate invitation, but would rather give particular welcome to picked individuals who had shown their sympathy with our outlook, in whatever Church their membership happened to be. It need hardly be said that the English members cordially acquiesced, in the belief that this conclusion was more likely to be right than that of the foreigner.

It may be supposed that the ministry of women is somewhat restricted in this country, yet it is worthy of note that a woman Friend admirably fills the post of clerk to Brummana Preparative Meeting. In the public meeting at Antelias a Syrian lady takes some share in the vocal ministry.

The position held by the Society among Evangelical Churches of the country is rather harder to estimate. There have been few opportunities so far of organized intercourse. Friends have generally taken a share in any there have been. A prominent Presbyterian calls us "the one obstacle to Protestant Union in the country," meaning that the differences of the other existing denominations could be more easily overcome than could the question of outward sacraments. We are geographically a small bite out of a large Presbyterian field. Yet we have been told by other Presbyterian leaders that they would consider it a calamity if Friends disappeared, as they consider our special emphasis very valuable in its influence on their own Church.

It has been seen that in government the Society in Syria is largely independent. It remains to remark on its degree of moral and material dependence of foreign help. The war years are a proof that it might at least exist without resident English helpers. That it would be with a struggle and at great loss is the judgment of the leading members, who value advice the more because it is advice and has ceased to be authority. For the Quaker Church in Syria to be wholly independent, even if possible, is still undesirable. Among the chief activities of the Mission from which the Church has sprung is the High School work. The Church is not strong enough to carry this responsibility; yet without it there is small chance of training leaders in Quaker thought and practice. Again in the vocal ministry, while the Arabic speaking is carried, and well carried, by Syrian Friends, the help of the foreigners is given in fostering a background of instruction and wider contacts. It is generally agreed that although the Church is moving in the right direction, and the aim of complete independence is kept in view, the time is not yet ripe for English support to be withdrawn.

WHY IS IT?

Why are ye so fearful? how is it that ye have no faith? And he marvelled because of their unbelief. (Mark iv: 40; vi: 6.)

Some day, when our pilgrimage journey is over,
When lessons are past and the schooling is done,
When we share in the glory the Father has given
Through ages unnumbered, to Jesus his Son;

When we shall look back on the way He hath led us
And think of the fears and the dangers thereof;
When we shall remember how oft He delivered,
How many his mercies, how faithful his love;

Ah, then we shall marvel that ever we doubted,
That ever our faith was so weak and so small,
That ever our eyes were so blind to his glory,
Our hearts so unready to answer his call.

And through all eternity how we shall wonder
That we were so slow to believe all his Word;
That we were so slothful in claiming his promise,
So careless of sharing the joy of our Lord.

—ANNIE JOHNSON FLINT.

EXTRACTS FROM A LETTER FROM ALFRED C. GARRETT.

EISENACH, First Month 16, 1923.

We have now left Berlin for the next two months, and have started on a special undertaking on our way to Frankfurt,—viz., holding three Conferences and attending three Meetings for Worship at Eisenach, Cassel and Elberfeld. The first of these, at this place from which I am now writing,—Eisenach, is completed, and has been most satisfactory: on Seventh-day evening Agnes and I gave addresses at an informal gathering of 200 people; next morning we had an almost ideal Friends' Meeting for Worship of 35 people; then a small Conference (like a Friends' Business Meeting) was held in the afternoon, at which it was decided to set up a regular Meeting for Worship here for the first time. Then in the evening I gave an address on "George Fox and the Origin of Quakerism." We felt that the whole thing was a great success; the Berlin Friends thought it was one of the best occasions of the sort they had had; and as this is the religious centre of Germany (the place where Luther translated the New Testament) where national religious conferences are held, and many religious movements start, we feel the starting of a Friends' Meeting here is of a good deal of significance. We hope Friends will visit here regularly and help maintain this Meeting. There are two exceptionally fine leaders,—one, the most progressive pastor of the city, a widely known liberal and social democrat of great ability and personal charm; he reminds me of Dr. Wilfred Grenfell in appearance.

Please tell Max Reich I especially hope that when he comes over he will visit Guben and stay there and work for a while; it's a city of 40,000 (same size as this), 100 miles southeast of Berlin, which I ran down to one First-day and had a couple of informal Meetings with a small group, under Hedwig Nabholtz.

Our third present objective, Elberfeld, is in the Ruhr district, and this morning's paper says it is about to be occupied by the French troops; but Friends don't seem to think this will interfere with our going. The Germans appear to be content with "passive resistance,"—except for a little local rioting. It may be very interesting to be there!

But I must stop this. Thank thee for thy kind words of encouragement. We all join (including Caroline Norment) in cordial greetings and Christian love.

Sincerely thy friend,

ALFRED C. GARRETT.

I'm sure I did reply that I favored publishing Henri Van Etten's "George Fox" and that it would cost about $25, but I am not connected with the money side of it and do not know how the money should be furnished or the work done. There no doubt knows that Mark Hayler has resigned as Secretary of the Paris Centre. I should think it would all be done through Carl Heath.

"THE PASSING OF THE COUNTY JAIL."

A campaign to put the county jail out of existence in ten years is being initiated in Pennsylvania.

The man who is heading the movement is not, so far as I know, the lineal descendant of John Howard or Elizabeth Fry, but he has undoubtedly much of their spirit. It is interesting that he should be engaged in such work in view of the fact that his previous training would seem to lie in a wholly different field. Dr. George W. Kirchwey is a lawyer by profession and was some years ago the Dean of the Columbia University Law School. Lawyers have the reputation of being ultra-conservative and of caring more for technical points than for human values. Here, at any rate, is an exception. Dr. Kirchwey became interested in prisons through his friend Thomas Mott Osborne, whom he succeeded as warden of Sing Sing. When such a man is prepared to devote the greater part of his time to the improvement of our penal system all who are interested in constructive reforms may well rally to his support.

Dr. Kirchwey has made a thorough study of the existing conditions in our county jails, which, he says, are substantially the same as they were one hundred years ago when Pennsylvania was one of the leaders in penal reform. We have made no fundamental changes in a century and our jails still "perpetuate many of the worst evils of the English system which roused John Howard in the eighteenth century." Single cells, about three feet by six feet, often contain four men crowded together without regard to individual age, health or previous criminal record. In such places it is not possible to keep in good health more than a few months. The blankets under which the men lie are washed, as one keeper declared, "whenever necessary." Upon being questioned, he said that they were sent to the laundry every other winter or so! But, beside the physical, there is also a moral menace in these dirty, crowded cells. Here are the universities where crime is taught to novices by competent instructors. The old, inhuman rule of silence is still very generally enforced and not more than a small proportion of the men are given employment during their whole period of confinement. Pennsylvania keeps its prisoners in idleness more constantly than all the other States of the Union.

How is it, then, that many of us have gained the impression that conditions have been improved in recent years? Dr. Kirchwey admits that certain superficial changes have been made in response to humanitarian effort. The lock step is gone: but the men still march in silent, single file in substantially the same way as of old. Newcomers are obliged to take baths upon arrival: but as they put their soiled clothes on again afterwards, the bath does not secure any very real cleanliness. A medical inspection is also given new arrivals, but it takes only a few seconds on the average, a part of which time is taken in recording the name and record of the man on a card. To an intelligent observer it is clear that a very serious medical and social problem is involved, and that such changes as have been made have been mere salves to the feelings of respectable citizens than fundamental reforms of the system which is still punitive and not reformatory.

At present a return to the strictest discipline is being made in many places. The severe jailers and keepers are replacing the more humane men appointed some years ago. Only the other day one of our wardens gave Dr. Kirchwey a sample of his greeting to a new inmate. "I tell him that I consider he's a yellow dog and that all we can do to him is not enough punishment for him." In such ingenious ways a beginner in crime may be brutalized and made into a permanent criminal. In too many cases the problem of the individual is entirely lost sight of in the triumph of the system.

Dr. Kirchwey has a strong sense of human brotherhood and of the responsibility of the rest of us for the erring members of our social order. He desires to see the criminal treated as an individual and given every chance to reform. To this end he believes it necessary to substitute work in the open for solitary confinement. As it is impossible on any one county farm to finance operations on such a scale as to provide work for all the men, the new plan is to have a few large State institutions where the men can operate a big farm and a number of machine shops.

At present we are suffering from the anti-humanitarian back-wash of the war, but Dr. Kirchwey says he finds this balanced by the growing sense of public responsibility for social conditions. Considerable interest has already been aroused in penal reform. People are not merely saying, "Isn't it awful? Who'd have thought of it?" but they are also saying "It must be stopped. What can we do?"

Dr. Kirchwey spoke recently to the members of the Women's Problems Group, making a sincere and moving appeal for the support of Friends. It is with the idea of extending to others the inspiration of his talk that this brief summary has been written. Dr. Kirchwey wants to form local groups to assist him in his work. He also needs financial help. Surely the least that we can all do is to mail a check to the Penal Reform Society, 419 S. Fifteenth Street.

MAKING DOLLARS DO DOUBLE DUTY.

Those of us who have heard Dr. Kirchwey or have read the above article will be glad to know that Warden McKenty has arranged for some of the prisoners in our Eastern State Penitentiary to knit socks for the American Friends' Service Committee, if the Committee will furnish the wool. These machine-made socks can be knit very rapidly and are thoroughly satisfactory. The Service Committee has asked for money to take advantage of this offer and every dollar we send in to them at 20 S. Twelfth Street marked, "To buy wool for prisoners' knitting," will do double duty by giving worth while work to men who need it sorely and by providing socks for those who greatly need them.

JAPAN NOTES.

On Eleventh Month 18, 1922, the thirty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Friends' Girls' School in Tokyo was celebrated with appropriate exercises. Invitations were sent to all the alumnae and patrons of the school. A set of post-cards of the school buildings and class-rooms were presented to the guests as well as a statement of the need for a gymnasium as an anniversary gift. A translation of the wording of the invitation follows:—

"Our school was founded in October the twenty-second year of Meiji. At that time there were no government high schools for girls and our school, as a pioneer, could contribute a great deal to the education of Japanese women.

"Since then the education of Japanese women has taken a great stride forward by opening many girls' high schools all over Japan and now there are a few institutions for the higher education of women. Japanese education, however, has the tendency to put emphasis only upon the intellectual side neglecting the spiritual and physical training. We believe that our school must promote specially these two sides.

"Since our school was founded for Christian education, it is not necessary to say more about spiritual training. To promote the nation's health, the first step is to improve the constitution of women which is inferior to other nations in physical power and longevity. This is the reason why we are going to build a gymnasium to commemorate the thirty-fifth anniversary of our school. Though we do not want an elaborate building we need 20,000 yen ($10,000) to provide a suitable building for that purpose. We ask your help to attain this object.

"From the beginning the support of the school has come from Friends of Philadelphia. We cannot fully express our thanks for their kindness. Now our school has reached the thirty-fifth year, the age of independence according to Confucius, and we want the Japanese people to help us to mark the new era by providing a gymnasium. The eleventh year of Taisho.

The Women's Peace Conference at The Hague.

[We have before us two reports of the recent Peace Conference at The Hague. Each is crowded with facts and both are very illuminating. We have done our best at combining the two.—EDS.]

BERLIN, N. W. 7,
Twelfth Month 31, 1922.

TO THE PEACE COMMITTEE OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS:—

Dear Friends:—Your credentials to the Conference of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, held at The Hague, Twelfth Month 7th to 9th, inclusive, were received. We attended all the sessions except an adjourned one on First-day the 10th, when we went to Bilthoven for the day.

The program bore the heading, "A New Peace Women's Conference Organized by the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom." The general subjects of the sessions were:—

(1) General Effects of the Peace Treaties; (2) Political Effects; (3) Economic Effects; (4) Military Effects; (5) Psychic Effects.

A reception was held at the Hotel Witteburg, on the evening of the 6th, but our train was very late and we were not in time to do more than greet a few old friends. The first business session convened at 9.30 on the morning of the 7th. Jane Addams, serene and self-poised, was in the chair. On her right sat Catherine Marshall of England, Vice-President of the W. I. L. At her left the charming and accomplished Dutch hostess of the Conference, Madame Ramondt, whose tall, fair-haired young daughter was one of the pages and also acted at one public meeting as interpreter for Jane Addams.

Jane Addams opened the Conference by briefly stating that it had been called because it seemed necessary for the world to consider a new peace. She believed it urgent that a world conference of all nations should be called to re-consider the Peace Treaties, that as always before in history, the conquered meet with the conquerors to make the peace. That such a peace should take into consideration the good of all nations.

As my eye roamed over the room from the vantage point of the U. S. Section, at the left of the platform, I found about thirty familiar faces from England, France, Germany and America. Three of the pacifist women we had met in Paris were there. The three internationalists who spoke in Philadelphia last spring were present. The English Section showed such lights as Ruth Fry, Marion Fox, Lord and Lady Parmoor, Margaret Bonfield, the Pethick-Lawrences and others whose names were familiar, but whose faces I could not recognize. In the United States Section there were thirteen members of the Society of Friends and several like Margaret Sherman and her mother who are so closely connected with Friends as to seem like members. It was a matter of comment that since the Conference was assembled on such short notice, there should be thirty Americans present, representing twenty different societies.

The membership of the Conference comprised 350 delegates, representing 111 societies, which in turn represented over 20,000,000 people. Nineteen nations were represented. The extraordinary unanimity of the speakers from all the nations was a most striking feature of the Conference. A deep and solemn conviction of the wrong and failure of the Peace Treaties bound all together in a common spirit and purpose. Catherine Marshall in one of her brilliant speeches called attention to the fact that it was the oppressors and not the oppressed who had called this Conference. It is England, America and France who are asking that the wrongs of Germany and Austria be righted.

All agreed that the Peace Treaties had failed because they are militaristic, undemocratic, partial and punitive in their nature. The exclusion of the vanquished from the Peace Conference of the victors was unprecedented in history and has had its inevitable psychological and therefore political effects.

Ruth Fry reminded us that victors and vanquished alike are feeling the suffering that there is a great spiritual need in the world which women should supply. Nationalism, she said, is a disease we suffer from only when we are grown up. Children do not have it. It is for women to take the lead in fighting this disease and create an atmosphere in which its germs cannot flourish.

Catherine Marshall of England said, "that all the nations cannot give more than justice, as the Quakers had—mercy and justice." "I am not unpatriotic, but I was ashamed of my country when I saw what the blockade had done to Germany. And if I were a German I would have felt the same way. When I saw the devastated regions of France." "We shall not get a new peace until the nations approach it with humility. Only when we turn away from the wickedness we have permitted and do that which is lawful and right shall we save our soul alive." "We must do away with the conditions which produce war." She ended with a note of hope that the reconciliation of the peoples may not be as far away as we think.

Sir George Paish captured the imagination of the Conference by pointing out the financial way to a new peace. He said in part:—All the great nations of Europe except England are on the verge of bankruptcy, and this condition is spreading. The incomes of the nations are also shrinking. Such a situation has never before occurred in history, and nothing really has been done to avert the peril. This condition was of course caused in the first instance by the war, not by the Treaties; but the Treaties have accentuated the effects of the war. International Trade has now shrunk to very small proportions; yet half the population of England is dependent on it,—soon they will be starving. America thinks she can stand aloof, because she can be self-supporting; but she could not become so for fifty years, and the process would be very painful. Already (e. g.) her cotton market is immensely overstocked for lack of a European market. Unless America helps Europe to get upon its feet, her cotton-growers will soon be bankrupt and the banks connected with them. The power of Europe to buy is decreasing, not increasing. Canada and Australia are worse off than America. The Treaties should have looked to the well-being of all nations, not simply the victors. The whole of the Treaty of Versailles needs to be re-written in the spirit of its first paragraph,—the spirit of friendship and co-operation,—the only spirit that can save the world from bankruptcy. How can we restore the productive power of Europe? The devastated areas must all be restored, to raise production, especially Russia. At an outside estimate 2,000,000,000 pounds would do this. But those countries cannot do this, they can only buy on credit. Credit must be set up. This would steady exchanges,—i. e., permit governments to issue only money that is based on something. Only by thus starting confidence and trade, and increasing their incomes, can the nations pay the interest on their debts at all. Now this credit must be amply secured. Only Russia and Germany, of the nations in question, have potential credit!—Russia in boundless natural resources,—Germany in her wonderful power of labor. In fifty years Russia may become the richest people on earth; Germany also is likely to become rich,—and she will not want war again. As things are now, Germany is the chief one to furnish the credit, and she can do it. During the war, Sir George said, he had decided how much in the way of reparations Germany could pay, and he had found no reason to alter his opinion,—probably 100,000,000 pounds a year for a given number of years, but not now. This amount, used as interest on a loan (4 per cent. and 1 per cent. for Sinking Fund, on 2,000,000,000 pounds) would furnish ample credit to restore Europe. (At this point Count Kessler raised a question,—How could you look forward to such a payment by Germany, when she is not able to pay it now, and her producing power is decreasing! Sir George answered somewhat as follows:;) Germany would only need to give her word of honor, and then the other nations add their guarantees, and at once before any payment is made, great currents of trade will begin to flow, and confidence and good business be re-established. When a contract is signed to build a house, the workmen do not wait for a payment, but start with the work at once, and are paid in instalments as the house rises. Germany's first payment (coming at the end of the first year after the agreement is signed) need only be 20,000,000 pounds—i. e., interest on the first year's instalment of the loan, or 400,000,000 pounds, all that could be absorbed in the work of reconstruction in one year,—only at the end of the fifth year would she pay the whole 100,000,000 pounds. But a real Peace (not an armed peace) will need also to be guaranteed, or the bonds cannot be placed. And back of all must be the spirit of co-operation; it was the great Master who brought this into the world; the question is, will we really do it, and not merely say it? If we will, these things can be done.

Alicia Salomon, a highly respected pacifist, called attention to the fact that the armies of occupation in Germany eat up the reparations. Pethick-Lawrence corroborated this and said that in fact Europe had spent 4,000,000 pounds more than she had received for the reparations, on her army of occupation. France cannot use the money she receives on the reparations to pay the interest on her debt to America. America can't sell her cotton because Germany can't buy it, so German children have no underclothing. German coal must be sent to France, and Germany must buy English coal. France can under-sell English coal, which causes distress in English coal fields. Germany has lost her colonies and hence the income from them. A teacher's salary is 10 marks an hour; a loaf of bread costs 180 marks. (Prices have risen since.) The constant fall of the mark makes it useless to save, for the earnings of today are lost tomorrow. But in spite of the terrible conditions in Germany, Alicia Salomon believes that the young people are full of life and hope. They never expect Germany to be rich again, but they want to build a nation on a better basis than wealth or power.

Madame Melin of France was a very able speaker and appeared a number of times. Her beautiful home in northern France was destroyed by the contending armies. She is an absolute pacifist and full of sympathy for the men in all the armies. She called attention to the fact that women in all the nations made shells with which to kill fathers, brothers, husbands. Pacifists she declared are the only true women at heart.

As three languages were spoken and the translations made very brief it is natural that this report should be more full on the English-speaking side. But the similarity of ideas was very evident when the translations were given.

The vote on the Resolution seemed absolutely unanimous, but it was found that the delegates from Poland and Czechoslovakia did not vote as units. The Peace Treaties gave them largely what they wanted, and some of their delegates fear that a re-writing of the Treaties might prove the worse for them.

THEREFORE

"This Conference demands a New Peace based on New International Agreements, and its members resolve to work unremittably by every means in their power to bring about the convening of a WORLD CONGRESS through the instrumentality of the League of Nations, of a single nation or a group of nations in order to achieve

A NEW PEACE."

AGNES L. TIERNEY,
ALFRED C. GARRETT.

My belief is not confined to the following, but I believe in the ideals of Jesus as standards for the life of to-day.

I believe that His teachings are not an impossible far-off dream of perfection but workable and practicable principles for human conduct in the twentieth century.

I believe that the beatitudes can be applied to business, and the Sermon on the Mount to politics; that the parable of the good Samaritan can be lived up to by a city and the golden rule by a nation.

I believe that it is my high calling as a follower of Jesus to face all the problems of life in a spirit of invincible goodwill; that love never faileth; but that international bitterness and economic discontent, racial prejudice and social unrest, shall yield at last to the practical application of the spirit of the Master; that no lesser voice can say to the troubled family of modern humanity: "Peace be to this house."—A.W. ## CHILDREN'S CORNER.

EBENEZER WORTH.—Way up in New York State, not far from Niagara Falls, is a station called Quaker Bridge. The Seneca Indians gave it that name because it is near the bridge the Philadelphia Friends used when they went up there to their Indian School—Tunesassa. When you go to the Yearly Meeting next Third Month and hear the Indian Report, telling about the little Indian boys and girls at Tunesassa, remember this man I am going to tell you about, who did so much, years ago, for the parents and grandparents of these Indian children, who are now at our School.

This man's name was Ebenezer Worth, and he used to live near Marshallton, in Chester County. He loved the Indians up at Tunesassa, and he used to go there a great deal. The Indians were very fond of him too. One old Indian, named Owen Blacksnake, used to hobble out to Quaker Bridge, which was near his home, everytime the School carriage came to the station to meet company, and open the carriage door to see who was there. If he liked the visitor's looks he nodded his head and said "Ebenezer kind." If he thought the person did not have a loving expression on his face he frowned and said "No Ebenezer kind."

One Superintendent and Matron at Tunesassa Boarding School had a little son about seven years old. Now this little boy was a white child, just like you or I, but he played with the little Indians so much that he learned to talk Indian and almost forgot English.

delphia on one of their visits; while they were there they decided to go over to Quaker Bridge to see Owen Blacksnake. This little boy, whom we will call Dick, asked if he might go along, for he liked Owen Blacksnake very much. While they were making the call, Dick heard Owen tell Ebenezer Worth about something the Indians bought at a hotel near there. Owen seemed very much worried about it because the thing was very bad for the Indians. They drank it and then they did things they knew were bad and never did except when they had been drinking this stuff. When they left Owen Blacksnake's house little Dick was very much surprised to hear Ebenezer Worth say to Thomas Wistar that they would not go back to the School yet, but would go to this hotel first. Why would these two old and very good men want to go to a place that made trouble for the Indians? His wonder grew and grew and, I imagine, he was a little scared, because they went into the hotel and Ebenezer Worth told the man who owned the place that he wanted to buy all the "whiskey" in the place. Just picture how very much surprised this little boy was to hear this man, whom he thought to be almost perfect, ask for all there was of this liquor which you drank and it made you do bad things! Next these two Friends asked for buckets. While the hotel-keeper was filling them from bottles and barrels, Ebenezer Worth was counting out the money he owed the man. Then he and Thomas Wistar each took a full bucket and emptied it in the road. They did this several times, until all the whiskey was gone, then they went back to the School, very happy, because they knew that the Indians had that much less liquor to use.

Glimpses of Iowa and Iowa Yearly Meeting.

Any account of the Yearly Meeting would be far from adequate were further mention not made of those unforgettable opportunities afforded three times a day of social commingling in the dining-room. The arrangement is self-appealing in its adaptability to the situation. Here are many people far from home, dependent upon the gracious hospitality of the neighborhood Friends, their comfortable homes affording rest and lodging at the end of each day, while the busy household matron, oftentimes a mother with several children, is relieved even from preparing meals for her own family. The Yearly Meeting assumes this domestic burden, and in so doing unwittingly perhaps, confers a grace upon the occasion which is most readily observed by the visitor. The solemn dignity of a religious meeting effects a more lasting purpose by this united unbending in the presence of outward food, especially so if held symbolic of spiritual refreshment. The transition should be accounted as all in one with the fourth petition in our Lord's prayer.

Yearly Meeting week has afforded opportunity for several calls and visits at the homes of Paulina Friends; of these one of outstanding interest was that made of a sunny afternoon upon Anna Olsen, a dear aged Elder of the meeting, who bears the weight of her years with true Christian fortitude. The visit resolved itself into one of religious opportunity wherein it seemed that the Master came into the midst with tendering assurance that the care of the Heavenly Father is towards His children to the end of their earthly pilgrimage. Coming from Norway in early life, this dear Friend was among the very first of her people to settle here, and had known of life's hardships and privations, but now in the almost palatial home of her son—a highly prosperous business man—it seemed no physical want that money would buy could remain unsatisfied.

The morning of our departure from Paulina neighborhood (Tenth Month 17th) the ground was weighted with frost, and our train as it rolled into the station at Gaza bore ice on its tender. The day proved fine, however, being filled with sunshine that glistened on the corn-fields and rejoiced the seemingly not to be numbered farm animals—horses, cattle, sheep and hogs—that grazed or frisked about, or stood in contemplation of the largess of their comforts. Our first two hundred miles, though a retracing of country passed through the week previous, was relieved of any tedium by social intermingling and informing chat with a little coterie of Iowa Friends now facing homeward. Three of these were from Stavanger neighborhood, whose names, as they reflect the rugged kindness of their nature are here given for one "little (well-remembered) act of kindness and of love." But we had already learned to love these Norsemen—Ole Bryngelsen, Martin Andersen, and Jesse Tow. An offer of provision for the midday meal had been declined at the meeting-house dining-room that morning, in vague expectation of a "diner" on the train, or else the opportunity of a hasty sandwich at some station lunch counter. The event proved that neither of these means of satisfying the inner man was likely to be forthcoming, or at least accommodated to a very early breakfast. It was at this juncture that we learned that our prudent friends had foreseen the event and stood in preparation therefor. An invitation to lunch with them came with such unveiled, hearty sincerity as to thrust quickly aside any suggestion that their own provision might hereby be stinted. The sequel proved there was enough and to spare of a meal so hearty and rounded out, even to the tooth-picks, that even the viands of a "diner's" larder seemed altogether remote and unattractive. Thus were Stavanger and Le Grand made more real, and at the call of Waterloo (a city of over 36,000) our parting was with increased desire and hope of later reaching their neighborhood.

WHITTIER.

Our journey had been set for Whittier, still seventy-five miles away, and reached by as yet what seemed a rather indefinite combination of trolley, train and auto ride, in proportion yet to be worked out. The event proved that even yet, as in a far-off time, the adage holds—"All things work together for good to them that love God." Assuredly the end in view was not based on selfish motives, but rather on that Christ love which seeks to give and to receive of that Divine fellowship which always leaves the life of both giver and receiver better for its outpouring.

A rush to the imposing station trolley in Waterloo gave the comforting information that a car for Cedar Rapids was just about departing. On making known to the conductor our ultimate destination and our perplexity with regard to an important train connection, the genial official took our case in hand with interested assurance that if his car reached a certain railroad crossing outside of Cedar Rapids on time, the train desired having to stop there before passing over, in obedience to a city ordinance, time would be afforded his anxious passengers to board it. All went well as hoped for. The train was reached whereby we were enabled to step off in the gathering darkness of the evening at the pretty little village of Springville. The train passed on, but left the lone station-master peevish and perplexed by the bad handling of a barrel of apples which in transit from train to platform had defaulted as to bottom, allowing the tempting fruit to roll about in regained freedom. A kindly offer of assistance brought forth the information, laconically expressed, that these troublesome apples were from Missouri, were consigned to a resident, and that the freight charge amounted to some $3.00. The situation seemed enigmatical. Apples in choice variety were abundant in the neighborhood, so that this importation seemed ridiculously like "carrying coals to New Castle." In answer to the question, did Francis D. Hall live in the vicinity, brought a hesitant negative, a pause followed by—"Do you mean Frank Hall?" "Yes." A welcome was given to the use of the office phone. A kindly female voice responded to the service call to Whittier. "Is thee at Marion (ten miles away) or at Springville?" (three miles). Later an auto drew up, and a warm friendly greeting chimed into the hum of the machine. To pass from the chill night air to the bright, cheery home and engaging supper of our host was but the work of a little more time, and a good night's rest prepared for the full day to follow. The plan of a visit to Whittier Friends, as by them arranged, involved assembling with them next morning at mid-week meeting for worship, which was held a day in advance of the usual time to accommodate the cramped schedule of their visiting Friend. A large number came thus together, among whom were some men who in kindly interest had dropped for the hour the day's occupation of road mending close by, and attended, dressed as they were, in overalls. A sweet sense of Divine companionship pervaded the meeting, during which the nature of the kingdom of heaven was proclaimed as interpreted by our Lord, the effect thereof appearing like that of the "precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard, that went down to the skirts of his garments."

Some calls had preceded the meeting, among the visited being our dear Friend Mary Test, a minister, who under the weight of ninety years preserves a remarkable brightness of spirit and deep interest in Friends. An invitation to dine at the home of Mary Stanley, a member of the 1907 class at Westtown, gave opportunity to meet with another member of that same well-remembered large class in the person of Edith (Sidwell) Dewees. Soon after dinner we reluctantly bade farewell to Whittier and set out for West Branch, forty miles distant, in company with Milton J. Shaw, whose kindly interest and care had already been frequently shown, as also that of his wife, Rebecca Louisa; the latter having been recently appointed to the station of Elder.

"Just because war is intrinsically immoral it cannot settle anything permanently. It may re-adjust frontier lines here and there; it may paralyze for a time the economic advance of the defeated nation; but the moral trouble out of which it came, not only remains untouched, but is increasingly aggravated by it. War always leaves the international situation morally worse than it found it."—RICHARD ROBERTS.

FRIENDS EXTEND FEEDING IN RUSSIA.

On the 17th of last month, the American Friends' Service Committee received from its field headquarters in Russia a cablegram which read in part as follows: "Neighboring areas starving. Request permission to extend feeding immediately." The areas referred to lie mainly in Pougachevskii County, adjacent to the territory for which Friends are at present responsible.

A meeting of the Executive Board was held to consider this request, with the result that $30,000 was allocated for the purchase of food for this district. It is understood that if the Friends undertook to feed 30,000 in this district, still only half of the starving population would be cared for. The $30,000 allocated, which represents every dollar which the Committee has available at present for the extension, will feed less than 10,000 until the next harvest. The number of lives that can be saved in addition to those thus provided for, depends entirely upon the amount of funds contributed in America. Every additional dollar will provide food for an additional famine sufferer for one month; five dollars will save his life until the next harvest.

Close after the request to extend the feeding, comes a letter from one of the workers which indicates that the food bought with American contributions is arriving safely in the famine zone. It also gives a picture of how that food reaches the hungry peasants. We quote from this letter, which was written by Omar J. Brown, the following paragraphs:—

"Here in Sorochinskoye our four warehouses have a floor space of 55,000 square feet. That is a large space, but just before the December distribution we wished it were more. The flour and grits that continued to arrive from America had to be piled up until the sacks touched the rafters.

"Then the distribution started. Take a typical day, December 6th. It snowed from dawn to dark. Work started on four scales at seven in the morning. By 2.30 the peasants had loaded products for four townships. Only an hour remained before dark, but the transport of sleighs and wagons, some 800 strong, carrying half a ton of food apiece, struck out across the steppes for home. The bravery of these people, headed out into a driving snowstorm just before dark, when there was also danger of wolves, is worthy the efforts of a poet. And all the drivers were happy in the thought, as all the hungry in a hundred different villages would be when the drivers reached home, that now they had food for another month at least."

KREMS.

An old world town lies some two hours by train west of Vienna, and on a hill overlooking the town and the Danube stands a home in which the Friends' Relief Mission has a very special interest, though that interest is always somewhat tinged with anxiety.

The home contains 150 children, all of whom are in the initial stage of tuberculosis or suffering from rachitis, but all of whom, given fresh air, care and nourishment can well be cured. There is spotless cleanliness and order, a delightful spirit of friendliness between the children and the very competent staff, and as is so often the case in Austria, the clever fingers and the mantle of good taste have managed to conceal the skeleton of poverty underneath. But everyone in Austria is more or less poor nowadays, and these children, ranging from two to fourteen, come from the very poorest. They enter the home, possessing very often only the clothes they are wearing, and somehow or other garments have to be found for them.

In a large sewing-room sit two old women, mending or making clothes out of the most unbelievable scraps, and even these scraps are getting more and more difficult to obtain. Next to the sewing-room is the linen-room, but the shelves are almost empty. There is no longer a change of sheets for each bed, towels and pillow-cases must be washed, dried and mended during the day to be used again at night, and even the question of how to buy mending and darning cotton is an anxious one for the overburdened head of the institution.

Upstairs is a long, narrow room, lined with shelves, divided into little cupboards, one for each child's clothing; the little cupboards are practically empty!

It is only through generous help from the "Save the Children's Fund" that the Friends' Relief Mission is still able to support this home, and almost the entire weight must continue to be borne by foreign organizations for the present if the institution is not to be closed, for the subsidy from the Austrian Government becomes with every month more and more inadequate to cover even a small part of the most necessary expenses. And yet it only costs $37 per day—25 cents per child—to support the Krems hospital!

It is managed with such care that these $37 a day pay for the salary of a fine specialist, the wages of the staff, the food and all incidental expenses of the institution that is doing so much to check the spread of a very terrible disease.

The Mission has been able to supply 206 good woollen blankets, has purchased eight cows to improve the milk supply, has sent a certain amount of medical equipment and a few pairs of boots, and at the moment of writing a case of toys is being sorted and packed, so that these small children may find that the Christ-child has not quite forgotten them on this coming Christmas evening, when the Christmas tree is lighted.

But more is still needed if Krems is not to be closed—above all, money and clothing, and the Mission appeals with all its heart that the generosity extended to this home may not yet fail, but may be continued still, as we fervently hope, a happier day soon dawns for this hardly-trying Austria.

CHRISTMAS AT A QUAKER OUTPOST IN POLAND.

Powursk lies in the heart of a wilderness of trenches and barbed wire in eastern Poland. Christmas there this year was worth recording, for Powursk had never seen such a Christmas before. The Friends' Mission, aided by the Junior American Red Cross, held a series of Christmas parties which young and old alike will long remember.

The Red Cross furnished packets of presents for 3,000 children—packets which came from Des Moines, Iowa. The Friends' Mission supervised the parties, and provided the refreshments, special funds for the latter having been raised in England.

From the time that the children heard that the parties were to be held, they turned up at the Mission outpost every morning to make sure that there had not been a mistake in the date. The interpreter had to spend a busy half-hour persuading them that the parties really did not come for several days and that the best thing to do was to go home and wait quietly.

The parties were held in the Gmina police office, which was decorated with a wonderful Christmas tree. To avoid a struggle at the door, the children were admitted one by one. A Mission member was waiting, and into each eager hand was put a cup of hot cocoa and the largest slice of bread that was ever cut, adorned with lard, sausage or jam. The Gmina office was soon crowded, and excited children walked around and around the tree staring until their eyes nearly dropped out of their heads. Never was there such a noise! Never was there such happiness!

If there had been noise inside, imagine the scene outside when the presents were opened. Toys were a mystery to those children, the majority of whom had been reared in dugouts. A small, solemn girl received her box with a look of mistrust. The mistrust vanished at the sight of a doll and there dawned instead a smile that can surely never die.

Santa Claus stood at the door, and as the children went out each received a box of presents packed by the children in America.

Parties such as this were given to 300 children in the village of Powursk, and to 150 from surrounding villages. Then the Christmas tree was fastened firmly in the centre of a sled drawn by six white horses and Santa Claus took his post in front of it to be drawn through all the villages in the district. The way was thronged with children—cheering children to whom childhood had come for the first time.

LETTER FROM SHANGHAI, CHINA.

DEAR FELLOW UNITED STATES CITIZENS:

"The lame, the halt and the blind" certainly do assail you on every side in these cities of China through which I have come. Only this afternoon I walked through the Shanghai native city, accompanied by a returned University of Pennsylvania Chinese student. As we passed down the narrow street a blind woman sat in the middle beseeching alms. Sometimes we would stop to look at the attractive carved ivory or other interesting articles for sale, immediately a crowd gathered to watch our bargaining should we buy, amongst which would always be a beggar or two holding out their hands. One man had most revolting sores all over his legs, clad in the scantiest of garments. We entered a temple where is one of the general markets for every kind of goods. There we saw one man after another bowing down and shaking sticks out of a cylindrical box before a big Buddha. When the first or third came out it was taken to the priest who in turn for some cash handed the worshipper a sheet of paper with printed instructions thereon for the future which someone later had to read to him. It was indeed sad to think that any human being could seriously believe that there was any truth for him in such a rite.

I was over St. Elizabeth's Hospital, and amongst other cases remember a woman who was much downhearted, we were told, because her opium had been taken from her after she had been treated for syphilitic mouth. The medical need in this country is beyond my power to describe. During a month in China I have been in nine large cities, having visited five hospitals, whose work of mercy and love cannot be computed in dollars and cents or in any statistical report. Dr. McCracken's work, which includes service in several hospitals, especially St. Luke's, also medical education for 17 select young Chinese, evangelizing his students through his Bible class, and other religious activities, outside welfare movements for the general uplift of the whole city; all this work, I say, is the most inclusive and extensive also that I have seen conducted anywhere on my trip by a single man.

I spent a month in Hawaii where we had the opportunity of seeing the interracial problem being solved under American influences. We were five weeks in Japan, where I had the privilege of interviewing the Premier and other noted leaders in the national life. I believe Japan shows a real desire to be of greater unselfish service in the international comity. Two weeks in Korea presented to us both sides of that complex problem. Since being in China I realize more forcibly the strategic value of befriending those foreign students that are in our midst in America. They can be our best interpreters to the nations from which they come, our ambassadors for peace the world around.

Never have I been so thankful for having been born in the U. S. A., as since having come thus far on our way around the world. Why did the accident of birth place you and me in America rather than as a farmer or coolie in Japan or China? To help you appreciate your blessings, I have addressed you as I have in the beginning of this letter; and I think the answer to my own question is that we may know the added blessing of sharing our great benefits with these needy peoples, especially in China. This we are doing through McCracken's untiring efforts as we back him in his work. I know now from personal observation how unselfishly he is giving himself to this service. Not the least satisfying aspect of it to him is the consciousness of our interest therein and desire to encourage him by word and deed. So your share if you have had one in what he is doing is most heartily appreciated. He wishes me to send you his best wishes for the New Year. Joining him in that greeting, I remain,

Very sincerely yours,
EDWARD C. WOOD.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

The first woman mayor in London, England, is a Friend, Ada Salter, who was appointed Mayor of one of the districts last autumn. From her first election to the Council in 1909, she has been unremitting in the championship of all that is for the betterment of the nation's young life. It is reported that she does not propose to wear the chain of office nor the robe, and that she will not appoint a chaplain.

About the same time the first woman Representative to Harrisburg, a Friend, was elected. We refer, of course, to Martha C. Thomas of Chester County, a member of Downingtown Meeting.

THE Book Store at 304 Arch Street is soon to issue a new catalogue of books of special interest to Friends. A very considerable portion of the books catalogued will be English.

The Committee will follow the recent Quaker Bookshelf, just issued by Friends' Literature Committee in London, but it will have features peculiar to itself and should appeal to the increasing number of Philadelphia Friends and others who find the 304 Arch Street Store glad to serve their wants.

Of Rufus Jones's new book "The Boy Jesus and His Companions" (Macmillan) the New York Nation says: "It is a book to be read aloud in the home. Its simplicity, dignity, and freedom from cant and sentimentality set it apart from most rewritten Bible stories. It is clearly told like running water, and will sound long afterwards in the child's memory." This book was reviewed in THE FRIEND some months since.

It is doubtful if any one who attended the 250th Anniversary celebration in Baltimore last spring places any part of the programme ahead of the day's ride down the Chesapeake and the visit to the site of the first session of the Baltimore Yearly Meeting. The following is taken from the Interchange of Baltimore Meeting and is a letter of Elizabeth Braithwaite Emmott, written after her return to England:—

"Of the many happy days, I think the one that we enjoyed the most was the trip to West River, when the 425 delegates and other Friends were like one large family and we had to sit and talk, finding out through interchange of thought and social converse how near we really are to one another in the bonds of our common faith. The message that came home to me most clearly from the Conference—not, perhaps, so much from what was said in the meetings as from the mingling with Friends of so many differing points of view—was that, fundamentally, our beliefs and our aims are very much the same. To all of us, if we have sincerely sought it, there has been granted some vision of 'the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ,' and as our hearts glow with love to Him who has revealed it to us, we all long to pass the message on to others."

In due time an extended account of their movements in Australia will reach us from our dear friends Wm. C. and Elizabeth Allen. In the meantime we are glad to publish the following brief statement in regard to their work there:

"The Australian General Meeting this year had much more evidence of spiritual life than that we last attended (1919). The messages I carry from the Federal Council of Churches, in the United States, which number thirty-one denominations and almost 20,000,000 church members, are opening up correspondence with those in America as a result. Day by day I follow up the service with the aid of my dear wife. There is no end of need of preaching Christ and Him crucified."

NOTICES.

The following meetings have been arranged for Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin during his brief stay in Philadelphia this month. With the exception of the one exclusively for Young Friends, they are all open to the public and a cordial invitation to attend is extended to all who may feel an interest to do so.

Sixth-day, Second Month 16, 1923—

4.00 P. M.—Friends' Meeting House, Twelfth Street, below Market. Address to Friends and others interested in Missionary work.

7.45 P. M.—At Twelfth Street Meeting House. This is a meeting for Young Friends and other young people of Philadelphia and vicinity. Subject—"Christianity the World's Need." All under thirty-five years of age are invited to attend the meeting.

Seventh-day, Second Month 17, 1923—

4.00 P. M.—Twelfth Street Meeting House. Subject: "Deepening of Life."

7.45 P. M.—Fifteenth and Race Streets Meeting House. Subject: "The type of Christianity that will win the World."

First-day, Second Month 18, 1923—

3.00 P. M.—Broad Street Theatre (Broad below Locust). Under auspices of Young Democracy and Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. Subject: "Shall We Have Peace in the Pacific?"

A MEETING of the Council of Westtown Mothers will be held at 20 S. Twelfth Street, Fifth-day, Second Month 15, 1923, at 3 P. M. Subject: "Round Table Talk," by members of Faculty and Student Government.

ELIZABETH S. ROBERTS.

DIED.—At their home in Moorestown, New Jersey, First Month 25, 1923, JOEL CADBURY, in the eighty-fifth year of his age, and on First Month 27th, ANNA KATHN CADBURY, his wife, in her seventy-seventh year; members of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District.

BRAVE WINGS.

Life requires two kinds of courage—moral and physical. We are schooled in physical courage from our first bumps and stumbles. But moral courage is a quality of slow growth. We learn it little by little until we think we know. Then a crisis comes and in spite of all our knowledge we evade. Even in every-day life, which is harder than any crisis, we like to smooth the way whenever we can for our souls.

Wise George Herbert wrote long ago:

"God has given thy soul brave wings"—

Our souls have brave wings—glorious, strong wings, wings to carry us into the very midst of the great conflicting air currents of the world. But over and over we hover on the edge of the storm. Sometimes we do not even rise into the air, we perch in a safe shelter until our wings grow so weak that we cannot soar, much less beat our way into the wind.

There are many storms loose in the world today. War, first of all, then lawlessness and crime; then selfishness and the mean little snobbishness of our own little circles. Sometimes it seems easier to beat against the last two. But they are like gusts of wind on a mountain lake, they come down on us suddenly when we are least looking for them—our wings must be steady or the stinging squall will veer quickly and beat us down. In war and crime souls may fly in flocks but there must always be one who leads. God may need our wings—well trained and tireless—to set the pace.

It is by endless training that thy wings will grow strong. Then send them out into the storm without hesitation and without fear—

"God has given thy soul brave wings
Put not those feathers
Into a bed to sleep out all ill weathers."

AMERICA PREPARES FOR WAR.

America is at the cross-roads. She is face to face with as great a crisis as has ever challenged her in time of peace. A careful survey of the progress which the War Department is putting into effect under the authority of the "National Defense" Act of 1900 can lead to no other conclusion but that she has chosen the road that leads to militarism, loss of the liberties that America should mean, and eventually to war and to the twilight of white civilization.

Should this statement seem severe, the reader may prove for himself the seriousness of the situation by sending to Dr. C. R. Mann, Civilian Advisor to the War Department, for all three reports of the War Department conference, Eleventh Month 16th and 17th last, on "Training the Youth of the Country." In The Nation's Business for First Month, Secretary of War Weeks has an article entitled "How Industry is Being Trained for War," which is further enlightening on this point. To quote a significant paragraph:

"Paralleling the work of Colonel Wainwright's office has gone the development of war plans under the direct command of General Pershing. . . Beyond that line a path for equally careful preparation against greater emergency, a war that would tax us to the utmost in man-power and resources. We are moving out on that larger pathway, moving cautiously, but, we hope, surely."

More serious, however, than the militarization of business is the program for the militarization of the youth of the nation. Under Section 55c of the National Defense Act all schools and colleges having not less than 100 physically fit male students above the age of 14 years may institute "a course in military training prescribed by the Secretary of War" and equipped with military officers, if available, and "arms, tentage and equipment." Then, to make sure of the acceptance of this offer, a few quotations from the above report show the nature of this disguised universal military training—universal, because when once instituted few youths will have the temerity to stand out against it.

"14. Every effort should be made through the active co-operation of all available agencies concerned to convince students that the duties of good citizenship include some degree of service in the citizen forces, and that they should be encouraged by every means to discharge their obligation by acceptance of commissions or by enlistment in the National Guard or Organized Reserves.

"18. That educational authorities should be urged to cooperate in bringing about that affiliation of the maximum number of their students and graduates with the citizen forces.

"20. That every means should be employed to give greater and continuing publicity to our present military policy.

"21. That instruction in Junior Units be carried on along such lines as will stimulate interest in military work and cause students to desire further training and seek affiliation with citizen forces.

"Red," "White" and "Blue" Courses at Civilian Military Training Camps are to be instituted to further provide for the citizen forces."

Added to the program above, the War and Navy Departments have laid extensive expansion plans. For war purposes we shall expend this year, $2,850,000,000 compared with $244,177,000 in 1912. To study the causes of and remedy for war, not a cent is provided.

One may well ask himself if such a program is not militarism, what is militarism anyway? How can we reconcile such a program with the objects and achievements of the Washington Conference? What does Japan,—what does Britain—think of the sincerity of our proposals at that conclave?

One may well ask, Why? What good can come from such a course when history has repeatedly shown that militarism leads to calamity. The program now under way will make the United States at the end of the naval holiday the most formidable military machine the world has ever seen. "He that taketh the sword shall perish by the sword" is a truism amply proven.

Can such a program be solely for defense? If we deal fairly with our neighbors in the East, need we fear them? Can we reasonably expect within our time aggression from impoverished Europe?—need we ever expect it if we treat them in the spirit of the Golden Rule?

The way to peace lies not in show of arms, but in progressive world organization, world-wide reduction of armaments to police status, world-wide education for peace, and in Christian internationalism. There is no other way.

Reader, if you believe that militarism has no place in our country, if you recognize the crisis which we face, if the program continues to be pressed, if you abhor the thought of the militarizing of our youth, register now your disapproval by writing to your Congressman and to the Secretary of War in protest against the Defense Act of 1920, which makes such a program possible.

The War Department Plans to Capture Our Schools and Colleges.

Send to Dr. C. R. Mann, Civilian Advisor of the War Department, Washington, D. C., for the three reports—ask for all three—of the War Department Conference (Eleventh Month), 16-18, on "Training the Youth of the Country." We published last week Harvey Fergusson's interpretation of this Conference. Dr. Mann has protested to us that the article is unfair. The facts of the case are that the article fails to do justice to the peril implicit in the War Department plans as the reports will show you and as the following quotations from the reports will indicate.

The Committee on Citizenship supported our contention that military training is bad for school boys to the extent of urging sports and games and advising against "technical military training and drill" for boys under eighteen, "except in schools essentially military in character or as given under Section 55c of the National Defense Act."

The joker here is in the last exception. Section 55c of the National Defense Act merely relieves the War Department of a part of the expense of military training in the schools by making the institutions themselves responsible for maintaining "a course of military training prescribed by the Secretary of War," but provides for the furnishing to schools and colleges "having not less than 100 physically fit male students above the age of 14 years" of military officers, if available, and "arms, tentage and equipment."

Further light is given on the subject of this joker in the report of the Committee on Reserve Officers' Training Corps, which recommended the gradual transfer of the Junior Units (made up of boys under 18) to the schools themselves under Section 55c, unless adequate appropriations and increased personnel in the Army are provided therefor.

In other words, the one encouraging feature in these black reports is intended only to husband the appropriations for the purposes that follow. We will now quote the more significant paragraphs:

DISGUISED UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING.

"14. Every effort should be made through the active cooperation of all available agencies concerned to convince students that the duties of good citizenship include some degree of service in the citizen forces, and that they should be encouraged by every means to discharge their obligation by acceptance of commissions or by enlistment in the National Guard or Organized Reserves.

"18. That educational authorities should be urged to cooperate in bringing about the affiliation of the maximum number of their students and graduates with the citizen forces.

"20. That every means should be employed to give greater and continuing publicity to our present military policy.

"21. That instruction in junior units be carried on along such lines as will stimulate interest in military work, and cause students to desire further training and seek affiliation with the citizen forces."

These are from the report of Committee No. 2, on the R. O. T. C. The Report of the Committee on Civilian Military Training Camps recommended a "Red Course" of 60 days in all, a "White Course" of not less than 30 days, and a "Blue Course" for a period to be fixed by the Secretary of War, with certificates and badges or buttons for each.

The three concluding paragraphs of this report discussed how it can be "popularized." We can quote in full only the last one:

"The only means of reaching the public continuously and with effect is through existing newspapers. Any attempt at circularization will only be mistaken for propaganda pure and simple and will, as a consequence, be ineffective. Also circularization is very expensive in proportion to the meager results usually produced. An individual who has not had the proper experience and training in preparing legitimate news in such a form that it will be acceptable to the daily press, is utterly unable to put the views which he wishes to present for publication in such a shape that the press will accept them. For this reason, it is strongly urged that regular press agents, men who understand news values and newspaper methods and make their living by presenting legitimate news in such a form that the daily press will take it, be employed for the purpose of keeping before the public the news items having to do with the amended National Defense Act and above all, any steps taken or contemplated which will attract the attention of the young men eligible for service under this Act."

THE PAN-AMERICAN CONFERENCE.

Secretary Hughes has announced that he expects to be present during the early part of the Pan-American Conference which will open (Third Month) 25th at Santiago, Chile, but that, being unable to remain throughout the Conference, he will not be a delegate. The fact that he will, in the present state of world affairs, attend the Conference at all indicates its importance in the eyes of the Administration.

We called attention in our last Bulletin to the important topics that are to be discussed by the American Republics at this Conference. "The closer association of the Republics of the American continent," "the judicial or arbitral settlements of disputes," "the best means to promote the arbitration of commercial disputes," "the codification of international law," "the reduction and limitation of military and naval expenditures," and "the questions arising out of an encroachment by a non-American power on the rights of an American nation" are topics which give this Conference possibilities truly epoch-making in the history of the two Americas.

While we are waiting for France to learn her mistake in following the policy of her extreme nationalists, we are in a position to further the closer co-operation of nations in the Western Hemisphere. The situation here is less acute than in Europe and yet not without its serious aspects. Latin America fears the strength and what is sometimes called the "incipient imperialism" of the United States. Latin America regards the Monroe Doctrine, with its various ramifications, as infringing upon the dignity of the great nations south of us and even at times threatening their sovereignty. Moreover, armaments and jealousies exist in our hemisphere which bode ill for the future.

President Harding favors "closer co-operation with other nations" in conferences resulting in treaties such as followed the Washington Conference. He should be assured that the American people will support through the United States any and all reasonable measures that will promote the substitution of law for war internationally. Tell him before Secretary Hughes starts on (Third Month) 3rd for Santiago. Tell him now!

The pressure of public opinion led to the calling of the Washington Conference. The pressure of public opinion made it a success. Only because of the pressure of public opinion, with the assurance of support in the Senate, will the Administration be led to take bold steps at Santiago. Write or telegraph the President now!

INTERNATIONAL PEOPLE'S COLLEGE IN DENMARK.

The International People's College has completed the first year of its existence. There have been gathered together twenty-five students for the year's course: Two Americans, one Austrian, nine Danes, one Dutch, three English, one Irish, one Scotch, five Germans, and two Czecho-Slovakians—a collection of individuals sufficiently international to test the possibilities of the College.

Obviously, the chief need of such a body of students is to understand one another. Students come to the College looking at one another over the high fences of foreign languages. In the first weeks the ways of understanding are three: the study of languages, work and music. Music is the most exalted international language. Through Danish, British and German folk-songs a wide degree of fellowship is possible long before the mind can make a nest and pleasant places amid the strangeness of words.

The College provides that each student shall work three hours daily either on the farm-land or in the garden of the College. The combination of manual work in close contact with nature and human studies is an integral part of the conception of a good international education at the College. In work in field or garden many words are not required. In the silence of action, nature reveals the inner personality of men, in all its strength and weakness, temperament and power, to one another. Work is the international language of necessity, the never-ending, all-embracing exercise and discipline, by which we are brothers, one flesh and blood and bone throughout the world.

The third way by which the students enter one another's lives is by the mastery of language. The Dane and the German are taught English; British students are taught German, and so on. Languages occupy a foremost place in the scheme of studies in the early part of the year. Lectures are given in this period—in Literature, History, and Sociology,—in English, Danish and German, and the students are arranged in national groups accordingly. During the last period of the College year the greater portion of the lectures and discussions took place in the English language, with all the students in one group. Thus another ideal of the College was in a measure realized. In the last term students were able to think together in a common group and in a common language, to study the evolution of modern society, and face the problems of modern citizenship from a specifically international point of view. Students have thus absorbed something of many national cultures, through direct personal, daily intercourse with representatives of many nations; they have learned to understand and respect national differences, customs, ways of thought and action, as well as national similarities. And they have seen the problems of national citizenship in the larger light and larger perspective of a world society.

Twenty-five students, in the main following industrial occupations, have in this way built up an international fellowship in work and play, in study and discussion and song. They have now returned to eight different countries, each to help in his unique personal way in building up that invisible commerce of the spirit which is known on earth as the Commonwealth of Nations.

The ultimate control of the College is in the hands of a Danish Council of twenty-three members, public men with progressive minds. There are also National Committees co-operating with the College, in the United States, in Great Britain, and in Germany. The National Committees are engaged in raising funds for the use of the College and a scholarship fund for the assistance of students.

The College is supported by a small grant-in-aid from the Danish Government, by donations and annual subscriptions from a growing number of men and women and organizations in various countries, and partly by fees coming from the students themselves. It is the hope of the founders of the College that it may become an instrument for the increased realization and application of the ethical principles of Christianity in all social relations, both nationally and perhaps in special measure internationally.

The second College year opened on First Month 5th, and lasts until Seventh Month 1, 1923. The cost for board, lodging and tuition for this period is $45. Two or three scholarships are available for British students.

The Principals of the College are Peter Manniche, M. A., Copenhagen, and Rennie Smith, B. Sc., London. R. Smith, whose address is 39 Tavistock Street, Nelson, Lancs., is also Secretary of the British Committee, and to him all enquiries and communications in Great Britain concerning the College, can be addressed.

ALL THE DAYS.

Ye, I am with thee when there falls no shadow
 Across the golden glory of the day,
 And I am with thee when the storm-clouds gather,
 Dimming the brightness of the onward way;
 In days of loss and loneliness and sorrow,
 Of care and weariness and fretting pain,
 In days of weakness and of deep depression,
 Of futile effort when thy life seems vain,
 When Youth has fled and Death has put far from thee
 Lover and friend who made the journey sweet,
 When Age has come with slowly failing powers,
 And the dark valley waits thy faltering feet,
 When courage faints before the unknown future
 And the heart sinks beneath its weight of fears,— Still I am with thee, Strength and Rest and Comfort,
 Thy Counsellor through all earth's changing years.

*Whatever goes, whatever stays,
 Lo, I am with thee, all the days.*

THE PHILADELPHIA Y. W. C. A.

The latest big thing which the Y. W. C. A. has done was to bring Margaret Slattery into contact with 7500 girls and women in and around the city.

"Margaret Slattery is a noted lecturer and writer on secular and religious topics. She rendered distinguished service in the field of education—first on the faculty of the Massachusetts State Normal School and later as a member of the Massachusetts State Board of Education. During the war Margaret Slattery spent seven months in Europe, and in 1920 made a tour around the world. She is a woman of strong personality, with an intensity of purpose and a deep insight into human life, who has a rare gift of taking the commonplace things of life and filling them with significance and beauty. She presents religion as a vital factor of life rather than a matter of creed or dogma. Her best known books are, "He Took It Upon Himself," "Just Over The Hill," "The Girl and Her Religion," "The Girl in Her Teens," "The Highway of Leadership," "New Paths Through Old Palestine," "The Charm of the Impossible."

Margaret Slattery gave four evening talks in the Methodist Church at the corner of Broad and Arch Streets during the week of First Month 15th, speaking there again the afternoon of the 21st. She spoke also at the Emergency Aid in the morning to a group of Junior League and Northfield League girls, and that evening gave a most inspiring talk at the Frankford High School.

She is greatly opposed to war and says: "We must get hate out of our hearts, if we do not want a repetition of the World War."

Five of her topics were—"Ten Years from Today," "The Servants of Fear," "New Women and Old," "Am I The Law?" and "Triumphs and Tragedies of the Bible." It was a great privilege to hear two of these talks, the first and the last. Her knowledge of the Bible, and the power to declare the historical, literary and spiritual value of it for everyone, was most gripping and appealing to the large gathering—supposedly of girls—but older women made up one quarter of the audience. For the message is not only for younger people but for those of all ages.

Her sense of humor is very keen, and was most evident in the story she told illustrating the difficulty of understanding the customs and backgrounds of people whom we do not know. On her recent visit to China she was received with great and overwhelming pomp and ceremony in different towns and cities. It was somewhat of a blow to be told by a friend that these beautiful attentions were not because she was considered a famous and important person from America, but because of her white hair. It was inconceivable to the Chinese that a person with white hair should be able to walk upright and alone, without a cane, and even more remarkable that she should have her own teeth. Her appearance in the schools caused great amusement, the smaller children giggling audibly, while she could see the older ones biting their lips and struggling to control their mirth. White hair in China means great old age and feebleness, and Margaret Slattery is far from being aged and feeble.

She feels that there is a great field for work and service here in Philadelphia, and has been asked to come back for ten days or so sometime this year. The Y. W. C. A. hopes that this may be arranged for the Eleventh Month, though no definite plans have been made yet.

MARY HEWES BIDDLE.

I KNOW no precept more wide or valuable than this: cultivate self-help; do not seek or like to be dependent upon others for what you can do yourself; and keep down as much as you can the standard of your wants, for in this lies a great secret of manliness, true wealth, and happiness; as, on the other hand, the multiplication of our wants makes us effeminate and slavish, as well as selfish.—WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE, in Letters to His Son.

BENEZET FIRST-DAY SCHOOL.

When I received a letter telling me that there was a very nice class of little colored girls who wanted a First-day School teacher and asking if I would accept the position, I wondered what it would all be like. The next week I walked along Locust Street and came to a brick building with a sign, "Benezet House" on it. I worked my way through the crowd of children gathered on the steps and went in. Ahead of me was a room full of old women—evidently that was not the place for me. So I climbed the stairs and came to a larger room full of people of all sizes. There were little groups of chairs all about the room and I wondered which would be my class. This I soon learned when I was introduced to about ten lively girls. They crowded around asking my name, whether I was coming every First-day, and numberless other questions. We spent most of the first day getting acquainted and I tried to learn the difference between Arnetta and Vernetta. The others were not so confusing and Effie I never had difficulty in remembering, she was always the liveliest and most disturbing element in the class.

There are pains and pleasures connected with teaching a mission First-day School class. It is a little disconcerting to have your class diligently gnawing at ill pickles, large and juicy, or scattering peanuts on the floor. Even baked potatoes appear to be eaten like candy. I sternly make them bring them to me and cannot be bribed by, "Teacher, you want a bite?" Too few chairs and hymn-books and a great desire to talk about everything but the lesson are also among the woes of teaching, but these are more than compensated for by the joys of teaching.

I do not see how a teacher can fail to respond to the challenge which such a class makes. It is not always easy to take time to prepare a lesson which shall be so interesting that it can hold their attention, all too prone to wander, and shall contain something which shall have made it worth while for them to have been there. The better you learn to know the individual girls and the more you find out about the conditions in which they live, the more you feel that you must take them something real, something they may find of use in facing the hard places in life, something that shall be a strength in time of temptation. Perhaps it sounds like a good deal of work. It is! But you are fully repaid if you have been able to give something really helpful to your girls. And then comes the thought that you have perhaps helped to make true the prayer, "Thy kingdom come." It is indeed worth the effort.

HELEN POTTS.

BITS OF EXPERIENCE.

[Esther M. Whitson now writes from Berlin, Germany, on her way to Russia, having been summoned to the famine district to take the place of one who returned on account of impaired health.—Eds.]

Berlin, First Month 1, 1923—"Happy New Year!" That is what we all are saying to one another here, but a more dismal, spiritless New Year was never ushered into a sick and weary world. How can they shout when everything seems so near to chaos? Hilga Hoppe has a girl friend whom she knew in Russia, one of a wealthy family before the war, but now in Germany with her mother and a sister working together for a living and education, and most of the time on the ragged edge of poverty. [Hilga, age twenty-five, is Esther's traveling companion—Danish by birth, English by education, Russian for a time, but with good command of the German language as well as Russian, English and Dutch.] The girl took Hilga and me to a Church service this evening; thousands of people there. An elaborate candelabrum lighted the throng. Down before the altar stood the German Christmas tree. The church was grand, gaudy, over-elaborate, the service rather beautiful. After it had finished, we freed ourselves from the crowd and stood apart to hear the bells. For several minutes they tolled mournfully. "Now in a few moments," said the little girl, "the bell will stop tolling and the chimes will begin as the New Year advances." The tolling ceased, as she had said. The crowd waited. The silent moonbeams cast their ghostly shadows. But no chimes came from the silent bells. Only a thin strain of music from a violin! We looked and saw—a beggar. Yes, on the harp of a broken spirit was ushered in the New Year with its burden of suffering for mankind.

First Month 3rd.—The further east one gets, the less people seem to esteem the value of time. A Russian Consul is particularly exasperating in this respect. We have had more trouble over passport permits, and shall be detained perhaps a week, perhaps a month or more. But I am not going to loaf. I have had a long talk with Dr. Herta Krauss. She is head of the German child-feeding for this district and has her office in a wing of what was the Kaiser's palace. Tomorrow I go with her to the various kitchens. The Quakers of course have withdrawn, but the child-feeding is carried on extensively. Dr. Krauss tells me they are facing the most desperate winter since the war.

To-day I visited the finest children's hospital in Germany, where the very latest experiments on tuberculous children are being conducted. But the medical staff and training school are only half what they used to be on account of the lack of funds. As there is not enough food for twenty-five nurses, of course they cannot have sixty as formerly. Yet the dauntless doctors work on, quite obviously without return in money. I think they are giving something to the world. These children, because they are underfed, have no body resistance, and hence a whole arm or leg or side of the face may be an open sore. On hundreds of such, I am told, this electrical treatment is successful. It is a new thing.

I visited also the great German clinic of Dr. Hildebrandt. Have had my "fill" of operations. The surgeons were very courteous. They explained much to me that I could not have understood even in English!

TROLLEY HIKES.

There is something distinctly intriguing about the solicitations of the P. R. T.'s "to know one's city." The very docile, brilliantly-striped tiger on the car card draws one Zoo-ward. The joys of the Wissahickon are almost too well-known to need advertising. As invigorating and alluring as these are these journeys about Philadelphia, there are many hikes that the traction company does not even hint at. It is these journeys that are my never-ending pleasure in the trolley car.

Purchase a copy of Morley's "Travels in Philadelphia" and you can, by dint of thirty minutes' reading, not only visit many places of interest in the town, but add much useful information to the general fund. Happily, one is not confined to one locality on the trips I describe, although the revenue does go to the P. R. T. One can visit "Delaware and the Eastern Shore" or probe into the "Maritime History of Massachusetts" which of necessity takes one far from home. If the radius of New England is "too narrow one can follow Fred B. Smith half way round the globe" "On the Trail of the Peacemakers."

There is another secret to these hikes. If one starts for the Commercial Museum on Route 38 one naturally wishes to make a job of the trip, see the Museum, return with much time spent and be naturally fatigued. Not so with the journeys into Bookland. There is always the privilege of quitting when and where one wishes. If the book is dull, on the strength of some flimsy excuse, I look out the window for the first fifteen minutes in order to dislodge the sleep from my eyes with the sights of city houses in the morning. If the book is passably entertaining I commence a little nearer my point of embarkation and read close to my destination. If the journey between the leaves completely obliterates Mitten, his management, his cars, his advertisements and his men, it is a quick gesture to pay one's fare, take a seat and slide out on those journeys of the mind that fascinate, enchant and inspire the reader of good books.

To-day it was "South," by Shackleton and the journey was far from home, amongst icebergs, ice packs and dangerous "floes" of the Weddell Sea, the extreme south of the Antarctic Ocean. It seemed like magic to lose oneself to one's surroundings and follow this most daring modern adventurer in his terrific struggle with the elements of the Antarctic. One can almost see, as by some mysterious mirage, the detail incidents of this expedition. The photograph of the ship Endurance, white with hoar frost against the black Antarctic night is not necessary; nor is it necessary to have a radiograph to see the ship caught in a floe, pinched between three huge pressure rafts and crunched into a pitiable wreck. The print on the page projects the picture.

"The pressure caused by the congestion in this area of the pack is producing absolute chaos. The floes grind stupendously, throw up great ridges, and shatter one another mercilessly. . . . Human effort is not futile, but man fights against the giant forces of nature in a spirit of humility. One has a sense of dependence on the higher Power." The leader cries out with Job:

"Out of whose womb came the ice?
And the hoary frost of Heaven, who have gendered it?
The waters hid as with a stone,
And the face of the deep is frozen."

Familiar landmarks were signalling frantically that the time had come to get off. With an intense reluctance I had to leave these men in the Weddell Sea, their ship crushed and lost, drifting on a piece of ice at the mercy of the water and winds. If the traction company only knew what trips they could advertise!

CORRESPONDENCE.

ANNA COPE EVANS:—

My Dear Friend:—It happened that I was a teacher for our older children's Bible Class at Media, Eleventh Month 26, 1922, and therefore thy letter was handed to me with the story entitled, "Playing the Game—A Thanksgiving Story." Thanks for reminding us of the need of a Thanksgiving Message for the children.

The story as thee sent it, I withheld, and I would like to be able to explain to thee why, because I am sure our aims are fundamentally the same, i. e., that every human being shall have as full opportunities as possible for the development of character.

The story is exactly right in teaching that we should help others "learn how to find." This means education. But it seemed to me that the story as presented in your paper over-shadowed the importance of ability "to find," by its emphasis on "swapping and dividing." Now thee may at once ask whether Jesus did not teach generosity irrespective of ability "to find." He did teach generosity, but I think He taught fundamentally that our efforts should be to help our brothers develop character. Charity sometimes helps, but at most little, and when it does not relieve material wants, it often at the same time impoverishes character.

Commerce is in no proper sense "a game." It is a great world-wide service. God has made a world in which things which are relatively plentiful are cheap, and those relatively scarce in proportion to the need for them, expensive. All commerce is the effort of individuals, separately and in groups, to supply what is scarce. The existence of the scarcity is revealed most promptly and emphatically by the conspicuously high price, and relief is afforded most quickly and effectively by the effort of individuals to share in the profit offered.

It is important to realize that in a community where individuals are free to buy and sell as they elect, no one can secure a profit as seller without first finding a willing customer, and the customer will be forthcoming only to the seller who offers more value and service than is available elsewhere. The essential thing for the community is that every one shall be as free as possible to offer the service or the article more cheaply than it is now offered. And our task for ourselves, and for other citizens, is to try to be able to see where there is a scarcity and how to relieve it. The fact that we may obtain a share of the value involved is of much less importance to the community than that the service shall be made more cheap by our efforts. Plainly, if all scarcity were seen quickly and quickly relieved, there could be no greater differences in incomes, either from personal service or profits. Any unusual income would be more quickly reduced by some one quite willing to serve for more nearly the average return.

Incomes in any community become equal as soon as it is equally easy to get all kinds of service performed. Labor congestion is quickly revealed by low wages, and labor scarcity by high wage values. The only effective remedy for low wages is either fewer workers or more work. I think we need to pay more attention to moving families from places where they are not needed to places where the labor of their workers can yield additional wealth for the community. A million surplus laborers moved from congested Europe to America's undeveloped plains and reclaimed deserts would benefit the race more than a million helped by charity in places where they may never be able to earn a living.

The process of learning to see a commercial scarcity which needs relieving, of seeing how to relieve it, of patiently saving part of one's income as capital to provide tools for relieving it, of winning the voluntary assistance of others where group effort is required, and of estimating accurately the market value of the resulting product when it is ready for sale; all these efforts develop human character. To help urge all men and women to industry and thrift therefore is an essential part of our duty as Christian teachers.

The aim to compete merely to obtain personal gain can supplant wisely with the aim to see values and thereby to serve. Men and women who have become wealthy through their own commercial efforts, I think, usually are the least concerned with gain for merely selfish use.

Christianity, adequately taught, must include an accurate understanding of commercial values and processes of service. There are some necessary community restrictions of ownership, such as limited natural resources, which we have not the time to discuss here, but which always must be distinguished from the great bulk of commerce where supply is limited only by the voluntary acts of other individuals.

Let us teach our children sound economics. I hope the Social Order Committee will develop the side of this work more fully.

Sincerely thy Friend,
J. PASSMORE ELKINTON.

Since reading the above letter I have been thinking! I heartily agree with the writer that full opportunity for the development of character for every human being is what we want. I thoroughly like his definition of industry as a great world-wide service. But some of his sentences suggest questions.

"Charity sometimes helps, but at most little, and when it does relieve material wants, it often at the same time impoverishes character." Charity, yes! The handing out of doles by the rich to the poor was the last thing the little Thanksgiving story was meant to inculcate. Not charity, but sharing! Does sharing impoverish character? Is Fosdick wrong when he says, "Paul tersely sums up the spirit of the whole New Testament: 'We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak and not to please ourselves.'" Not that men should give to men but they should seek to share—to divide more equitably the product of industry, believing that the creation of a right spirit among the producers will increase production, which alone will make possible "the good life" for all.

Again I read:—"The only effective remedy for low wages is either fewer workers or more work." This may be correct if the following statements of a Vice-President of the National City Bank of New York are true. "It is," he says, "not only just that ability and skill should be compensated, but it is in the interest of even the humblest and most poorly paid that this should be the case . . . ." "They say that there cannot be so much difference between the value of any two men as to justify paying one of them $50,000 a year and the other one $1500 a year." "These high salaries are fixed by supply and demand in the open market." "These highly paid men get what their services seem to be worth to the business." "The fair thing would seem to be that every man should be paid according to his service." Have these words a familiar ring? Across the centuries I hear an indignant voice, "These last have wrought but one hour, and thou hast made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden and heat of the day."

My mind goes back nineteen hundred years. It is a sunny day in Galilee. Two brothers stand before Jesus, strong and good to look upon, with keen, intelligent faces. The elder is speaking:—"Master, we have four brothers. Last year our father went away leaving the vineyard in our care. We have all done what we could, but as one of my brothers is blind and another is lame and the two others are sickly and have little knowledge, the chief burden has fallen on this brother and myself and it has been heavy. The harvest, however, was good. The grapes are all gathered and sold. Nothing remains but to divide the money, but on this point we cannot agree. To me it seems a simple matter. Let us each receive according to the service he has rendered. He that has contributed most should receive most and he that has contributed little should receive little. To do otherwise were unjust. But my brother says, 'Not so. Rather, as we have all given freely all we had to give to make the harvest good, our father would desire that each of us should receive according to his need. He whose need is greatest should receive most and he whose need is least should receive least.' What sayest thou?" The picture fades. Each of us must decide for himself what the Master's answer would have been. "But that," someone says, "was a family affair. Business is another matter." It surely is and perhaps that is just the trouble. As Maude Royden says:—"For generations we have been content to sit in our homes and to make them as lovely, as divinely gentle and human and beautiful as possible, but we have not yet given to the world that wider conception, which makes this world of God's simply one vast home for the nations that live in it." And yet surely Christ taught "that the world is a home, that men are brothers and that God is our Father."

Not long ago a member of the British Labor Party said something like this:—"We believe the economics of the New Testament are sound and will work." That our present system is not working satisfactorily even conservatives admit.

By all means "let us teach our children sound economics," but what if the economics of Jesus should prove to be the soundest? What if Fosdick's words are true? "No one is safe till all are safe. No privilege is secure till all possess it. No blessing is really owned until it universally is shared."

ANNA COPE EVANS.

END OF THE YOUNG FRIENDS' NUMBER.

BOOK REVIEWS.

"WAR ON WAR."—Campaign Textbook—F. J. LIBBY.

This book of seventy pages is exactly what it purports to be, a campaign text book. It contains abundant material for the campaign speaker or student arranged in logical order and very readable form. To the general reader it is interesting as bringing together in one accessible place the best that has been thought and said in the last few years on the subject of abolishing war.

The subject is handled under four large argumentative headings:—

1. We Must End War Now or Perish. Reasons why we must end war and why we ought to end it are given, largely in the form of quotations from recent books and speeches, though some original material is also included. The arguments are familiar to most of us, but it is interesting to meet them from the lips of army generals and men like Sir Harry Laurier.

2. We Can End War Now if We Will. This section contains most interesting and valuable affirmations of faith on the part of individuals and large groups both in the United States and abroad. We can all take to heart the concluding quotation from General Smuts: "The old world is dying around us. Let it die in us."

3. How We Can End War Now—a Three-fold Program. World organization, world-wide reduction of armaments and education for peace are the three parts of this program. An attempt is made to meet the fear that there may be trouble in the Far East, though to many this will seem the weakest part of the book. Otherwise this section is taken up mainly with a discussion of what has been done toward world organization and reduction of armaments with a survey of the present financial situation in Europe. The third part on peace education is full of valuable suggestions as to what can be done individually and locally to aid in the campaign against war.

4. Answers to Skeptics. This section is especially valuable to speakers who must meet questions from the audience. It is also valuable to any reader of the book who may not have satisfied his own doubts in the preceding pages.

Frederick Libby is surely to be thanked and congratulated on the work that he has done in bringing together so much interesting and timely material and arranging it so well. The handbook ought to be on every Quaker bookshelf for reference and the points it makes in every intelligent Quaker head.

It is far easier to criticize than to create; but criticism has also its constructive function as the author himself realizes when at the bottom of the last page he calls for suggestions to make the second edition better than the first. In answer to such an appeal and in the spirit of friendly understanding it is possible to say of the book that beginning with its title, and following through to its last page the primary emphasis is on the negative rather than the affirmative. We are destroying war primarily, not creating a new and better world organization. To many of us it is increasingly clear that the only motives which move men and women to great exertion and sacrifice are spiritual ones. It would seem then that in such a booklet as this a more powerful spiritual note might be struck without bringing in, as Frederick Libby is rightly concerned not to do, the sectarian or even Christian note. It ought to be possible to rally together all who are willing as Donald Hankey defined religion: "To bet their lives on the existence of God," Jew and Gentile, liberal and conservative, Catholic and Protestant. To this end it seems to me that the vision of a better world is more powerful as a force than the fear of another war or the conviction that war is wrong. It was the vision of a better world as a result of the last war that swept so many of our noblest fellow-countrymen into a situation that was as repugnant to them as to us. If we can once convince them that war is the negation of the noblest spiritual forces and not their finest expression, and enlist all their powers in a mighty effort to bring in a new international order, the cause is won.

ANNE W. PENNELL.

“AND SUSANNA.”

To have distinct mention in the public press, and not to be classed among the "and others" is very satisfying to the average society woman in her ambition for social distinction. However worthy or unworthy this may be it is nevertheless true that special mention, in the world's eye, has more or less distinction connected to it.

The Susanna of the text is one of the three who have special mention as among the women who attended Christ and his disciples on their mission of mercy and good deeds—is one of the three mentioned by name who "ministered of their substance" unto the group who went "about the cities and villages preaching and bringing the good tidings of the kingdom of God." This is the only hint we have as to how Christ and His disciples were supported—as to how their physical needs were met during three years of such busy ministering activity that occasionally, at least, "they had not much leisure so much as to eat." Again, it is the only mention of Susanna herself, but this one mention places her where any right-minded woman would be glad to be found—and fixes her among the worthy for all ages.

But you say, she is classed along with Mary Magdalene, a woman whose name has become a synonym for the worst in women. Whether history and current thought are defaming Mary of Magdala or not—and I think a close study of Scripture will bear us out in thinking they have, for many a woman, not a prostitute, may possess seven devils—certain it is that when Susanna is with her, she has "found the Messiah, Jesus of Nazareth," and that she and Susanna as well as the others have come to the ministering as an expression of gratitude, for it is said of all of them that they had "been healed of evil spirits and infirmities."

Susanna and her companions must have been women of some means, and that of their substance they freely gave for the promotion of the kingdom, places Susanna on a pedestal, making her a model in Christian giving, that they of whom much is forgiven love much, is here emphasized and that the spirit of gratitude was theirs in a large measure is also manifest.

But the "modern woman" with her cry for equal rights and fair recognition also will perhaps find in Susanna some satisfaction when we remember that even to-day in the Holy Land, a woman may not walk with her husband, but must follow some paces behind. When we remember that to-day she must be scrupulously veiled when she appears in the presence of, not only the public, but even those of her own household, even her husband and her father-in-law, we can but wonder how those women among whom Susanna is mentioned were able to be thus associated with Christ and his group. They certainly must have had custom and precedent to overcome and much of criticism to meet. But none of this is hinted in the plain statement of the Gospel writer who was careful to collect facts and equally careful to avoid controversy.

What have we learned from Susanna?

First—She was one of the many whose life had become worth while by the ministry of Christ, one who had found "the way" and was endeavoring to help others in the finding of it.

Second—Being forgiven much, she was loving much and doing the thing she could, and, while it was not distinctly Christian work in the popular acceptance of that term, it was no less worthy, for it was quite necessary that the bodies of Christ and his co-workers should be kept fit, so that they might be most efficient as the multitudes thronged about them for help. She was doing what many a woman since has done, that is, "keeping the wheels going" for some one else while she herself is practically "unknown" and "unsung."

Third—It was her substance which she was giving, not simply preparing that which some one else had provided. Would that the spirit of gratitude might so fill the hearts of men and women of to-day that they, too, shall cry: "What shall I render unto the Lord for all His benefits," and that they, too, shall learn to freely and joyously give of their substance for the promotion of the kingdom of God.

Fourth—Susanna with her only Scriptural mention is in good company and about a worthy work, however much of criticism she may have had to meet.

"And Susanna," is she not worthy of special mention?

THERE is a troublesome humor some men have that, if they may not lead, they will not follow; but had rather a thing were never done than not done their own way, though otherwise very desirable. This comes of an overfulness of ourselves, and shows we are more concerned for praise than the success of what we think a good thing.—WM. PENN.

OWEN BLACKSNAKE.—There used to be an old Indian, named Owen Blacksnake, who lived at Quaker Bridge on the bank of the Alleghany River. This Indian was not a bit like your history and story-book Indians, who wear war paint and dress in blankets and feathers. Instead he was a big man with a dark skin which made him look very much sunburned, with high cheeks and dark eyes and hair, while he dressed very much like any farmer you see dressed for work. He did not carry a tomahawk anywhere about his person, neither did he spend his time making trouble and breaking white men's law, rather he spent his time doing kind things for Indians and white people.

One day he saw several stray horses from the Reservation run across the bridge over the Alleghany River; when they rushed across the middle span, he noticed that the span gave way. At the same time he saw that a white man, a wealthy lumberman, was approaching the bridge from the other side with a load of lumber drawn by a team of fine horses. Now Owen knew that the middle of the bridge would give way if that heavy wagon crossed it, and that the man and horses might be badly hurt. He ran down to the bridge, yelling to the man not to cross there and waving his hands. The lumberman thought: "Oh, he is nothing but an Indian!" So he did not pay any attention to him, but started to drive on to the bridge. While a team could not cross, a man might walk over with safety, Owen figured, so he tried to run across in time to make the man turn back. It happened that Owen, horse, wagon and lumberman all arrived at the weak place at the same time; the bridge gave way at that place and they fell into the river. Owen was very badly hurt and had to stay in bed a long time.

When the Superintendent of the Tunesassa Boarding School, which was and still is managed by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, went to see Owen Blacksnake, he said: "Owen, what did thee think of while thee was falling?" Owen answered: "Me lose me think," meaning that he could not think at all, it happened so quickly.

When you grow up and are on the Indian Committee of the Yearly Meeting and go to Tunesassa, you will meet some great, tall, fine-looking Indian men, named Nephew; they will be great-grandsons of this Owen Blacksnake who risked his life to save a white man.

WHAT IS TRUTH?

This question, addressed by Pilate to Jesus, at the time of His trial, is one which has been asked, at one time or another, by every thinking person, and yet has never received an entirely satisfactory answer.

This, however, should not discourage us from continuing to seek an answer, but rather, we should seek with greater earnestness. More, it seems to me, depends on our attitude toward this question than upon the reply we give.

Many people, are, I think, like Pilate, who asked the question, and then, apparently, beat an immediate retreat, afraid to hear the answer. Others come to the conclusion that it is altogether too great a problem for them, and delegate the matter to a group of people set apart for that purpose, or— which surely is practically the same thing—they accept a creed or form of religion, ready-made, from their parents or their church, without troubling to examine its meanings and foundations.

Others, again, pursue the quest until they find that it is leading them in a direction which they are unwilling to follow,—it would involve too great a sacrifice, and they abandon the search, contenting themselves with some half-truth.

And even those who continue the search for Truth are apt to be discouraged. There are so many conflicting theories, every one of which appears to contain some truth and some fallacy. Even in the realm of every-day life, it is often difficult to see one's way clearly. What appears right to one person, seems wrong to another, and a course which is right at one time may be entirely wrong under different circumstances.

This is because Truth is too great for our finite minds to grasp, as a whole, and also because it is a living, spiritual Thing, and cannot be bound by any set of phrases or ideas. It has been so all through the ages. Some one has grasped a great truth, or rather one aspect of Truth, and we have what is sometimes called a revival of religion. Then he, or his followers, try to limit this truth—to confine it by a creed or set of phrases—and it is strangled; the Church founded upon it becomes cold and lifeless. Jesus knew this and He formulated no creed—He lived a Life. Let us see what He said about Truth.

"Continue ye in My word" (not words) "so shall ye be My disciples, indeed, and ye shall know the Truth, and the Truth shall make you free."

Another passage which bears on the subject, although it does not mention the word Truth—"If any man will to do the Will of God, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God." Do we will to do the Will of God—not merely are we willing, but do we put our will power into it, as we do into our worldly affairs? Is this one reason that we fail sometimes to reach a greater measure of the Truth?

"I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life." It is only as we find Christ, as we learn daily of Him, that we grasp more and more of the wonders and beauty of Truth. "And when the Spirit of Truth is come, He will lead you into all Truth." Not all at once. "There are many things which ye are not able to bear now." Not a sudden, blinding revelation, like a flash of lightning, but rather a gradual one, like the dawn—"That shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

DRAWING HORSES IN THE FAMINE ZONE.

They are eight Russian peasants.

They have come on foot from Pokrovka, Kusminovka, Stary Yashkin—the three almost foodless, almost horseless—yes, almost peasantless villages in Grachovka District.

They have been three days on the road toiling along through mud and sleet and a wind that cuts like needles. They wear patched hemp trousers, torn bag leggings, bark sandals and incredibly tattered woolen overcoats, most of them relics of early issues to the Red Army. There is not one sheepskin coat in the group. They are evidently from the class of poorest, now all but perishing, peasantry.

And yet they are really of the "better sort," for in order to qualify to be put on the purchaser's list for the Quaker horses they must have cut some hay and hauled it in on a hand-cart last summer; they must also have saved their harness and their wagons from the all-consuming famine. In other words, they must be peasants who owned horses before and who are accounted fully capable of caring for the animals they are about to receive from the Mission under the terms of a contract which gives them one year to pay for the horse in services or in wheat.

The eight come first to the "Kwaker Kontora" (Quaker office) on the main street of Soronhinskoye. They come to draw the slips on which the numbers of the remaining horses are written. Two of the men are so tired they sink down on the porch of the office and have to be wakened from their sleep when their turn comes to draw.

With the number slips in their hands they fall in with Ignotov, the Quaker horse expert, and trudge out to the stables where the horses have been quartered pending sale.

They say little as they plod along toward the stables. Most of them are tired and silent, but you can notice that their gait quickens as they near the place where they are to meet their fortune in horse-flesh. They are unmistakably happy, especially the ones to whom Ignotov is half-whispering, "Yours is a good horse—an excellent horse. Number thirty-three. And what is yours, Comrade? Sixty? Let's see, sixty, not so bad—neebevo—a fair horse is sixty, but not as fine as thirty-three!" He smacks his lips over thirty-three.

Old Feodor Philipitch, from Yashkin, is walking behind with me. I ask him about himself and the others. "Yes, we are all men of big families—even now," he tells me. "Eight souls in mine, and no livestock, not even a lamb."

"Where did all your stock go?" What a question to ask! But when one knows a little Russian and that little is confined to a very limited category—pyoks, stock population, harvest and so on, one will ask just such foolish questions of peasants in the very worst famine volost!

Feodor Philipitch answered simply, "The Hunger. Horse-meat was cheaper than flour."

And it was the same with the other seven—all stock devoured, all prospect of life vanished, big families, an almost bottomless pit of need.

At the stables the men quickly find their horses, catch them with a lariat and slip on the halters they have brought with them. There are endless epithets of satisfaction—s-pacebos (thanks), Harosha Rabotet (it will work well), and general approbation. The youngest peasant, a boy of fifteen or so, has drawn the biggest, strongest horse—thirty-three; the secretary of a village soviet has had the poorest luck. But ce rovno (it's all the same) so long as the horses get into the volost, and of course the best horse costs more than twice as much as the worst. No one questions the fairness of the Quaker distribution.

Soon the eight satisfied peasants are riding their horses over the hills to Kuzminovskaya. The haystacks by the roadside guarantee the life of the horses and the plowing and planting they will do in the spring.

AUSTRIAN MISSION TO DISTRIBUTE CZECHO-SLOVAKIAN MILK.

As a result of negotiations undertaken by Clement M. Biddle, Chairman of the Austrian Sub-committee of the American Friends' Service Committee, the Friends' Mission in Vienna is about to undertake a move which may have far-reaching economic consequences. This move lies in the importation from Czecho-Slovakia of milk for the relief work in Vienna.

During the old days of the Austrian Empire an important part of Vienna's milk supply came from the Czecho-Slovakian pastures, which are only about thirty miles from the capital. Following the dismemberment of the Empire by the Treaty of Versailles, rigid trade barriers were erected on the Czecho-Slovakian border. Further importation of milk from this source became impossible, and this cessation was one of the factors which resulted in an acute shortage of milk in Vienna.

As a result of the negotiations just completed with the Austrian and Czecho-Slovakian authorities, permission has been obtained for the Friends' Mission to import Czecho-Slovakian milk to Vienna. The cost of such milk will be less than that of Austrian milk, and its purchase will greatly aid the milk-distribution work of the Mission.

While permission is granted by the Czecho-Slovakian authorities only for the importation of milk that is to be used by the Friends' Mission for relief purposes, it is hoped that when once the trade barriers have been lowered in this way, better trade relations will develop between the two countries and that eventually the barrier may be entirely abolished.

One thousand dollars is needed at once to begin these milk purchases.

SERVICE NOTES.

Six looms with automatic shuttles have been purchased by the Polish Mission and installed in the outposts at Powursk and Malecz. On the primitive native looms to which the peasants are accustomed, the actual weaving has to be done by hand. The new looms are worked by hand, but the use of automatic shuttles produces better work in less time, and also makes possible the weaving of designs. Peasant girls from each of the villages in which the looms have been installed are being sent to a school of weaving at Kobryn. On their return home, they can teach the peasant women of their districts the improved method of weaving, and also simple dyeing processes. It is the hope of the Mission that these looms will introduce a permanent improvement into the home industry work of the peasants. One outpost reports that "already keen interest has been aroused in the new automatic looms."

The Polish workers report that in many of the villages surrounding Hoduciszki not a house is left standing, and that the land is still covered with barbed wire and trenches. Food is very scarce and there is sickness in many families. When asked about a patient, the people usually reply, "We don't know what is the trouble with him. He has had no meat for eight years and too little food, often only grass, and for months he hasn't been able to walk." Most of the families have only potatoes for food at present and the majority of them are nearing the end of their supply already.

"ENCLOSED please find my check for $52.84," writes William J. Reagan, Principal of the Oakwood School at Poughkeepsie, N. Y. "It represents Oakwood School's contribution as a Christmas gift to Russian relief. By voluntary unanimous vote the students decided to go without butter for one week and send the money so saved. At the end of the week they decided to continue this for the three remaining days before the Christmas vacation. We estimated that the butter saved would amount to $35. In addition to this there were personal contributions of $6.25 and two First-day school classes added $11.10; while the balance was added by a former Oakwoodite. We feel happy in regard to this expression of good-will and sympathy for those in such great need."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

At a recent meeting of the London Meeting for Sufferings a decision was reached to invite the Dutch Mennonites to send representatives to their Yearly Meeting.

A CONFERENCE is called for Fourth Month next year at Birmingham, England, on Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship. It is an interesting fact that the secretary and treasurer of this important meeting are both Friends.

A HINT might be offered to the Circle of Allied Schools in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. The Schools' Journal is an English Friends' enterprise, launched last year, and speaks for the various Friends' schools in England. The copy we happened to see gives prominence to the school history of Ayton. Next issue some other school will be prominent, but each school has space allotted it in each issue.

The Canadian Friend says:—It shows how times have changed when a London conscientious objector, asked to address a meeting recently, was somewhat surprised to find that the Chairman of the local Tribunal which had heard and dismissed his application for exemption in 1916, was in the chair on this occasion. He was even more astonished when this gentleman, in introducing him said, "The speaker today is one of the bravest men, if not the bravest man, in this suburb."

MARY Mendenhall Hobbs, of Guilford College, N. C., has contributed to the Eleventh and Twelfth Months' numbers of the Friends' Messenger a most interesting historical sketch entitled, "Reconstruction Days in North Carolina." We hope to reprint it in THE FRIEND.

It is significant to note that one of the earliest acts of the Irish Free State Senate was the adoption of a resolution, moved by our Friend James G. Douglas, recording its conviction that the securing of international peace is essential to the well-being of the Irish nation, and appointing five senators to consider, and, if advisable, to consult with others, as to the possibilities of an immediate cessation of acts of violence. In introducing the motion James Douglas made it clear that his action was entirely independent of the Government of any party. He sketched the downward course of the nation in recent months and said: "These acts of violence are leading to a chasm of hatred between men who ought to be and are, whether they admit it or not, common citizens of Ireland, and ought to be brothers, working together for the ideals which we mostly share in common."

BARCLAY'S APOLOGY will soon be added to the list of Friends' books that have been translated into Arabic. Daniel Oliver writes from Ras-el-Metrn: "The translation of this wonderful book is slowly but surely drawing to a close. It will soon be all translated into the Arabic language, and we hope to circulate it far and wide through the Moslem world. I shall answer thy unspoken question. Yes, it will be read, and to the thoughtful and the contemplative, and the home of these is in the East, not the West, Barclay will give food for thought, and will, I believe, enlighten and help men to a knowledge of the truth."

OVER 6,000 copies of the "Appeal of a Warless World" have been distributed in Glasgow, and requests have been received for over 2,000 more, but the supply is exhausted.

THE State of Delaware still cherishes its "time-honored" institution, the whipping-post, its chief use now is said to be the chastisement of the wife beater. David Ferris, well known as a Wilmington Friend through two generations, annually presented a Bill to relegate the whipping-post to the scrap heap.

WE followed with interest last autumn the series of debates with the Oxford team (England) and some half dozen of our American Colleges. M. C. Hallis, a member of the Oxford team, expresses himself in the Outlook, Twelfth Month 6th, as deeply impressed with "the honest co-education" existing at Swarthmore. Comparing co-education in America and England, he says: "But Swarthmore was perhaps our most interesting experience. There we found—what does not exist in England—honest co-education in working. It was so honest that I even had to debate against a lady. The co-education of Oxford means that men and women, as a concession, are allowed to live in the same town, and, when they have finished doing that, are allowed to write the same letters after their name. . . . But it was a novelty to go into a dinner and sit down between two ladies. I was surprised, and perhaps the test of co-education's success at Swarthmore is that everybody else was surprised that I was surprised. The trouble everywhere was the shortness of time. . . . Nothing was left but the remembrance of wonderful friendship and hospitality and a great longing to come again and learn more truly the manner of men and women they are who give these great gifts."

HERBERT PEET writes:—

I get most encouraging news of the activities of the Quaker group in Madras. Recently they circulated 1,500 copies of "The Warless World" appeal to missionaries in South India, while at least three of the local papers republished in full the letter which appeared in The Times on "Friends and Foreign Policy." Particularly to be noted, too, is the attendance at Meeting of members of the Christo Samaj. This is a small body of Indian Christians who have left or have not joined any organized church. Many points of contact were discovered at an informal discussion gathering which some of them attended. My correspondent adds, "we only wish Henry Hodgkin would feel a concern to call here on his way out to China. He would really have a great opportunity with these Christo Samaj members and others who hesitate to become Christians because of the church."

A RECENT article in the Catholic Herald concerning the Society of Friends, drew a letter from Edward Grubb correcting what seemed to him to be one or two incorrect statements. In the course of his communication Edward Grubb said he "appreciated the friendly tone of the article and recognized with gratitude how much Quakerism owes consciously and unconsciously to many of the Catholic mystics."

This reply the Catholic Herald of First Month 6th, prints in full. While still, not unnaturally, remaining unconvinced, the Herald pays a tribute to the "friendly tone" of the letter, which it finds "very pleasing."

THE Book Store at 304 Arch Street has been a heavy purchaser of "Christian Life, Faith and Thought," the New Part I of London Book of Discipline; it has, since having recently sent its seventh order for 200 copies, made its eighth order for a thousand.

A CORRESPONDENT from Glasgow, Scotland, writes that as a result of the flag day organized by the Friends' Relief Committee on behalf of the Russian Famine Fund, the handsome sum of £1,017 8s. 7d. has been received.

NOTICE

THE Young Friends' Fellowship of Twelfth Street Meeting invites all Young Friends to attend the discussion groups held every alternate First-day, in the Institute, 20 S. Twelfth Street. Tea is served at 5 p. m., followed by a speaker and discussion at about 6 o'clock. On Second Month 18th, Francis R. Taylor will lead the group on "The Privileges and Responsibilities of Christian Citizenship." On Third Month 4th, Ernest N. Votaw will lead. Young Friends and others cordially welcome.

A LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

One glorious sun warms all the earth,
One breath, the breath of air,
One silvery moon sheds dreaming light,
One loving Father's care.

So small this world, this lovely world,
That puny man calls "great,"
That in it there's not room for both,
Not room for Love and Hate.

So small this world, this lovely world,
Arched o'er by bending skies,
That no man liveth to himself,
And to himself none dies.

"FIRST THINGS FIRST."

We hear sometimes that our young people cannot be expected to enjoy reading the early writings of Friends because of their "archaic language," or some one wishes that our ministers would use more "every-day conversational expressions." Then how interesting to find a very modern religious teacher using what we have considered an old-time Quaker phrase, one that was much used by the ministers of a past generation, and speaking of putting "first things first."

H. E. Fosdick is just beginning, in one of our popular monthly magazines, a series of papers on "Twelve Tests of Character," and the sub-title of the opening paper is this old-time phrase—"First Things First."

The thought is timely. As the writer says:—

"Today the currents of life are swift and stimulating, the demands of life are absorbing. There are more things to do than we ever shall get done; there are more books to read than we ever can look at; there are more avenues of enjoyment than we ever shall find time to travel. Life appeals to us from innumerable directions, crying 'Attend to me here!' In consequence, we are continually tempted to dabble. We litter up our lives with indiscriminate preoccupation. We let first come be first served, forgetting that the finest things do not crowd. We let the loudest voices fill our ears, forgetting that asses bray, but gentlemen speak low. Multitudes of people are living not bad, but frittered lives."

The daily experience of most of us proves the truth of this.

Our lives are crowded; like rooms, too full to be properly cared for.

Have we the courage to do with our lives what we sometimes have to do with our rooms—our closets, and drawers and desks?

Those of us who were "brought up" on Jacob Abbott's books for children (and it was no mean education!) recall the wisdom of "Rollo's" advice to "Lucy" when they cleared up her "treasure closet,"—to keep nearest the door the things she used most often, and push the others further back; which is another way of presenting the same thought;—of choice between the most-needed, and the less-needed, the first and second best.

Fosdick's concern for the "first things" in reading is well put. He speaks of the reading we do for a gain of efficiency in our daily tasks, which seems a real need; but adds, "if a man uses books only so, as Pharaoh might use his slaves to build the pyramid of his success and renown, he does not know what real reading means."

"Nevertheless, the great books are waiting for us all. If the world's poets and seers, prophets and apostles were alive, we could hardly meet them one by one, much less talk with them. But in a book they will come to each of us as though there were no one else in all the world for them to call upon. Though we are so poor that we must have them in paper covers, they will be all there. Though we are so dull that we cannot understand at first, they will repeat the message to us again and again. Though we are so foolish as to forget, they will be there on the morrow to tell it to us once more with tireless patience. Great books are the perfect democrats. The shame of many of us is that with such books waiting to be read we stop to barter gossip with every corner loafer on our way. Any vagrant straggler down the literary street can waste our attention and our time. And because time and attention are limited, having read this, we cannot read that."

The other one of the "first things" with which this paper deals is a still deeper matter, as Fosdick says, and concerns "some of our lost moral and religious values."

"The problem of the family, for example, would be in a fair way toward solution if fathers and mothers would once more put first things first in their relationships with their children.

"One of the troubles with this much berated younger generation is not primarily with this younger generation at all, but with the older generation. What the younger generation needs is not so much critics as examples."

"A father, whose son had been dropped from several schools and colleges and who confessed that he knew nothing whatsoever about the boy, recently brought him to another college and demanded that, as a quid pro quo for money given, that institution should assume the problem of his son. "I am a very busy man," he said, "and I have no time to attend to him."

"The trouble with that father is not lack of time. He has time to do those things which he considers essential. His difficulty is that he thinks some things are more important than caring about his son, that some entrustments are more sacred than that.

"Once, in the grey of a winter dawn, an early riser watched a stooped and aged woman groping about a building in process of construction, picking up bits of lath and sawed-off ends of lumber. It was a pathetic sight to see a woman reduced to the offscourings of the wood for fire to warm her household,

THE FRIEND PUBLISHED BY DAVIS H. FORSYTHE, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

But even more pathetic is it to see the finest relationships of human life, our friends, our families, and at last our God, seeking around the main business of our days for the scraps and left-overs of our attention. We give the logwood of our life to secondary matters; to the highest we give the chips.

"More than anything else one suspects that this is at the root of irreligion. It is not skepticism, but preoccupation, which generally makes the innermost relationships of a man's soul with God of no account. The highest is in us all. At times it flames up and we know that we are not dust but spirit, and that in fellowship with the Spiritual Life, from whom we came, is our power and our peace. But many a man who has known the meaning and the might of this relationship has largely lost it, not because theoretically he has disbelieved, but because practically he has crowded it out."

We can not but be grateful for these forceful words from the man who is said to influence more young people than any religious teacher in our country.

One of the Friends who has recently spoken in Philadelphia on "Quaker Ideals" has revived the ideal of Family Life held by our Religious Society in a strong and beautiful address, as among the "first things."

The magazine article will reach a still wider circle.

Visiting Friends at North Dartmouth.

It is sometimes my privilege to listen to what I consider good conversation—brisk and provocative or witty or pleasantly reminiscent—but somehow or other I never listen nowadays with that rapt enjoyment with which as a child I listened to the conversation of the visiting Friends that from time to time came to my father's house.

These visitors were invested with a distinct importance which set them apart from relatives and friends who came just for social visiting. I cannot remember when I did not realize that visiting Friends came to go to meeting with us and that they wanted to help and encourage that meeting. Perhaps if our meeting had been large and visiting Friends had come more frequently I should not have felt so keenly the currents of love and sympathy, the warmth of personal friendship which seemed to emanate from these visitors. It was as if they wore mantles of soft brightness. My childish feelings were, I suppose, chiefly a reflection of what the older people about me felt. I had never attended large, vigorous meetings. I thought all Friends' meetings were small, and secure in a child's belief in the power and ability of grown-ups, I never felt discouragement over the problems that faced the tiny scattered meetings of the Conservative New England Friends. That there were problems I knew, for I heard them discussed frequently. But at all events I immediately responded to the animation that sounded in father's or grandfather's voice announcing that some Friends from Ohio or Philadelphia were coming to see us.

As I have said, I knew that these people were coming to attend our meeting, and, if ministers were expected, one or two of us children used to ride about the country roads with a favorite uncle, leaving notices at village homes and farm-houses of appointed meetings. We children went also to all the meetings and listened to long sermons, of which I seldom understood much beyond the Biblical stories and the underlying spirit. Still I always felt glad these Friends had come. They made our meeting seem more important.

But after meeting was over and dinner with its more or less desultory conversation was finished, then everybody gathered in the living-room and those wonderful real conversations began. Often for long periods there would be a monologue—then again this would break into quick dialogue and bright repartee. Stories of pioneer days in thinly settled country, stories of Quaker courtships, of providential deliverances from danger, of Divine leading to duties not till afterward understood, of curious customs and strange foods encountered in far journeyings—all this and this much more was spread before my mind like a rich tapestry whereon all the figures were alive.

That this adult conversation was a real source of education I am certain, and I am as grateful now as I was at the age of ten that mother sometimes let us sit up later than at ordinary times to listen to Eliza Varney or Archibald Crosby or some other good talker.

The first time that Archibald Crosby came to see us we children were delighted with his white beard, rosy cheeks and twinkling eyes. We thought he looked like Santa Claus. I remember mother asked him to read "My Ain Countrie" for us and we listened spellbound to his rich Scotch voice rolling out the lines. And I remember that I asked him to write in my autograph album, a new and much-valued possession. I don't know where that little album is now, but I remember word for word what he wrote:—

"Dear Annie—There is a road and the name of it is Patience. The flowers that grow by it are few but very sweet, and if we pluck them and weave them into crowns their fragrance will be everlasting.

Thy friend, Archibald Crosby."

Eliza Varney came several different times, but each time to reinforce the first impression made—that she was one of the best story-tellers to whom I ever listened. Who that ever heard her relate the story of the Quaker lover who asked the important question of his lady love in the very presence of his rival by handing the girl an open Bible as he pointed to a certain text, can forget the delicious throaty laugh which accompanied the tale? Her many and varied travels had given her a vast store of anecdotes, and on her later visits I never wearied of hearing her and my father going over their camping adventures while visiting the Doukhobor settlements in Canada shortly after those peculiar Russians had migrated there.

The first Philadelphia Friends that I remember were Dr. Edward Maris and his wife. I recall being considerably impressed with the rigid nicety of their Philadelphia apparel and only gradually realized that they were pleasant, approachable persons when Dr. Maris took some little antique coins out of his pocket and began to tell us children about them. The acquaintance then begun lasted very pleasantly for years, and I believe it was through Dr. Maris that John Dillingham first came to North Dartmouth. Although the latter was a New Englander and spent his summers at his old home in West Falmouth, not far from us across Buzzard's Bay, he had lived and taught so long in Philadelphia that I think he had not known much about our locality or little group of Friends. We all enjoyed him immensely, and I think he enjoyed us, for I remember once after his being at my grandfather Tucker's, his saying as he walked back toward our house,

"Oh for a lodge in some nice Gidley nest,
Some boundless Tuckermont of shade!"

And because my grandfather had always recited Cowper to us I could appreciate the parody.

One day my youngest sister was wearing her first real watch, a little one pinned to her dress, and John Dillingham looked at her thoughtfully for a few minutes and then said, "Ebeth, keep on thy watch." What child wouldn't hang upon the words of such a visiting Friend? The stories of his that I remember best were of his Spartan life as a student at Harvard, but in the telling he made jokes at his difficulties and discomfort.

Joseph Elkinton, Senior, came many times and we all loved to see his tall, well-built figure slowly unfold from the family carry-all that had brought him to the station. His stories of travel among the Indians fascinated us, and his simple narration of interviews with presidents and high officials gave him an ambassadorial dignity in our eyes. I have never since known anyone, I think, who gave me the same blended impressions of gentleness and power.

Perhaps it was on Joseph Elkinton's first visit that he was accompanied by Joseph Walton. The latter was much interested in walking through our woods and fields and was the first to introduce me to the partridge berry. He showed me how beautiful the tiny leaves and bright berries were, and though I have forgotten much botany learned long since then, I shall probably never forget the Latin name of that plant which he told me that day.

Ruth Abbott came and revisited places well-known and loved before she moved to Philadelphia. Her charming, alert manner and ready smile still seem very real to me as I write her name. There were many others who came in those long ago days. James Kite with a never-exhausted supply of stories, Andrew and Sarah Hinshaw with tales of pioneer days, stately Hepsibeth Hussey, whose Nantucket school my mother had attended, Cyrus Harvey, forceful and broad-minded, Benjamin Wood from Canada, Benjamin Brown from North Carolina, Jesse Darbyshire and Thomas Davidson, Lydia Sargent and Catharine Smith from Fritchley, England—it is a long procession and a varied, but one quality all these visitors seemed to possess in common, the ability to talk well of interesting things.

Today children in Friends' families are getting their ideas of humor from comic supplements and their stories from a flood of commonplace books and magazines if not from moving pictures. These are wretched substitutes for the richly human, sympathetic interpretation of life we used to get from listening to the conversation of visiting Friends and suggests a very real, though perhaps minor reason, for regretting that the custom of Friendly visiting has so nearly died out.

ESTHER FOWLER'S LAST DAY AT MEETING.

(FIFTH MONTH 14, 1922.)

We who met there could not surely know
That meeting day would be her very last:
She had been with us for so many years
And faltered not; her faith was strong
In God our Father; her dear voice often Called us to hear and follow Him.
That day she told us of the call
Of Abraham, and of the promise made
To him; that he believed God and it
Was counted unto him for righteousness;
And how God's blessing followed him
Through desert journeys and through nights of trial
And crowned him throughout all his years.
So Abraham was called the friend of God
And father of the faithful.
"I verily believe," she said, "God's blessings wait
And are withheld from us sometimes for want
Of faith and faithfulness upon our part."
So some remembered: she being dead
Yet speaks to us and tenderly entreats
Of us to follow—follow Him
Who once, in days of old, called Abraham
And led him faithful throughout all his years.

WATCH your way as a cautious traveler; and don't be gazing at that mountain or river in the distance and saying, "How shall I ever get over them?" but keep to the little inch that is before you, and accomplish that in the little moment that belongs to it. The mountain and the river can only be passed in the same way, and when you come to them, you will come to the light and strength that belong to them.—M. A. KELTY.

THE REAL CURE.

From Babson's Reports.

Many times we have diagnosed certain industrial troubles as spiritual rather than material. By that we meant that the motives and viewpoints of the people involved were wrong. Consequently they found themselves in difficulties. Probably at least two-thirds of the troubles of this world are spiritual. Certainly 95 per cent. of our social evils, and I hesitate to say how many of our political troubles, would immediately disappear if people really believed the religion they profess. The relations between capital and labor, the struggles between nations, and the conflict between individuals depend upon whether or not the parties involved have the right spiritual insight. Physicians are also agreed that a very large percentage of our bodily ailments would be avoided if we were at peace spiritually.

This is what we mean when we say that lack of religion is responsible for most of the world's troubles. From this standpoint it is interesting to see the tremendous amount of interest which Coué has created by demonstrating the effect of mental peace on bodily welfare. Aside from the question of Divine healing it is assuredly a fact that the gospel of St. Paul, which most people have heard preached from their childhood, contains all and more than Coué or any other scientist has ever offered. The moment, however, that someone comes along with only a part of the same story dressed up in scientific language, every one hails it as a new discovery.

The reason is that the majority of people have come to look upon their religious activity as an abstract duty rather than a source of practical power. Even the ministry itself seems to have lost sight of this most important phase of its work. If it had not, every minister in the country today would be on his toes reclaiming that faith in God will do all and more than Coué can offer. The fact is, however, that practically all of the Christian ministry are willing to stand by and let Coué monopolize the most valuable part of their work. It is true that the love of God is the only solution of our greatest troubles. When our churches really wake up and show people how to secure this great power we shall hear no more about lack of interest in religion!

WONDERFUL POSSIBILITIES OF THE BIBLE.

We have already referred to the harmless discussion concerning the ten books that a man would take with him if he were to be left on a desert island for life. Naturally the choice of books has varied with the tastes of the readers, and as a consequence we have had a great variety of titles. It is to be noted that nearly all have started with the Bible and Shakespeare, and then followed with the volumes they liked best. One shrewd chap did not forget a cook book. But now along comes Dr. McCormick, chancellor emeritus of the Pittsburgh University, to say that he would not take ten books, but only one, and that one the Bible.

At first blush this seems like taking a great chance, but when it is given more thoughtful consideration we do not have much difficulty in following the reasoning of this scholar. His contention is that this remarkable book is the book of books and that it contains, in one form or another, all that we can find in other volumes. Romance, adventure and tragedy are there in good measure. Would you have poetry, it is before you in the Psalms of David, not to mention other beautiful parts of the age-old Book. Again, why bother with Shakespeare when the drama of Job is at your disposal? Do you care for essays and meditations? They are to be found in the pages of Ecclesiastes. Probably you are fond of stories. If so it would be hard to find anything to surpass the narrative of Ruth.

In a word, the man who took this remarkable book with him on a desert island would have a substantial library at his disposal, and, with abundance of time and leisure, could most assuredly give himself a liberal education.—From the Philadelphia Inquirer.

TEMPERANCE.

The material for this issue has been furnished by Benjamin F. Whitson.

RIGHT does not win just because it is Right. It wins because right-minded people want it and fight for it. When evil wins, it is because evil-minded people want it and fight for it while right-minded people sleep. Evil never conquers Good. Good surrendres. . . . We believe in the sound-heartedness of the American people, but they must be shown. That means ceaseless agitation and education. And still more agitation and education. And education and organization. And still more education and organization. And a tireless, relentless, unyielding fight.—H. H. BARSTOW, Auburn, N. Y.

SENSE OR NONSENSE?—The "wets" pretend to believe that the way to enforce the Prohibition Law is to increase the alcoholic content in beverage drinks. They argue that the best way to destroy the evil effects of alcoholic drinks is to put more alcohol in them. Apparently a great many people accept this teaching, but we hope that all readers of THE FRIEND are intelligent enough to see the fallacy of it. Another contention is that the law cannot be enforced and should, therefore, be repealed or disregarded. The law is enforced to such a degree already that the traffic in intoxicating liquors has been driven to cover in cellars and holes in the ground throughout a large part of the country. It has been well said that a quart of whiskey makes more disturbance now than a carload did formerly, so difficult is it to obtain. Just why a law should be repealed because it is difficult to enforce, is another line of talk that intelligent people have difficulty in comprehending. The law against murder is difficult to enforce. It seems to be violated by both men and women (especially women) with impunity. And yet everybody concedes it to be a wise law. The cost of enforcement is too great is another declaration we frequently hear. Nine million dollars seems like a huge sum, unless in connection with naval appropriations or something of that kind. But why is so little said about the eight million, one hundred and twenty thousand dollars collected last year in fines imposed on violators of the Prohibition law? Why emphasize the amount of the appropriation if 90 per cent. is to be returned to the Treasury?

CONDITIONS IN PENNSYLVANIA were forcefully described by Homer W. Tope, State Superintendent of the A. S. L., in his report to the Toronto Convention of the World League Against Alcoholism. He said, "When the Eighteenth Amendment was adopted Pennsylvania had 10,512 licensed saloons, 1386 wholesale liquor stores and 207 breweries. The per capita consumption of liquors was almost thirty gallons (think of that). The organized liquor interests constituted the most powerful political group in the Commonwealth. At no time previous to 1918 were the 'drys' able to command the support of more than 40 per cent. of the members of either branch of the Legislature. Prohibition has had less than half a chance.

"Moreover, our present State law provides a license system of near-beer. Most of the crafty saloonkeepers of other days have stayed in the business. In Philadelphia alone there are about 1900 of these saloons. Federal Agents say that with rare exceptions they are simply bootlegging establishments. The Federal Enforcement Bureau is very inadequate, and has been hampered by the effort of politicians to use it for their personal advantage.

"In the recent election the voters selected Gifford Pinchot as Governor. For seven years he has been a member of the Board of Trustees of the A. S. L. He is an outstanding advocate of Prohibition. We have, too, a Legislature which is friendly to the Eighteenth Amendment. Our two United States Senators are 'dry,' and nineteen of our thirty-six Representatives are 'dry.' These facts are creating friendship for Prohibition in the minds of our people.

"Our enemies have been giving extended publicity to statistics of arrests for drunkenness in 1922 and 1921, as compared with 1920. We admit there has been an increase, but the unfairness of such a comparison must be apparent. In the last two years before prohibition, 1917 and 1918, the number of arrests for intoxication averaged 29,759 yearly, whereas for the first two years under Prohibition it averaged 18,081, showing a falling off of 37 per cent. During the same period the decrease for 'drunkenness and disorderly conduct' was 50 per cent. During 1917 there were 562 arrests of 'habitual drunkards.' In 1921 there were only 34. In 1918 there were 927 arrests of prostitutes. In 1921, only 229. In the city of Pittsburgh in 1917 there were 3970 persons committed to jail for drunkenness. In 1921 the number committed for the same offense was 924, showing a reduction of 76 per cent.

"Ten months after Prohibition had gone into effect the Anti-Saloon League made a comprehensive survey of the county jails and found that the prison population had been cut to exactly one-half what it had been two months before Prohibition was established. During Eleventh Month, 1922, we again asked the sheriffs for a report on the prison population. We find that it is now about 45 per cent. of what it was two months before the national law went into effect (The reader may observe that, while the number of prisoners is somewhat greater now than it was one year after prohibition went into effect, it is apparently only 45 per cent. of what it was before Prohibition.) But there is a difference in the character of the jail population. At the present time approximately one-third is made up of persons convicted of, or awaiting trial for, violation of the Prohibition Law. Deducting these we find that our jail population is to-day only about 30 per cent. of what it used to be (for the same offenses).

"The report of the Philadelphia Society for Organized Charity shows that alcoholism was a serious factor in the case of twenty-three per cent. of the families cared for in the two years ending Ninth Month 30, 1917, but during the two years following it was only 4 per cent. The record of domestic troubles as revealed by the Municipal Court record is alike astonishing. In 1916 it was over 40 per cent. In 1920 it had fallen to less than 7 per cent. The Philadelphia General Hospital is one of the largest institutions of its kind in America. In the old days the care of alcoholics was one of its biggest burdens. In 1918 the number of such cases admitted for treatment was 2326. In 1920 it had fallen to 743, and in 1921 to 704, and for ten months of 1922 (to date of this report) it was 499, indicating even better results for this year.

"Banking institutions throughout the State, with few exceptions, bear eloquent testimony to the influence of Prohibition on the savings of the people. The manufacturing centre of Kensington and Frankford, Philadelphia, was one of the worst run-cursed sections in the State. In First Month, 1917, the six banks in this territory showed savings deposits amounting to $8,965,000. In First Month, 1922, when we were at the depth of financial depression and there had been also a prolonged strike, these banks had a total savings deposit of $19,494,000.

"Let us consider one of the largest and most difficult districts in the State—namely, Lancaster County. In 1916 it had 269 retail and 39 wholesale liquor establishments. It was one of our wettest counties. In order to get light on the present situation, John H. Landis, a former State Senator, sent a questionnaire to one thousand prominent men representing every borough and township. He received replies from about three-fourths of them. Here are samples:—

"Is there as much drinking as there was two years ago? Answers: Yes, 33; No, 704.

"Is there as much drunkenness? Answers: Yes, 19; No, 718.

"Is the moral standard of your community any higher? Answers: Yes, 569; No, 106.

"Senator Landis claims that his inquiries drew out the following evidence:—

"Public treating has disappeared.

"Public drinking reduced 80 per cent.

"Fighting and quarrelling now very rare.

"Bills paid much more promptly.

"School attendance increased; children better clothed,

"Marked increase in Church and Sunday School attendance.
 "Public sentiment against vice in every form much stronger.
 "Use of liquor in elections greatly reduced.
 "We may add that their 'dry' Congressman was re-elected, and three out of four Assemblymen are 'dry.'"

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

TAUGHT BY "OUR FATHER."—(A True Story)—The following incident in the life of a little bird is remembered by the writer who saw it when a small boy. A pair of Baltimore orioles nested year after year in a large maple tree which stood so close to the porch that some of its branches touched the roof of the house in which my father lived for more than fifty years.

During the spring of the year in which this occurred our friendly and even loving eyes had watched the construction and completion of the orioles' nest. Then one day, while the patient little mother was sitting on their precious eggs, a violent wind and rainstorm came on.

The gusts of wind dashed so furiously that the anxious eyes of the family beheld the hanging nest in imminent peril of being torn loose and broken; but also they could see the heroic little mother clinging closely to her position on the eggs, although the nest was seen to be turned upside down repeatedly. She did not "give up the ship" nor say "what's the use," at least we did not hear it, but she saved her eggs and hatched them in due time. But when the storm passed and sunshine brightened life again, did the storm-tossed little mother forget her lesson? Not she!

The watching eyes of the family directed by a keenly observant father, became wondering eyes when they saw the orioles gather strings which they fastened to their faithfully cared-for nest to the nearby branches as intelligently as if we could have told them to steady the nest with guy ropes. Were they not taught by the Father of all, Who teaches all?

This our childish interest stirred
 More by deeds than any word.
 Thru the next succeeding Springs
 Dressed the bushes well with strings
 For the use of building bird.

WILLIAM CARTER.

A University Man in China.

FIRST-DAY, Twelfth Month 10, 1922.

DEAR FRIEND:—

Now that we have just completed a delightful two weeks in Canton among "home folks," I take this first opportunity to tell thee a little about our experiences. My nephew Wistar and his most attractive bride came on board our ship at Hong Kong before we landed and needless to say we were indeed glad to see them after two years' absence from him. We proceeded to Canton by the little boat that night and reached there at seven the next morning, being met by the Canton Christian College launch with Dr. Cadbury, Charles Haines and C. N. Laird, my U. of P. classmate, on board. A thirty minute run brought us to the College and the Cadburys very kindly took care of us in William Penn Lodge. It was nice to realize how comfortably fixed they are in that house. After a few days we moved over to the Holts' home and then the Lairds took us in for the remaining time of our stay. We had lunch and dinner with Wistar and Evelyn and Charles in the former's little apartment on the third floor of Martin Hall when we were not accepting invitations for meals elsewhere, which was, however, pretty frequently. Both Curtis and I were pressed into service in addressing the Middle School children, and I also spoke to the College students and addressed the Faculty devotional meeting one evening. Wistar had them the following week. They also gave me the opportunity of "preaching" at the Shameen Union Church service on a First-day late afternoon, and as the congregation was expecting to hear the acting Head of the C. C. C., the Church was full. That night I spent with Geo. E. Lerrigo, the Canton Y. M. C. A. Secretary, at Paak Huk Tung, where he and a number of other missionaries live, a little way outside the city. Here is the True-Light Seminary for girls and the Union Theological Seminary. Here Edwin C. Howe and his wife (formerly Elizabeth Faries, of Philadelphia) entertained all the Philadelphians in Canton one evening for supper. This was a very pleasant reunion. Another evening was given up to a U. of P. alumni gathering at a dinner given by Lau Tai Chi, a recent graduate of the Dental Department and the best dentist now in Canton. We were also honored with another dinner of about fifty guests, mostly returned students from America, men and women, given by a former U. of P. student friend, J. Usang Ly. The other evenings were mostly taken up dining out with our faculty friends at the C. C. C. It is hardly necessary for me to go into any detail regarding the fine service this institution is rendering in the building up of an educated Christian leadership for China. I do not know how many of the graduates give themselves to all time Christian work for their life vocation. I am hoping many of them do for I find that if the Chinese Christian Church is to hold in its leadership those students who come back from America, it must have a well-educated ministry; it is here that a real lack exists at present. And where else can that Church expect to obtain its ministers if not through such institutions as the C. C. C.? Every First-day morning there are two services for worship in the Y. M. C. A. building which serves as the chapel, one of which is sometimes in English and sometimes in Chinese. The other is always Chinese. The last First-day, as both services were in Chinese, we took the opportunity of having a Friends' Meeting down at William Penn Lodge. Those Friends present were the Cadburys, our family group, Charles Haines and a few others who, though not Friends, have been interested in our Christian point of view. The Howard family is home on furlough. This was a helpful period of worship.

One afternoon we walked over to a nearby village where Dr. Cadbury has opened a dispensary. We were ushered into a neat, clean three-room house on one of the narrow little streets, rent 75 cents gold a month. It was full of patients, with a Chinese woman doctor and nurse in attendance. Evelyn Wood and the Lairds are going to give some time to this work, the ladies being trained nurses and each most interested in evangelizing the people. It is wonderful how they have won their way in all the dirty little villages surrounding the College campus, even among those people who for one reason or another have been hostile to this foreign institution. Though the College is distinctly American and while there we felt very much at home, we were not allowed to forget that we were in China as the sound of the drums with their incessant tom-tom would come to us from a village not far away, accompanied by the weird Chinese music and the continuous rattle of fire-crackers as some funeral, wedding or other celebration was going on. We were much interested to see the joss sticks burning on the sampans and slipper boats to bring good luck, and the youngsters who lived on these boats if under eight years of age would generally have a chunk of wood strapped to their backs to keep them afloat should they tumble overboard, or at least to show where they were floating so they could be picked up as quickly as possible.

I felt that it must be very stimulating to teach such students as these Chinese for, generally speaking, they do not go to school because it is the customary thing and because their parents send them, but because they are eager to learn, they want to know, so the drudgery of the teaching is taken away. But all good times must come to an end, so on Fifth-day afternoon we bade farewell to Canton and our friends and relatives and came to Hong Kong, accompanied by J. Usang Ly. You may recall that he also holds a degree from Haverford and is very much interested in Friends' views, being a member of the Fellowship of Reconciliation. Sixth-day evening we had dinner in the home of Dr. M. H. Chau, the leading Chinese dentist in Hong Kong, a graduate of the U. of P., who has a son now studying there. Seventh-day morning, J. Usang Ly took us around the island, and so enabled us to see some of the very beautiful views of mountain and sea which continually present themselves as the road winds around and up and down. We had lunch at the Repulse Bay Hotel, located on a sandy beach and bay. The blue green of the ocean, the blue of the sky and the green mountains formed a combination which even the Italian coast can not exceed, I am sure. We arrived at the pier to catch the launch for the steamer moored out in the bay at the precise hour of departure, 2 P. M., so we had made the best of every minute of our last hours in China. The most kind and generous hospitality of all our friends, our returned Chinese student friends especially, has shown how much they have appreciated what kindnesses we have been able to render them in America. Being a stranger in a strange country has shown me anew, also, the great value in developing international friendly relations and better international understanding of our International Student House and all the activities promoted through it. This letter is all too long now, so I will close with best of wishes for the happiest of New Years to thee and thine.

Ever faithfully thy friend.

WHITTIER'S LOYALTY TO FRIENDS.

[We published some weeks ago a review of the book alluded to in the following paper. If a few quotations are identical in the two essays it only emphasizes the fact that we are peculiarly sensitive to what the poet said and wrote.—EDs.]

In the new volume entitled "Whittier's Unknown Romance," mentioned recently in THE FRIEND, there are several letters that reflect the poet's loyalty to the Society of Friends. The following extract is from a letter of Sixth Month 24, 1859, to Elizabeth Lloyd Howell (widow of Robert Howell), of Philadelphia. It was after her husband's death, and at a time when Whittier's earlier affection for her had been renewed by a visit to Philadelphia during which he was much in her company. Apparently Elizabeth Howell was already following the bent that led her subsequently into the Episcopal Church. In a later letter Whittier says: "I shall not make a red republican of thee, nor will thee convert me to a belief in bishops, reverend fathers, and apostolic succession. I don't see any saving virtue in candles, surplices, altars, and prayer books." The following is, however, more constructive, and is a rare declaration of fidelity to the Quaker faith:

"What does thee mean by talking as thee does about Friends? Does thee really think there are no good and worthy and interesting and refined people in the Quaker fold? There has surely too much good sense and conscience, and too delicate a sense of justice to be swayed by prejudice. Why, dear E., thou art a Quaker, and those who love thee best have learned to love thee as such. Thee owes too much to thy Quaker training and culture, to disown and deny us at this late day. I, as thee knows, am no sectarian, but I am a Quaker, nevertheless, and I regard the philosophy underlying Quakerism as the truest and purest the world has ever known. I care little for some of our peculiarities: but I love the principles of our Society, and I know that it, with all its faults and follies, is, at the moment, in the very van of Christendom: that among its members, at this very hour, are the best specimens of Christians to be found in the wide world. My reason, my conscience, my taste, my love of the beautiful and the harmonious, combine to make me love the Society. I cannot understand thy feeling: I am only very sorry for it. I am well aware how the conduct of certain individuals, and the general condition of things in Philadelphia, might affect thee, but thy noble and generous nature could not include all in thy condemnation. Oh, dear E., let us cultivate charity, let us forget and forgive. Think how the dear God bears with us—how His infinite pity follows us, rebuking our ingratitude with blessings!"

Friends may well prize this statement, recently rescued from obscurity. It is the more striking in that the poet was taking direct issue with the woman to whom his soul was being drawn by deep ties of affection.

Glimpses of Iowa and Iowa Yearly Meeting.

WEST BRANCH.

We will remember the outstanding features of the afternoon ride—the bright sunshine falling on pleasant farms and wooded dells, the crossing of Cedar River, pursuing its meandering course amid wide, green meadows, or around some "fairy foreland," the beautiful village of Mount Vernon, wherein nestle the attractive buildings of Cornell College, and, not least in memory's reckoning, the intimate converse held with our companion on topics vital to the Society of Friends, in this day of stirring activities and outreaching Christian fellowship.

The dusk of evening was already settling on the village of West Branch when the car of our friend drew up at the home of Pearson W. Thomas, an aged Friend hounded by invalidism, yet deeply interested in all that we could tell him about the Yearly Meeting just closed and Philadelphia Friends, while his wife sat by, an attentive listener, and saying that her ancestral (Walker) home was on the banks of our historic Brandywine, which she has ever longed to see.

Nightfall found us most courteously welcomed within the home of Elisha J. and Eva Bye. Through the help of these and other Friends a meeting for worship was arranged for the next morning, although the regular mid-week meeting had been held that day.

As we entered the house at the appointed time it seemed already hallowed with the spirit of prayer, and here as elsewhere was found the grace of Christian fellowship that could be rated far above a perfunctory welcome given to a stranger simply as such.

This meeting was attended by the pupils of the Scattergood School, who walked the near two miles distances to be present. How attractive appeared those bright young faces—boys and girls—as we passed them moving with elastic steps toward the meeting-house. We recalled with emotion those lines of Wordsworth entitled "Stepping Westward." Their's was not a greeting put in words but in action—

"And stepping westward seemed to be
A kind of heavenly destiny—

.....
..... Something without place or bound,
And seemed to give me spiritual right
To travel through that region bright."

Here again was effected the joy of meeting old friends and finding new. Among others, our whilom acquaintance, Howard T. Jones and wife, of an Atlantic City hostelry, who years ago forsook what seemed enticing promise of outward gain, here greet us with an invitation to dine with them in company with other guests upon their Iowa farm. May this call of the kine, the sheep and the horse, the plowing of fields, and the care of the house prove a blessing to them and their delightful family of children.

Evening comes to find us a guest in the home of Robert E. Coppock and wife. Robert is a farmer and stock breeder, and lives close by his father, Joseph Coppock, who is also a farmer. With the latter we spent the night, and indulged in pleasing memories of Westtown school days back in the '70's.

It was with deep interest that we learned that we were now in the immediate neighborhood of the Scattergood School, whose superintendent and matron, William Clarkson and Mary S. Moffitt we had met at the Yearly Meeting, and been by them invited to visit the institution. The school buildings are attractively located on a plot of several acres. They consist of a main building and boys' dormitory, with accommodations for about forty pupils. The needs of the school, which are pressing, have already been referred to. Introduced into the family parlor, we were soon surrounded by the superintendents and the teachers, Bernard Standing and Deborah Stratton, accompanied by their charges of happy-looking boys and girls. Our talk to them was of the difficulties, the joys and sources of inspiration of school days, followed by the reading of a chapter from the Scriptures. An inspection of the school equipment which followed, including dining-room, kitchen, larder, class-rooms and boys' dormitory, brought increasing desire that this interesting institution and its needs may command a blessing, to the encouragement of its patrons and caretakers.

It was under a beautiful star-lit sky and near the midnight hour, that we retraced our steps towards our abode for the night. The brief walk led us past Hickory Grove meeting-house, with its accompanying little school-house and burial-ground across the road, with its humble memorials to the dead; all these showing white in the contrasting shadows of the night, as if in metaphor reminding of those who in their earthly lives had striven for that deepest, divine blessing—the cleansing of the spiritual nature amid the toil and moil of outward things.

COAL CREEK.

Next morning early, we exchanged our farewell to "Quaker Knoll Dairy Farm," for a delightful twelve mile ride in the car of our host to Iowa City, in order to reach a train for Coal Creek. The route led us back to the town of West Branch, renewing with tender emotion incidents of the day previous; also permitting of a close glimpse of the tiny dwelling wherein first saw the light one whose name in recent years has again and again resounded throughout the world, where might of intellect, power of intuition, and grasp of situation to be remedied has asked for the man of the hour's need—Herbert Hoover.

As we rode down one of the imposing thoroughfares of Iowa City, we noted with interest at the end confronting and rising into the clear morning air the great dome of the building which at one time was Iowa's capitol. It is now an adjunct of the State University, and at the moment was evidently undergoing renovation; the dome already resplendent in its new coat of copper. Occupying a commanding site across the Iowa River, and looking down upon the city, was the great, new structure of the Perkin's Child-Welfare Hospital, said to be so complete in its equipment as to draw the attention and visits from medical experts throughout the world.

"WE may look through a glass at the distant heavens, or we may make the glass itself the focal point of visions, and see nothing else. Now, the world is such a glass. The devout man looks through it and sees God; the worldly man sees only the glass itself."—J. F. CLARKE.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING.

The first of the series of Quarterly Meetings preparatory to the Yearly Meeting of 1923 was held at Fourth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia, on Second Month 6th. About the usual number of Friends were in attendance. Several visitors were present, among whom was A. Neave Brayshaw of Scarborough, England, with a minute from Pickering and Hull Monthly Meeting, endorsed by Yorkshire Quarterly Meeting, and also one from the Meeting for Sufferings of London Yearly Meeting.

In the meeting for worship there were several helpful and highly spiritual communications, the older Friends being encouraged as they had escaped the temptations of earlier years not to fall into those more likely to assail them in later life—discouragement, a feeling of desolation, etc., and were warned not to follow the course of the friend and servant of King David, he who had been loyal to his master at the time of the insurrection of Absalom yet had followed Adonijah in his endeavor to displace the aged king. Our attention was also drawn to the difference between the attitude of the captive Jews who were unable to "Sing the Lord's song in a strange land" and the experiences of Paul and Silas in the prison at Philippi where they, too, were captives, but unlike their predecessors of former generations were able to pray and sing praises which, being heard by others, were instrumental in bringing them to see the Light,—the great difference being wrought because of the manifestation of the love of God through Jesus Christ, our Lord.

In the business sessions answers were prepared to all the Queries and other business for the Yearly Meeting was directed to be forwarded to it; in addition, the question of Birthright Membership was considered and a minute adopted expressing our attitude on that important subject, which also is to be sent to the Yearly Meeting. The minute is as follows:

"In considering the question of Birthright Membership which the Yearly Meeting last year called to our attention, this Meeting is united in the feeling that we are not prepared to recommend any change in the form of our present practice. At the same time we desire that all our mature membership should be founded on positive conviction. Whilst we are born into our families, our homes, our nation, born heirs of the past and of the promise of the future, we are also born into our religious associations. Yet we recognize that some of our members are nominal members only and that this fact is a source of weakness in our Society. In the words of a recent writer in The Friend (London)—'Birthright Membership is very incomplete until it has grown into a membership of conviction.'"

We want to hold our young people and we want our Society to feel the responsibility for them and their spiritual growth. We all must recognize the value of searching periods in our spiritual development. We are not able at this time to suggest how such testing best may be brought about and there may easily be a snare in attempting to prescribe any form. If we ponder carefully the latter sentence of the Sixth Query we see that Friends have been alive in the past to this important question, whilst the different Meetings have been given freedom of action in relation to it. That Query puts to each one of us this pointed question:—

"Do your young people receive the loving care of the Meeting, and are they brought under such influences as tend to promote their religious life and to give them an understanding of the principles and practices of Friends?"

If we, in our corporate capacity as well as in our personal relations with our co-members, are actuated by the spirit toward which this inquiry is reaching out, we believe that any real objection to birthright membership will be largely obviated.

G. V., JR.

"OUR obligations are from the centre to the circumference of life. . . . It is concern for individuals that gives us the true interest in larger numbers. It is concern for detail which gives us poise for larger affairs."—J. D. ADAM.

ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING.

At the religious meeting held before the business meeting of Abington Quarterly Meeting, Second Month 8th, our friend A. Neave Brayshaw spoke most feelingly on the love of God and love toward one another. He was followed by helpful sermons from Annette G. Way, Joseph Cosand and Francis R. Taylor.

The business was then taken up and after answers from the representatives, two minutes were presented by A. Neave Brayshaw, the first from Yorkshire Quarterly Meeting and the second from the Meeting for Sufferings of London Yearly Meeting. They mentioned his sympathetic ministry up and down the British Isles.

The answers to the Queries showed great care in preparation. The Annual Queries were read and a profound and sympathetic silence followed the mention of the decease of our friend, John E. Carter.

Eleven representatives to Yearly Meeting were appointed and the Committee in care of Friends at Yearly Meeting reported that they are at work. Bertha T. Webster and Alfred C. Garrett were reappointed Clerks for the ensuing year.

One of the regional conferences suggested by William B. Harvey and Alfred C. Garrett was held in Germantown under the care of a competent committee and was largely attended, keen interest being evidenced.

After the completion of the business, A. Neave Brayshaw addressed the meeting on the necessity of aiming with extreme definiteness for the establishment among ourselves of the Kingdom of God. This implies increase in membership, teaching meetings, literature; "tramps" and lecture meetings were suggested as means to this end. A teaching force is needed, but how obtain it? Two-day lecture schools are frequently held in England and are useful. But how can young men be induced to study if no career is offered? A. Neave Brayshaw asked whether the helpful work in which so many are occupied could not be reported to meetings and the workers encouraged by the interest evolved by comradeship.

The meeting then closed.

A YEAR'S WORK WITH THE FRIENDS' MISSION IN VIENNA.

The British Legation in Vienna recently asked the Friends' Mission there for a short account of the past year's work. Such a report was prepared covering the calendar year 1922, and was submitted to both the British and American Legations. Copies have just reached America. From this report we make the following summary of the work of the Friends in Austria during the past year.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

The major agricultural work has been that of increasing Vienna's milk supply through the importation of cows. These have been placed on farms surrounding Vienna, and are being paid for in milk which the Mission in turn distributes to children and tubercular patients. During the year, 1137 cows were imported. About 7,000 litres of milk are being daily delivered to the Mission in payment. The total number of cows imported since 1920 is 1829, in addition to 18 pedigreed bulls.

Other work of the department has been the provision of feed for a portion of this stock, and the distribution to land settlements, hospitals and farms, of pigs, chickens and ducks returned to the Mission from breeding stations, as repayment of English stock imported in 1921.

LAND SETTLEMENTS.

Financial assistance has been given to the building work of 22 land settlements, comprising 500 houses, and some settlements have been helped in their organization of co-operative canteens and work-rooms for women. A co-operative farmers' union was formed among six of the larger agricultural land settlements, about $2,500 being loaned by the Mission for this purpose. These farms have been so successful that they were able to repay 25 per cent. of this loan by Twelfth Month, 1922.

FOOD DISTRIBUTION.

From Twelfth Month to Fourth Month, food was distributed to approximately 20,000 children under five years of age. The fresh milk from the Mission's cows was sold at reduced rates to some six thousand delicate children under six. It is estimated that milk will be provided this winter to nine thousand children and twenty-five hundred tubercular patients. Since Tenth Month, food rations have gone to about 500 of the children receiving milk. The number of persons daily receiving half a litre of milk from the Mission's cows is at present about 14,000.

CLOTHING.

The Mission directs its main efforts toward the support of the needy middle class, as this part of the population is now suffering most acutely. Up to Fifth Month, 1922, when the Clothing Department was liquidated, about 4,700 families of this class, comprising 13,300 persons, had been supplied with clothing. As many as were able paid for their clothing from about one-quarter to a third of the wholesale cost, though 1,200 families received clothing without charge. The clothing supplies being now very limited, no distributions on a large scale are being carried out.

CHILDREN'S INSTITUTIONS.

The Mission continues its care for tubercular and rachitic children by paying for, or subsidizing, their maintenance in Austrian Children's Homes. About 700 children are on the list of the Institutions Department. The Mission also helps the Home for Boy Apprentices in Vienna, by granting monthly allowances with which the food of the 75 boys is supplemented. Since autumn, fresh milk has been supplied to many homes and hospitals, the present quantity being 1,500 litres daily.

OTHER PHASES OF WORK.

Other phases of the Mission's work to which space permits only brief allusion include:

The training scheme by which help is being given to the young people in trade, crafts and art-schools. Last winter food rations were issued to 1,500 such students. The number helped last month was about one thousand. Additional help is given to the families of those students where investigation proves this to be necessary.

Thanks to a special fund raised by the "Save the Children Fund" about 1,500 children were supplied with a monthly food ration during the winter of 1921-22. The distribution was resumed last autumn. The Mission's Middle Class Relief Department provides relief rations for another 6,000 children.

A continually changing list of about 300 persons receive special temporary help made necessary by illness or other emergencies.

During the summer, cost of maintenance in convalescent homes was provided for about 200 middle-class children and adults. The Mission also supported a small home in the country where 52 people spent from two to four weeks each.

Coal was provided for 250 needy middle-class people last winter. Up to the end of the year 1922, 232 families had each received one-quarter ton of coal.

Last winter 538 old people were given a fortnightly ration. The number cared for this year will approximate 600.

The Arts and Crafts Department continues to help find a sale for the work of the needy people who are able to do artistic work of some kind, but who are inexperienced in business methods and so could not dispose of their productions unaided. During the year about 3,200 were helped in this way.

The total amount of funds spent on relief during the year ending Tenth Month, 1922, was about $380,000. Funds are needed by the American Friends' Service Committee for the support of all these various branches of the Friends' work in Vienna during the coming year.

DRIFTWOOD.

The picturesque crowds of the morning hours are gone, their reports accepted and food orders for the warehouses issued or further investigation called for. The last straggler looking for food, clothing, work, anything, has passed on. We, of the Quaker office down in the Russian famine area, draw long breaths and settle down to a discussion of how to stretch our food a bit farther on next month's orders.

But another shadow drifts across the big window and a slow, shaky figure pushes open the door and stands before us, a gaunt scarecrow, rags, face, hair, all the same dull brownish grey, dull, lustreless eyes, though he cannot be over twenty. In one hand he clutches tightly a bone just picked up on the street and he gnaws and crunches at this like a starved dog as he answers our questions.

"What is it you want?"

"Bread. I will work for it."

"Do you live here?"

"No, in Voznesensky." (A village some twenty miles east, but in our area.)

"How many in your family?"

"There were five last year. I had mother, father and two sisters. All dead now."

"But do you not get food there? We sent enough this month for all in your volost who need it. Why are you not on the list?"

"Yes, I got some corn; but I am alone and there is no work. I came here to find work and more food."

Poor, lonely, heartsick lad. There is no work here, for it is a peasant village and the countryside is still ice-locked. Besides, he has scarce the strength to walk and could not work if there were any to give him. We can only urge him to go back to his old village and try to keep alive a few more weeks till warm weather and spring work come. He wavers slowly out as he came in and drifts on down the street gnawing at his bone.

HAS THEE ORDERED THY SYRUP?

The American Friends' Service Committee recently announced that D. H. Brown, of Eastpoint, Florida, had generously offered to allow the Service Committee to take orders for 100 gallons of the cane syrup which he manufactures, the proceeds of $1 per gallon to be donated to the service work. The hundred gallons have now been sold, and additional orders received. D. H. Brown states that he is willing to have us take orders for a second hundred gallons at $1 per gallon, $50 from the proceeds of each gallon to go to the service work. We consider this a very generous offer, inasmuch as the syrup which we have sold has cost him $74 postage per gallon. We hope that Friends who have neglected to place their orders for some of this fine cane syrup will now take advantage of the opportunity to do so. Send your order and money to the American Friends' Service Committee, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., and the syrup will be delivered to you parcel post.

SHIPMENTS received for week ending Second Month 10, 1923—95 boxes and packages.

Cash contributions received for week ending Second Month 13, 1923—$12,005.79.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

ELIHU GRANT, Alfred C. Garrett, Frances Tatum Rhoads and Lloyd Baderston were "recorded" Ministers by their respective Monthly Meetings and their Minutes of recommendation were passed upon favorably by the Select Preparative Meetings within the past fortnight.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.—Through the Alumni Committee on Science and Museums, there have recently been added to the museum three clay tablets of early Babylonian times. They were found in the ruins of the ancient city of Umma, in which excavations were made by the archaeologist, Edgar J. Banks. The inscriptions indicate that the tablets were records of temple offerings, one mentioning a lamb to be offered to the god Bel. The tablets date from about 2400 B. C.

A telephone switchboard demonstration was recently given at the School by the Bell Telephone Company, showing the actual operations at the switchboard as calls are received and transfers made. Brief explanatory talks were given by representatives of the Company, tending to make the giving and receiving of calls more simple and easy for both subscriber and operator.

Up to a week ago, the School has enjoyed good skating almost continuously since the opening of the winter term, but there has been almost no sledding. The ice-house has been filled with ice of good quality, ranging from six to ten inches in thickness.

In spite of a great deal of sickness both in the cities and country, the health of the School has been very good, with no sickness of a contagious nature among the pupils as yet.

Albert T. Bell has recently given the School a portable grandstand section seating fifty, for use at soccer and baseball games. Being easily taken apart, it can be moved from one part of the athletic field to another as occasion requires.

The following had the highest three scholarship averages on the boys' and girls' sides respectively, for the semester just closed:—John H. Wills, George P. Lippincott, Jonathan E. Rhoads; Esther K. Harris, Florence Houghton, Helen G. Bell. Edna E. Wetherald, by virtue of a high average during her First Class year and thus far in her Senior year, receives the honor of membership in the Cum Laude Society, an honor society among secondary schools, corresponding to the Phi Beta Kappa in colleges.

The Westonian for Second Month is the best issue of that paper we have seen. It is exclusively devoted to tree culture and should be called the arboretum number. It contains papers by J. Edward Moon, Thos. K. Brown, Wm. B. Harvey, Samuel Smedley, Jr., and Albert L. Baily, Jr., all identified with Westtown; also an able paper by Alexander MacElwee, Landscape Gardener of Fairmount Park.

The feature of the paper to especially commend is the list of trees on the Westtown campus. This list covers nine full pages of fine type, giving the name and location on the farm of all trees of peculiar interest; when there are many specimens of one variety, a statement like this is given: "many in the girls' lawn," or "hundreds on Walnut Hill." Whoever has prepared the list merits the thanks of all of us.

The Philadelphia Inquirer for Second Month 13th devotes a full column under "Girard's Talk of the Day," to John Woolman. We make this quotation: "There have been many editions of his famous Journal, which he penned with the simplicity of a Bunyan, but none compares in interest with the one just issued by Amelia Mott Gummere of Haverford, Pa."

The cause of Negro Education as fostered by Cheyney Training School for Teachers owes not a little to Edmund Sterling of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, for his editorial in the issue of that daily for Second Month 13th. We commend the reading of his editorial to all our subscribers.

THE latest from Wm. C. and Elizabeth C. B. Allen is from Turramurra, Australia, First Month 8, 1923.

We have given up New Zealand for the present. I was ill in Tasmania, largely the result of contracting a cold in the chilly hotel rooms of the southern latitudes even in summer. But in the heat of the Sydney mid-summer I am becoming quite as usual. We expect to sail for South Africa on First Month 22, 1923. Please change our address until Sixth Month, 1923, to Care of Thos. Cook & Son, Cape Town, South Africa. Better stop sending THE FRIEND to South Africa after Fifth Month 1, 1923.

Our almost six months in Australia have been full of meetings with Friends, church bodies, some addresses to clubs of prominent business men. Many calls have been made on Church leaders, newspaper managers and editors, leading business men, etc., besides some family visits among Friends. Not a few Church organizations are opening fraternal relations with the Federal Council of Churches in America. Often, among them, have I preached the damage to Church life and the shame created by war. This has been in the midst of much dislike, and many prejudices directed toward America.

Sincerely,

WM. C. ALLEN.

THAT interest in standard Quaker literature grows daily is evidenced by the statement that there are Friends' publications now in hand in Russian, Danish, French, and Italian. In German Edward Grubb's "What is Quakerism?" has now appeared under the title, "Das Wesen des Quakeriums," while the translation of "John Woolman's Journal," by Alfons Paquet, the well-known German author, is expected shortly from the printer if not already out. A report of literature sold and distributed at the Berlin and Frankfurt centres revealed a great demand for books and pamphlets. The Foreign Literature Board agreed to send Quaker books to several libraries on the Continent.

THE Friends' Council for International Service in London, having been asked by Philadelphia Friends to take charge of the distribution of the Appeal, "A War-less World" on the European Continent, it was reported that the Berlin centre has already sent out over 18,000 translations to pastors and others, and that the Paris centre is undertaking the distribution in French-speaking countries. The question of a Russian translation is under consideration.

JOAN FRY is quoted as saying that it is quite clear that Quakerism has taken root in Germany, and will develop on German lines. Moreover, through the Mittelstelle, of which Dr. Elisabeth Rotten is head, a definite touch is maintained with all kinds of people who are drawn to Quakerism in one way or another, but who will not necessarily look to joining the Society. Arrangements are now going forward for calling during the coming year a general conference of Friends and friends of the Quakers. A meeting attended by representatives from all parts of Germany was held at Berlin last Twelfth Month to make arrangements for a series of local conferences in preparation for the general gathering. The visit of the American Friends, Alfred, Eleanor and Philip Garrett and Agnes Tierney, is much appreciated in Germany, and they are doing very valuable work there.

J. C. WALTON was recently called to the Governorship of Oklahoma after a warmly contested election. He comes of Quaker stock. His father was a North Carolina Friend.

PAUL M. PEARSON, for a long time prominently identified with the Chautauqua Association, has been elected President of the International Chautauqua to succeed William Jennings Bryan.

THE new book, "Pathways to God," by Alexander C. Purdy, is just from the Women's Press of N. Y.

A SONG OF TRUST.

I can not always see the way that leads
To heights above;
I sometimes quite forget that He leads on
With hands of love;
But yet I know the path must lead me to Immanuel's land,
And when I reach life's summit I shall know
And understand.

I cannot always trace the onward course
My ship must take,
But, looking backward, I behold afar
Its shining wake
Illumed with God's light of love; and so
I onward go,
In perfect trust that He who holds the helm
The course must know.

I can not always see the plane on which
He builds my life;
For oft the sound of hammers, blow on blow,
The noise of strife,
Confuse me till I quite forget He knows
And oversees,
And that in all details with His good plan
My life agrees.

I can not know and understand
The master's rule;
I can not always do the tasks He gives
In life's hard school;
But I am learning, with His Help, to solve
Them, one by one,
And, when I can not understand, to say
"Thy will be done."

—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

Good John Newton was one day talking with a friend about the possibility of the conversion of the heathen. Something was said which seemed to show a lack of faith, whereupon Newton turned to his friend and graciously observed: "Why, my dear brother, I've never doubted the possibility of the conversion of the heathen since the day God converted me."—Selected.

LOYALTY TO OUR MEETING.

When our early Colonial ancestors came to these shores, they were, as we know, urged so to do by the religious impulse. They therefore highly prized

"What here they found, Freedom to worship God," and they proceeded to make great use of the privilege. Meetings for worship were large, often huge. In Philadelphia as early as 1684 the regular attendance at First-day and week-day meetings was eight hundred. English ministers visiting America tell us in their journals that the houses were crowded to their utmost capacity and many stood outside even in winter. Samuel Bownas in his account of his second visit in the Colonies, which ended in 1728, says that he found, in the interval elapsing since his first mission here, "so great an increase of the professors of the Truth that I had a curiosity to examine a little into it, finding most of the meeting-houses very much enlarged, some to hold double, some triple, and some four times the people the old ones would, and even now some want to be enlarged or new ones built at proper distances."

Let us picture a country scene of those old days. On meeting mornings over the hills, through the woods and across the streams, on foot or on horse-back—carriages were scarce—by bridle paths or very imperfect roads, came the pioneer Quakers and their families. A story comes down to us that the wife of one of the immigrants walked the four miles to meeting and return when she was four-score. Another woman of over ninety walked two miles with the same object in view. Elizabeth Ashbridge tells us in her journal how, when she lived in New Jersey with an unsympathetic husband, she footed the eight miles to meeting; and when her shoes wore out she tied them on with a string and still plodded along. The men, no doubt, were equally zealous. The meeting-house reached, they sought the hard benches, fitted with narrow strips for backs. They found, perhaps, no stove to warm them, certainly no furnace in the cellar, only a charcoal fire on a slab in the middle of the floor. We trust they felt the inward glow to warm their hearts and to enliven their spirits.

The historian may find grave faults in eighteenth century Quakerism, but we must admit that in America at least, it excelled in loyalty to its religious meetings. A part of this loyalty was no doubt due to the otherwise almost unbroken quiet of the rural settlers' lives, which demanded some social activities to enliven them; and to a people whose hearts were set on religion, the meeting furnished the best means of relief, subdued though this excitation was.

It suits us, however, to believe that there was honest religious conviction in this ancient zeal, and that we may learn, if we will, from their devotion. Some of us are sure that the whirl and strain of modern life need to be carefully guarded; and that these, unrelieved by the quiet hours of group and individual worship, are working havoc amongst men. Why? Because under these circumstances the soul is not equal to the demands made upon it. Its deepest needs are not met. In its highest reaches it fails to function as it should. We must take time to grasp the central fact,

"The One remains, the many change and pass, Heaven's light forever shines, Earth's shadows fly."

This we must do, whatever else we leave undone.

We know we are not saying anything new in putting forth these things, but we are content if we are simply voicing a fresh concern for an old duty. For we believe Friends are being called again to increased loyalty to our meetings, remembering what others have found, we may find in the silent or vocal assemblies of God's people, i. e., in the classic phrase of Robert Barclay, the evil weakening in us and the good raised up. Perhaps we may even come to feel as Caroline E. Stephen did that Friends' meetings were to her—we quote her own words—"the place of the most soul-subduing, faith-restoring, strengthening, and peaceful communion, in feeding upon the bread of life, that I have ever known." The possibilities of these meetings have never been exhausted, nor has their importance been over-valued. A visiting Friend now with us is telling us that the very future of our Society depends on the character of our meetings; we shall stand or fall as we really worship or fail to worship.

What is God Like?

Wm. Littleboy.

A group of young Friends came together recently to see if they could agree upon a definition of—God. The idea was that by comparing notes they might arrive at some common understanding as to the real significance of that greatest of all words. But they found the task a hopeless one. The more they discussed and argued the wider became the divergence of thought, so that it seemed that no two of them could express their faith in the same words. One said that he saw no evidence of divine control in human affairs, or of any interest therein on the part of God. Another went further; he thought the condition of the world inconsistent with the Christian idea of God. Either God is not omnipotent, or He is not actively benevolent. A third found insuperable difficulty in the thought of personality as applied to God. He could get no further than Matthew Arnold's indefinite something "not ourselves," which does on the whole "make for righteousness." Another member of the group took his (or was it her?) stand on the teaching of Jesus as to the Fatherhood of God. But this only started another set of problems. Who was Jesus? What was His authority? Did He really know? One said that Jesus was God. Another felt that this was going too far, but agreed that He was divine. A third said Yes, but so are we all divine; the difference between Jesus and ourselves is that in Him the divine element, common to man, had attained an unique development. When the group dispersed, they were lost in a maze of theological speculations.

The problems raised might well occupy the pages of THE FRIEND for months to come, and I need hardly say that I do not propose to discuss them. But this conference was illuminating, because it did bring to the surface those questionings which are agitating the minds of multitudes of thoughtful young people (and their seniors too, for that matter), though they seldom find public expression.

It is all to the good that fundamental questions such as these should be discussed in a spirit of reverent enquiry. It is of supreme importance to each of us that we should learn in some measure to understand God. There is no sin in honest "doubt," in a straightforward facing of the very real difficulties with which we are confronted. Jesus never blamed a spirit of sincere enquiry. Most of us are conscious of insistent questionings to which no final answer is possible as yet; indeed it may be queried whether a faith which has cost nothing in spiritual conflict to him who holds it can be intrinsically all that faith should be. There are many who have learned to receive the kingdom as a little child only through a long experience of pain and darkness.

At the same time let us guard ourselves against the error of supposing that doubt has any inherent virtue or is a thing to be desired or to be proud of for its own sake. We are on no account to think of it as an ultimate attainment. It is, or ought to be, a painful experience, a dark tunnel through which the sincere is groping its way towards the sunlight. The discipline of doubt may be a splendid preparation for a life of service, but its value disappears the moment we cease our search for God and are content to accept it as a chronic condition of the soul. For it is not the doubter who will bring about the regeneration of the world. It is not the man who questions and hesitates who goes forth as a conqueror. "All things are possible to him that believeth," said Jesus, and all history confirms the word. It is and always has been, the man of strong faith who saves the world. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith"—not our doubt.

But for the earnest seeker after truth whose face is resolutely set toward the dawn, but who for the time is walking in darkness, what can we say for him? We can say this at least that he need never be without a clue by holding on to which he shall certainly emerge sooner or later into the light of day. Let us state it in the words of F. W. Robertson: "In the darkest hour through which a human soul can pass, whatever else is doubtful, this at least is certain. If there is no God and no future state, even then, it is better to be brave than to be a coward. Blessed beyond all earthly blessedness is the man, who, in the tempestuous darkness of the soul, has dared to hold fast to these venerable landmarks. Thrice blessed is he who, when all is drear and cheerless within and without, when his teachers terrify him and his friends shrink from him, has obstinately clung toward good. Thrice blessed, because his night shall pass into clear, bright day." And there is yet another resource always at hand: you can always go and do a kindness for some one else. Again I quote, this time from George S. Merriam: "When your own burden is heaviest, you can always lighten a little some other burden. At the time when you cannot see God, there is still open to you this sacred possibility, to show God, for it is the love and kindness of human hearts through which the divine reality comes home to men, whether they name it or not. Let the thought then stay with you; there may be times when you cannot find help, but there is no time when you cannot give help." The word of Jesus remains true, "He that willeth to do the will of God, he shall know of the doctrine."

I may be permitted one reflection of a general nature on our fundamental conception of God, what He is and what He is like. Whether as regards personality or character, I cannot find for myself any halting place between the assurance that God is all that Jesus declared Him to be and a position of blank negative, and that way lies despair. Most of us regard what we call personality as the highest achievement of the long upward struggle in the evolution of human nature. To deny to God this highest quality of ours is to make Him less than man. A supreme being who is without that which we call personality is one who can be of no possible use to us. He is a Being of another, one might add a lower, order than ourselves. He cannot help us and we may leave Him out of account. A more reasonable hypothesis is that He is personal in a far higher and completer sense than we are; having all the qualities and attributes which belong to our highest conception of personality, but in unmeasurably higher degree than anything with which we are familiar. Personality in God, that is to say, is infinitely more splendid, more comprehensive, more satisfying than it is in ourselves. It is the same as regards character. If God is not essential Love, with all which that involves. He can be nothing at all to us. A God who is only moderately good, or good sometimes or under certain circumstances, is unthinkable. He is the God of parts of Genesis and Judges, limited, capricious and uncertain, and for such an One we have no use to-day. Not as the case presents itself to me, it must be all or nothing; and as we cannot rest in the latter alternative, we have a strong inducement to persevere energetically in seeking the former.

If you would really understand God, I believe that the best, perhaps the only ultimately successful, way is to turn to Jesus and enquire of Him. And do it in all simplicity. I deprecate the method of approach which would insist on a complete answer to every question that can be asked as to the mysteries of that unique Personality before it is willing to listen to the testimony of His life and teaching. Not so did our Lord himself act when He called together His first disciples. He imposed no test of a theological or metaphysical nature. His one condition was that they should "follow" Him. "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me." It was only after long months of companionship that He asked them, "Who say ye that I am?" That was a question which could only be answered satisfactorily when they had had the opportunity of watching Him, listening to Him, and thus forming a reasonable judgment. It is only after we have followed and listened that we are in a position to attempt a definition. Therefore if you wish to understand God, concentrate on Christ. Whatever He was from the standpoint of metaphysics, He came to reveal God. In His teaching you get a splendid characterization of God, and a wonderful and most appealing revelation of His sentiment toward ourselves. And still more in His life and action you gain an insight into the divine Character such as you obtain from no other source. Jesus is a living object-lesson in God; all of the God-nature which can be expressed in a simple human life is found in Him. You watch Jesus; you note the manner of His life and how He dealt with individual men and women, and you say, "There! God is like that." And as you think and follow and pray and use every ray of light that falls upon you, there comes to you by degrees a living conception of that "unknown God" whom you have ignorantly worshipped; until at last you are constrained to say, "I will arise and go to my Father." And when you turn again to the Teacher and Friend who has taken you by the hand and led you to God, questions of definition will cease to harass; you will do as the disciples did—find a place in the highest category you have in your thought.

BOOK REVIEW.

"NON-VIOLENT COERCION."<sup>2</sup>

This unusual and interesting book is a valuable and scholarly contribution to the cause of peace. The author states that while a graduate student at Wisconsin University, Professor Ross proposed to him a study of the Social Psychology of Passive Resistance. The scope of the investigation enlarged and this timely book is the result.

Beginning with Confucius, who expressed the Golden Rule negatively, our author traces the many peace efforts of later individual Protestants, of Friends and other religious sects and discusses the strike, boycott and other methods employed by industrial, social and political groups and he concludes with the non-co-operation movement of Ghandi which is now being tested. Each method is copiously illustrated from history and the cause of its success or failure is analyzed.

The author shows rare insight, fair judgment, wide reading and a keen desire to discover the kernel of truth in each movement. No lover of peace, whether convinced pacifist or not, can afford to leave this book unread, although he might not always follow the author in his particular analysis or conclusions. It provokes thought, clears one's conceptions and enlarges one's vision and knowledge. It is a valuable and penetrating study of the substitutes for the ever more deadly scourge of war.

EXTRACTS FROM A LETTER OF ALICE G. PEARSON.

A former student of the University of Pennsylvania, now returned to Tokyo, is very much interested in helping to raise money for a new gymnasium for our school and has associated with him the Vice-Mayor of Tokyo, who is planning to make an appeal for funds from Japanese men of means. His wife is one of our graduates and much interested. We hope that a large part of the needed sum can be raised in Japan.

Our First-day meetings are now held in the new meeting-house, although the new furniture is not yet completed. It is a great comfort to have so attractive and commodious a building. The old meeting-house, too, is very roomy and when everything is done and the place furnished will be convenient and useful as well as attractive. The septic tank, some of the retaining walls of the playgrounds and fencing are yet to do, as well as the removal of the house designed to be rebuilt on the Jones lot for the use of the Hirakawas. The Jones' house is enclosed and partly succeeded. The foundation of the boys' dormitory is in and building will soon begin. The house may be ready for occupancy before this reaches you and the dormitory perhaps ready by the end of Fourth Month.

About the middle of Fourth Month, Japan Yearly Meeting will meet in Tokyo, so we hope to have everything on these grounds done by that time.

Better than buildings made with hands, however, is the coming to Christ of young men and women. At our last Monthly Meeting fifteen from the school were received as members, one young man, and four members formerly in Mito. As there is no organized meeting there now, no transfer of membership could be made, so they just were taken in here on request. There are others who are confessed Christians who soon will be received into membership. Sawano San, who now gives his whole time to meeting affairs, is very much interested in gathering up scattered members and those that should be members, and we hope that the group will so grow in numbers and strength that they may undertake definite work in reaching the community more than is now done in the First-day School.

TOkyo, First Month 3, 1923.

THE WOMEN'S PROBLEMS GROUP.

The Second Month meeting of the Women's Group of the Social Order Committee was addressed very interestingly by Anna King of the Cornell Health Clinic. She told of the wonderful work done by this newly-established institution in the way of preventive medicine and of bringing adequate and skilled medical aid within the reach of people of small incomes. Anna King felt that there are few lines of social work where progress has so perceptibly been made as in the line of health; and for this reason this kind of work is one of the most encouraging.

Clinics to provide medical aid for the poor who cannot pay for it, have been known since 1666 in England, and since 1786 in this country, the first being established in Philadelphia. But it has been only since 1913 that a pay clinic has been carried on on a self-supporting basis. In 1920, a Committee for the development of the medical dispensary was formed, and it shortly brought in the suggestion that was taken up by the medical department of Cornell University, with the Cornell Clinic as the result. It comprises a staff of doctors and specialists, with facilities for X-ray and various other treatments, with nurses for aiding the doctors and for follow-up work and a social worker for its promotion.

The patients are limited to the people who have sufficient income to pay something for medical care, but who have not enough to pay the usual fee charged by a doctor for home or office treatment. One dollar is the fee at present charged for the doctor's services and five dollars for an X-ray, with other prices in proportion. The patients are treated as individuals—there is no mob handling—the questions necessary are privately asked and recorded; and they are given a time appointment so they will not waste time in waiting nor have to go away without even seeing the doctor. At the same time it is understood that the patient will allow his case to be used as "teaching material" when so desired by his doctor for the benefit of medical students or of other doctors. And interestingly enough, this requirement has proved to be no deterrent to the patient, who is quite likely to be proud to be wanted as an interesting case.

Conference on Ministry.

PHILADELPHIA AND ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETINGS.

A conference on the subject of the Ministry was held by the members of Philadelphia and Abington Quarterly Meetings at Germantown, on Second Month 2nd.

Previous to the Meeting, invitations were sent to all of the members, and with each of these was a questionnaire relating to the Ministry in our Meetings. Partly as a result of this questionnaire, much thought was given to the subject.

The afternoon session opened at five o'clock with Francis R. Taylor presiding. A. Neave Brayshaw, of England, first addressed the Meeting on the subject of "The Ministry in Our Meetings for Worship." His thought, which was very clear and concise, was so similar to that expressed in his book, "The Quakers, Their Message and Story," that a report can best be given of it by quoting some of the admirable passages of the book.

After speaking of the freshness, vigor and frequency of Ministry among our early Friends, he said that it was followed by a widespread spiritual lethargy. "A passiveness and immobility came as a result of a misunderstanding of the central Quaker message. The call to spiritual service was conceived, not as likely to come along the ways of common life to the soul sensitively attuning itself to hear it, but always as some striking manifestation or compelling impulse, unmistakable as the ringing of a bell and unrelated to anything already in the mind. The less it was correlated the more evidently did it seem to be Divine. This quietist attitude is traceable in the first instance to the dualistic thought of early days which regarded the Divine and the human as inherently separate, having nothing in common. To the human or 'natural' part belonged the intellect which, certainly, differentiated man from the animals, but which had, in itself, nothing of God." "The insertion into the human soul of the Divine Light or Seed was conceived as a miraculous doing, man, in himself as man, having no more relation to the gift than is possessed by an animal or a stone. In the soul the Light is for a time set, but leaving its inherent nature unchanged."

"This conception of a divorce between the Divine voice and the human intellect, is seen in the ideal of worship that came to be set up. It was said that the more the worshipper could, by suppression of all feeling and thought of his own, make his mind like a sheet of blank paper, then on the sheet the Holy Spirit would the more clearly write. Most disastrous of all was the conception, still widely prevalent, of congregational ministry. The call to the service, so far from coming along the line of love and fellowship of brethren met in the presence of their Father, was thought of as a sudden descent of the Spirit into the mind of the minister, even as a stone may, from the outside, drop into a pool, unrelated to anything already there, the pool having no power either to prevent or induce its coming. This inability to recognize a call as Divine,

A whole staff of consulting physicians is available for the patient, making an all-round treatment assured. It is also hoped that, in the near future, a health clinic will be established, to which may come people who are not actually ill, but who may need to have a defect corrected or some preventive work done.

Space in your paper and your readers' time will not permit a recital of all the interesting points touched upon by Anna King; but perhaps these few that are given will serve to show the potential good of this undertaking, and the far-reaching possibilities it offers for the building up of that very essential quality in our citizenship, good health. The clinic is not yet upon a self-supporting basis, but it is hoped that it may yet be made so. A work that is so fundamental and so worthwhile must surely be continued.

H. C. PYLE.

if it was linked on to anything already in the mind, is seen in the experience recorded by John Wigham, a Friend of Northumberland. Writing of his early service in the ministry, about the year 1780, he says that sometimes he felt for his fellow-worshippers a love so deep as to raise in him a desire for a message to them. But he was shown that this desire was wrong as having its 'origin in self-will,' and then follows the Quaker demand for ministry unmarked by any impress of the passive speaker himself, and, therefore, the more purely Divine. 'It should be exercised,' he says, 'without human labor or creaturely contrivances. Thus, I was instructed to wait in humble dependence.' As far as this line of thought leads away from shallowness and hasty self-assertiveness it is good, but in practice it has often given countenance to spiritual indolence. Very readily do we find excuse for resting in the one extreme by claiming credit for avoidance of the other. The likeness of the call to a 'gift' obscured the fact that it was a gift to be desired earnestly (1 Cor. xiv: 1), and to human nature, ever ready to slip into the more easy way, it was not unpleasant to wait, enjoying liberty to go about its own concerns, until, through some manifest and even compelling signal, it received its orders. The testimony to spiritual freedom which had revolted against the merely intellectual preparation of uninspired discourses, came to include dislike of any specific preparation at all. It was assumed that no ministry was truly inspired except such as appeared to be communicated in the meeting itself, the fact of a good thought or message coming to the minister in the course of the week being a reason why the same should not be spoken on the First-day." "As a matter of fact it is owing to misunderstanding that stress has ever been laid on the unessential question of preparation beforehand, the true Quaker position being that the minister, with mind neither torpid nor assertive, but calmly alert, shall, in the quiet, feel the fresh uprising of concern for his message whether he has given previous thought to it or not, and that, even if he has done so, he should in the absence of a living concern remain silent. Most abhorrent of all was the idea of any intellectual study carried on with a view to helping the ministry. The 'opening' of George Fox 'that being bred at Oxford or Cambridge was not enough to fit and qualify men to be ministers of Christ' might, up to the end of the nineteenth century, be heard quoted in disparagement, not of intellectual equipment in itself for various purposes of life, but of such equipment as having any right bearing on ministry. Barclay in early days might, as we have seen, note with satisfaction that few meetings were without ministry, it being, in his opinion, the natural thing for the worshippers to speak for the help of one another; but now there was acceptance of the fact of many being held wholly in silence, and, while there was encouragement to earnest waiting upon God, there was never a hint that the spoken word was needed nor any counsel to seek ability to supply it."

"And although a deep peace was the reward of obedience to the Divine leading, there was no conception of any joyous leaping forward to welcome the call, and still less of any longing that it might come."

"Quakerism has suffered from over-cautiousness, slipping at times into lethargy and even into excuse for drawing back from service. A genuine desire for correspondence between life and ministry will be more concerned with elevation of the former than with suspicion of the latter."

"A Quaker writer has left on record the fact of his hearing a Friend say in Yearly Meeting that 'the only thing the ministry amongst us required was universal repression'; and that he was 'happy to say that in the meeting to which he belonged, they had had no resident minister for above fifty years.' In this we see the chief reason for past and present decay of scores of meetings. Friends of keen philanthropic and public activity, of spiritual power and saintly lives, have deplored the dying away of their congregation and have never sought the gifts of ministry and of pastoral care which might have saved it. The silence of each generation in turn has heaped up difficulty for the next. The weakness has, in recent times, been accentuated by so great insistence on the fact of ministry being but one service among many, as to depress it (being but 'words') below the rest. It is seldom a profitable pastime to arrange in scale of value things which are all necessary."

"It will, of course, be understood that this historical record of misunderstanding or depreciation of ministry is not intended as depreciation of silence, an essential element in Quaker worship (equally essential being the liberty to speak), nor of the helpful spontaneous utterance, longer or shorter, given forth by the worshipper alert to receive and transmit the message. Well has it been said, 'The real question for Friends to answer about any meeting is not "Did you speak?" or "Did you keep silence?" but, a far deeper one, "Did you obey?"' And the same writer draws attention to a forgotten truth, 'to go to a meeting determined to speak or determined to keep silence are both un-Quakerly.' Equally un-Quakerly, it may be added, is the indifference which never gives thought, one way or the other, to personal responsibility for ministry."

After supper, which was served at six o'clock, Margaret R. Cary, acting as Chairman for the evening, stated that with the exception of Rayner Kelsey, who would open the Conference, no one had been asked to take part, as it was desired that as many as possible should have the opportunity to express themselves.

Rayner Kelsey spoke of the importance of the Society of Friends making more earnest effort to reach those who belonged to no church and who had no conception of the Christian life, and that we should make more earnest effort that these, as well as all of our members, should have their lives definitely consecrated in the Christ-life, in Christian service, whatever their field of work might be.

In so large a group, probably three hundred persons, there were necessarily many helpful expressions of differing points of view. A teaching Ministry was approved, and one of our Ministers told how when he attended the mid-week meetings each week, it was necessary for him to leave the thoughts of his business for sometime before the meeting so that he might be ready both in his thought and his spirit to have a message that would be helpful. The time is taken each week by most of us for thought and prayer for family life, or for business life, for committee meetings, or some form of service for our meetings, but it was questioned how much thought and prayer is taken for our meetings for worship, for the loving care of those who are to sit with us in them, and for messages of love and of helpfulness. Such times are difficult to find, but are necessary.

One speaker emphasized the spirit of love and sympathy which we should feel toward one another, and the importance of getting our children to feel this spirit and to appreciate and understand the messages which are given. It was felt that our attitude should through our whole life, as well as in the Meeting, be one of such devotion that the ministry in the meeting itself would not seem peculiarly different from the daily ministry of action and word, so that the ministers would not seem set apart as peculiar things, "speckled birds" which they did not particularly wish to resemble. The importance of our ministry of peace was emphasized, and of friendship with those who are in many ways less fortunate than ourselves.

A member who had been one of the American Friends' Service workers abroad, told how those who seemed to most appreciate our Friends' meetings held in foreign countries, were frequently the poor and the members of the radical groups who craved friendship and who were holding their minds open to any new visions of truth.

The writer has, since the Conference, talked with many of those who were present, and the belief was expressed by all that the Conference had been of value and would produce deeper thoughtfulness and renewed consecration on the part of many.

The address by A. Neave Brayshaw was thought to be especially helpful, and several smaller groups have arranged to meet with him in conferences which on account of their smaller size can be more intimate and searching than a company of three hundred persons can be.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE LITTLE OLD WOMAN OF NINE YEARS.—(A True Story)—George Green, a small farmer, lived in a narrow gorge of the mountains near the little town of Grasmere, England. His family consisted of his wife Sarah and six children, the eldest of whom was little Agnes, aged nine,—a quiet, steady, busy little body, whom her mother and the neighbors in the town where she went to school used to call the "little old woman." They had no servants, for they were poor; and no near neighbors, for the mountains were not thickly settled. One day, in the winter of 1807, George and his wife were compelled to go to Langdale Head, a village six miles distant, leaving the five younger children (two of whom were twin babies, only a few months old) in the care of Agnes. They had often done this before, knowing how kind and motherly Agnes was; besides, they expected to return before nightfall.

They had set out on their way home, when a heavy, blinding snow began to fall. Little Agnes, watching it, trembled as she thought of her parents. She waited supper for them, but they did not come. She gave the babies their milk and the others their oatmeal porridge, put all but the two eldest boys to bed, and then sat down by the window with them to watch. Midnight came. The white snow heaped itself higher and higher against the cottage door until it could not be opened. At length the two boys became weary; she undressed them and made them kneel down beside her with their heads on her lap and say their prayers aloud. She then put them to bed, carefully covering them up to keep them warm. She was about to return to her lonely seat, when the thought occurred to her that she could do no good by watching, and that if she was to remain long in the cottage she would need all her little strength. So she said her prayers and lay down to rest with the others.

Morning came at last; but the storm still continued, and no father or mother appeared. The wind blew more terribly than before, and the snow almost covered one side of the cottage. The prospect was very dismal for the little ones, but Agnes cheered them as best she could, dressed them, and gave them their breakfast. Her store of food was small, and she began to fear that it would not last through the storm. Fuel, too, was scarce. So she wisely determined to be careful not only of her strength, but also of other things. Like a little old woman as she was, she began by winding up the clock, whose ticking seemed to cheer her. Then she took what milk there was in the house and boiled it to keep it from souring. The porridge was nearly all gone; so she told her brothers they must not eat of it, but save it for the babies. She made cakes of what little flour remained. The stack of peat (which the poor people burn instead of wood) was at the rear of the cottage, against which the snow had not drifted, and with the help of the boys she carried enough into the house to last a week. Then she examined the potato-heap, and dug out enough to last several days. The only cow was under a shed near the cottage, and to milk her the little woman had to climb over snow-drifts deep enough to bury her. The cow had also to be fed. This was a hard task, for the fodder had to be carried through the snow in small bundles, little by little, and it was dark before the work was done.

The second lonely night of the imprisonment was more terrible than the first. Only the babies slept. The wind howled so fiercely, and the snow beat against the windows so rudely, that the children thought the demons were trying to enter. The cracks about the door and windows admitted the snow in huge piles, and the children had to sit before the fire to keep it from being blown out. They watched in this way all night and all the next day. They had no heart to talk about their lost parents.

During the third night the storm abated, and on the fourth morning the tempest was over. Then the little woman resolved to go to town in search of help. But she knew there was a swollen brook over which there was no bridge, across the only well-beaten path; so she determined to go by a longer route which she knew, but which was obstructed by drifts of snow and high stone walls. Taking the two boys with her, she started by this road. But she soon saw that they were not strong enough for the task; so she sent them back and went on her dangerous way alone. It was almost a miracle that the frail little thing succeeded: guided and sustained, however, by the thought of the little ones she had left behind, she finally reached the town.

Her first question to the people was about her father and mother; next she asked for help for her brothers and sisters. In half an hour sixty strong men were searching the mountains; others hastened to the cottage. The little ones were found huddled together by the fire, waiting patiently for their sister's return. As for the poor father and mother they had hastened homeward through the storm, knowing how lonely their children would be; and the snows had beaten them down and buried them.

Would you care to know what became of the children? Agnes was taken to Wordsworth the poet, and his sister, and to them she told her story. It was published in the papers of the day, and the great, good heart of the public was touched. Money and gifts of all kinds were sent to the children,—Queen Charlotte of England and her daughters sent them costly presents,—and their future was provided for.

CHURCH LIFE IN JAVA.

My preceding articles regarding Java have not told about the work that took me there. This included visits to missions, meetings and conferences with church leaders and efforts on behalf of international friendship through the churches.

When we landed at Batavia we did not know a single man in Java. When we sailed from Soerabaja we realized that we were leaving many friends. The Dutchman may outwardly seem cold and self-contained but his big body may have within it a heart that throbs with sincerity and love.

Upon reaching Java I got into touch with the Mission Consuls of the Island, Drs. J. M. J. Schepper and Crommellin. They are government officials who exercise care over the missionary activities of the different denominations and who are expected to "advise" the missionaries when helpful to do so. Upon ascertaining my errand—altogether novel in the church history of the country—they carefully studied my credentials and when they learned that I was a Friend gave me the right hand of fellowship, having years ago become acquainted with Dr. J. Rendel Harris of England. I subsequently became greatly indebted to these open-minded brethren. This was especially appreciated because many of the various church-circles in Java are very conservative, and some of the meetings I held in that land were, I was told, the first wherein different groups of ministers or church leaders had met together. The Mission Consuls contributed to the success of such gatherings. Dr. A. V. Klaus, of the American Methodist Mission, was also largely instrumental in putting me in touch with the missionary life of Java.

Here is only one illustration of the helpfulness so frequently extended. We had left Djoka for Solo, and were due in Solo after six o'clock, with its equatorial darkness. Sitting by us, on the train, was a sturdy, genial Hollander. Presently he asked, "Are you not Mr. Allen?" He then with much linguistic effort gave me to understand that he had heard me speak a few nights before at the Established Church in Djoka. We made sad progress in conversation, but he finally understood, with much scribbling on paper and many signs, that we wanted to go to a certain hotel in Solo. When our train reached that city he helped us transfer our baggage through the blackness to a cab some distance from the noisy station and insisted on accompanying us. Then we parted, but no employees of the hostelry understood English. Our commonest wants, through native servants only, could not be supplied. Happily an English-speaking Dutch lady came to the rescue and interpreted for me. I was able to communicate by telephone with the wife of Dr. Van An del, Superintendent of Dutch missions in that part of Java. She soon said, "Why don't you come over and stay with us?" Soon we moved, bag and baggage, to their hospitable home where for three days we had Christian fellowship.

To travel thousands of miles with the intent of seeing church people and then only have the opportunity to live in hotels, preach a little to them or occasionally be invited to afternoon teas, oftentimes offers small openings for the important objects of the visit—namely, conference, religious intercourse and getting together in the enduring bonds of Christ. All these ends were attained because the Javanese missionaries were good to us.

The work of the (Free) Dutch Churches at Solo is typical of that in other parts of the Island. A sweet Sabbath morning found us at the native church, where the congregation was largely composed of young people. The men sat on one side of the center aisle, the women on the other. All wore sarongs of many different colors, whilst the men were literally crowned with turbans of many varied hues. Time counts but little with these folks, and many of them come and sit in the quiet for an hour or more before service commences. A Javanese reader officiated, his manner was serious and simple, his voice soft and pleasant. There was very little singing. The building in which we met was open to the breeze from all directions; it was a model of tropical ecclesiastical architecture.

Missionary enterprise in Solo was inaugurated by Dr. Van An del, and a few others, ten years ago. Now there are under its care about 600 native Christians, including children. There are 1000 children in the schools conducted in the Javanese tongue and more in schools taught in the Dutch language. A splendid, modern hospital has 230 beds. Dr. Verhagen, who piloted us around it, was justly proud of his work, his equipment and his patients.

In quaint, historic Djoka we were the guests of the learned Dr. Kraemer. The evangelical work is under the loving care of Dr. Pos. The Queen Wilhelmina school for girls from well-to-do families includes numerous one-story buildings connected by covered walks, made of concrete, worn smooth and shining by the bare feet of the children. All looked very happy and were attired in pretty jackets, multi-colored sarongs, and none wore shoes or stockings. As we left the hospital with its rare surroundings, and fine Christian spirit, Dr. Oftringa laughingly remarked, "I hope you can get some money for us from America."

The Netherlands Missionary Society of Holland has for seventy years carried on an ideal work at Modjowarno. "In the cool of the morning" we left Serobaja and a two hours' railway ride found us greeted by Dr. Baljon. Across the pleasant countryside we were driven in his motor car to the mission. His home is set in the midst of rural scenes close by the church, schools and hospital, with lofty mountains in the background. There are 15,000 native Christians associated with this work. The 25 schools give instruction to 4000 children. The modern hospital has 230 beds.

I must pass over the work of other Dutch churches, of foreigners, and tell of American Missionary activity in Java. I think of Buitenzorg where the sympathetic Methodist brother, H. B. Mansell, opened his heart and home to us. I remember the large educational work among the boys and girls at his mission, the excellent department of the pupils, the enthusiasm of the teachers. One busy day was concluded with tea, and an address on peace, on the wide verandah of the worker's home in Buitenzorg where the men and women of different creeds assembled in the comradeship of Christ. Here I enjoyed meeting Baron Von Asbeck, a government official who devotes much of his spare time to evangelical work among all sorts of people. Everwhere about the mission we were told that whatever we did we must go to Tjisaroca. What about Tjisaroca?

It is a hospital and we do not wonder that it is the glory and joy of our missionary friends. It is at an altitude of about 3000 feet, commanding lovely views of mountains and valleys. The buildings are new and modern. The staff has a high reputation for skill. Here, as in other hospitals, the curing of physical maladies opens the way among a Mohammedan population for the entrance of Christ. This noble work is largely supported from America, and I am acquainted with one beloved Methodist brother of my home town, San José, California, who is personally responsible for the healing of human wreckage through liberal contributions to the support of this institution. Surely the money he put into Tjisaroca yields happier returns than if invested in expensive pleasures or gilt-edged bonds!

When we reached Serobaja the connection with church workers in that city seemed to have been lost—we did not know of any arrangements having been made. But the evening of arrival the tall form of our good Methodist brother, H. C. Bower, appeared upon the scene, he having made a tour of the hotels in search of us. He had planned several meetings. At one of them there was a new experience. For years I have used interpreters in many countries but never two for the same occasion. This particular mission works exclusively among Chinese, representing three different dialects, having separate services for each. It was arranged for this evening that an interpreter be provided for two of the groups—one man stood on my right hand and the other on the left, so after I had delivered a sentence one could translate it into Cantonese Chinese and the other into Hokkien Chinese. It is to be feared that one of them became somewhat tangled, and what the congregation received I shall never know. Still, we had a solemn time of worship.

Space does not permit imparting details regarding Javanese Church and Missionary work. I only offer a glimpse of it. Few foreigners in Java are church-goers. But everywhere appeals for the application of the Christian spirit in church and international affairs were accorded a warm response. Everywhere I met devout and tender-hearted servants of Jesus. I cannot too highly refer to the culture, dignity and spiritual intuitions discovered in many of the men and women of Holland and America who have left the comforts of home and entered into the service of Christ. I can not too generously speak of their love for their Master and his peoples, their deeds, their patient, quiet faith.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING.

Concord Quarterly Meeting was smaller than usual at Media on the 13th ult., but there was deep unity of thought and purpose. About 225 were in attendance.

The City of God as it should be in our town was the early thought in the morning session; public schools seeking God, homes vibrant with Christian joy, misery cured by the care and development of each made the common concern, passers-by cheerily welcomed; these are some of the ways our communities would appear as God would have them and as they can be made.

"Colonies of Heaven," as another Friend translated Philippians iii: 20. If the transformation of our town be slow, at least our Meeting can become a colony of heaven at once if our dedication is sufficient. The familiar text from Isaiah xvi was dwelt upon by another. Then followed the summons to exalt our Christ among men. "If I be lifted up from the earth I will draw all men unto me." Christ in His fulness must be our standard.

The Clerk was given discretion to read summaries only for some Queries. Holding our own pulse is important at times, but at the end of the long afternoon session we were wisely counseled to learn how to make more room for the greater needs of the world. The answer by the Meeting of Ministers and Elders in regard to growth in Grace was read. There was an earnest discussion of the need for deeper concern for the education of our children, and on the recommendation of its Educational Committee appointed fifteen months ago the Quarterly Meeting appropriated $2000, part of which will be used to aid our local Monthly Meeting schools. Plans presented by another for improving the interior arrangements of the Media Meeting House also were approved.

At the Meeting for Ministers and Elders, held on the afternoon of the 12th, the attendance was larger than one of the older members recalls having ever seen, there being thirty men and about twenty women.

The Minutes of A. Neave Brayshaw were read in both meetings and a cordial welcome was accorded him.

At the Second-day afternoon session, much prayerful consideration was given to the subject of the Ministry, in which our Friend was very helpful.

CALN QUARTERLY MEETING.

The Sixth-day after the second Second-day of Second Month dawned clear but very cold, and we wondered how the particularly low temperature would affect the number to attend Caln Quarterly Meeting, held at Coatesville. It was agreeable to discover later that the attendance was almost up to the average, and we also noted with pleasure that there were quite a number of visiting Friends, several of them Ministers. Not all of these Ministers gave vocal expression, but it was a comfort to have them worship with us.

Alfred Neave Brayshaw, from Scarborough, England, gave us a message of comradeship, particularly urging us to consider our duty towards others in the line of example and influence. Several others spoke briefly, and then the business of the meeting was taken up.

The usual routine of business for this season's Quarter was transacted. Neave Brayshaw's minutes from his home meeting in England were read, and he was warmly welcomed into our midst. The report of the local extension Committee, representing our Quarter, was read, and the meeting desired a continuance of their efforts in the line of conferences, etc.

Ann Sharpless felt that she must leave with us a few words of warning as to the necessity of spiritual preparedness, telling us that the events of the last decade had taught us that we know not what unexpected things may happen, but our spirits must be prepared.

After the conclusion of the business meeting, lunch was served downstairs, after which a number of us again assembled in the meeting-room to listen to Neave Brayshaw, as he discussed the necessity of the younger and older Friends working together, the older encouraging the younger to give more free expression to their spiritual experiences. Having been a teacher, Neave Brayshaw has a host of young Friends, and a keen understanding of their difficulties and stumbling blocks.

CHRISTMAS IN BERLIN.

BERLIN, First Month 16, 1923.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

"Grey Berlin" is, I suppose, as familiar a phrase as "Gay Paris," "Ancient Rome" or "Slow Philadelphia." The miles of great grey buildings and apartment houses, the grey boles of the birches, beeches and firs in the beautiful Tiergarten, and the almost continuous grey sky and low, dripping clouds of the past two months have given us a lasting impression of the greyness of this great city.

But there is an added greyness now—a sinister element—the greyness of the faces in the street. For starvation and tuberculosis have set their mark on thousands of Berlin's most valuable citizens. Knowing the conditions, we wonder that the street population looks so comfortably dressed. But we are told that a German will not appear in the street unless respectably clad—that a person will go without food or, if possible, remain indoors rather than present a shabby appearance. The miracles of remaking, mending and cleaning which the Hausfrau performs fill us with wonder and admiration. Germany has not lost her passion for cleanliness. England broke down more generally on that line during the war than Germany. The results of the daily scrubbing and scouring in our Hospiz are a joy to see.

We cannot say enough in praise of our home here these eight weeks in Berlin.

After the Reformation the Protestants established Christian Hospizes for travelers to take the places of the monasteries and convents. One finds them in most of the cities of Germany, but they are of widely varying degrees of comfort. There are several in Berlin, but this one, although not in a fashionable neighborhood, is the most comfortable. It is just across the Spree from the Friedrichstrasse R. R. station. Our friend of the Resolute, Madame Lamprecht de Petchenko, who called upon us clad in her sealskin and pearls, showed excessive agitation in her emotional Russian manner to find us in such a rough and dangerous part of the city. She was sure we should be murdered in the streets for our dollars. On the other hand, Frau Wood, wife of Professor Henry Wood, whose social status is unimpeachable, said that her friends who used to stop on The Linden now came to this place. It has been very convenient for us, since it is within ten minutes' walk of each of the Quaker offices, which are in the very heart of Berlin.

The maids and men in our Hospiz, of superior class, "Otto" and "Fritz," the two little "Buttons," small for their fifteen years, are great favorites of our party. They collect stamps and coins and are eager for any reading matter we can supply. Philip Garrett went up to see their room. It was neat and comfortable. They are permitted to keep their little dog with them.

All this leads up to our pleasant Christmas eve in the Hospiz. The German guests all disappeared before Christmas, except a lame young man and his sister and an elderly gentleman and his wife. They and our party were the only inmates remaining for the holiday. At five o'clock on Christmas eve we went into the little chapel in the Hospiz to hear the staff of servitors sing Christmas carols and recite appropriate poems. Every day all the year, morning and late afternoon, the bell rings and the staff hurries to the chapel where a prayer is offered and a hymn sung. This afternoon a sermon was added in observance of the season.

When we went in to dinner we were shown to the small dining-room where the tables were adorned with large red candles and candlesticks trimmed with evergreen.

We wondered what was happening in the large dining-room, for we heard sounds of some enterprise going forward. Soon the door was thrown open and we were invited in. The candles on two Christmas trees gave the only light, and here the staff had gathered to see the little Christmas pageant arranged and presented by their own members. The young women had gilt stars and crowns on their heads. Their white robes, decorated with greens and spangles, were easily identified as nightgowns. (Cotton goods are prohibitive here. Most of the children have no underclothing, and yet our country cannot export her cotton!)

The theme was the yielding of the evil passions of men to the all-conquering love of Christ. The speaking was in verse. Finally, a girl bearing an uplifted sword came forward; slowly the sword fell before the Angel of Peace.

Christmas Day we spent quietly until evening. We had invited to dine with us in an upper room of a restaurant a group of forty people who have been, and still are, connected with the Quaker centers and the Quaker feeding. Perhaps the eldest person present was Sydney Strong, of Seattle, who is waiting and writing in Berlin while his daughter is in Russia. The youngest was the Inselman baby, aged six months.

Caroline Norment read a long poem bringing in each member of the party in very clever rhymes. There were many speeches in German and English and much laughter. Friends at the head of the feeding work were lovingly recalled, especially "Pop" Scattergood, who has a large and loyal family.

For a short two hours the group forgot its heart-breaking problems and the bitter conditions in which many of them find themselves and talked and laughed as of old.

It was the absence of laughter in Berlin that first filled us with dismay. On the sixteenth of Twelfth Month, the day after the mark went up to 5000 and the papers were full of Harding's proposed loan, there was laughter in Friedrichstrasse. I wondered if I imagined this, but I was confirmed later by an American student who had left Berlin in Fifth Month and returned in Eleventh. He said the change in the people was so great that she could scarcely believe it to be the same city. In Fifth Month there had been hope and laughter, now only grim despair. She, too, had noticed the laughter on that one particular day. Ever since we have been here we have taken care not to laugh in public places because it brings us into unpleasant notice.

The week before Christmas was a very busy one. The Garretts were the hosts of two large student parties. About five hundred students in Berlin University, who receive one meal a day from the English Friends, were invited in two detachments to spend an evening with us in the large room at Dorotheenstrasse. There they drank gallons of cocoa and had each a plate of buns and cakes. Many fine young men and women were there—most of them studying for their Ph. D.'s and expecting to teach. They were glad to practice their English on us and the English Friends.

Another evening we entertained, from 5 to 7-30 P. M., the Charlottenburg group of Friends and friends of the Friends. They had given us a beautiful entertainment early in the week. There were about seventy children, of whom few look really well nourished, but they sat patiently before their cakes and candy while they sang carols and greetings and stories were given by their hostesses. I felt as though the old story of Ixion was being re-enacted, but the Germans have so much sentiment about Christmas that the very long exercises do not seem to tire even the youngest.

Our weeks in Berlin have been very full, but it is a little hard to chronicle just what we have done. There was a two days' conference of representatives of Friendly groups from all over Germany. This was very interesting. The diversity of thought and outlook was marked. It was decided that it was not yet possible to organize the groups into one Society.

We have regularly attended the meetings for worship of the Berlin group. Alfred Garrett and I have separately gone to the Charlottenburg meeting on First-day mornings. We have had a great many people to lunch and dine with us at various times. It takes so long to get a meal served in any eating place in Berlin that a very large part of the day is spent at the three meals. We have therefore tried to improve the time by having with us people of all sorts and conditions and of several nationalities. One must not count on getting a dinner served and paid for under two hours, and often it takes two-and-one-half hours. Each dish has to be recorded by the waiters (of whom there are always too few for the number of people to be served), checked off by the cook, and perhaps, as I sometimes remark, inspected by the police! To get "die Rechnung" after the meal is over is an exercise of the patience that should have its perfect work.

In many ways our weeks here have been a preparation for the work to be undertaken now—the visiting of the various centers of Quaker work in Germany. Conferences have been pre-arranged for us everywhere we are to go. Joan Fry has gone home for an indefinite period. We miss her greatly.

We have enjoyed making the acquaintance of Dr. Anna L. Russell, a Philadelphia Friend, cousin of John Russell Hayes. She and her German friend and partner, Dr. Kette, studied dentistry in Philadelphia. When the time came to choose their place of practice it was a question of Philadelphia or Berlin. Berlin won and they have practiced together in their spacious offices in Lützow Platz for twenty-six years.

Other interesting people who also entertained us and accepted invitations to us were Dr. Bannerjea, a Hindu, and his English wife. Dr. Bannerjea is a member of the Educational Department of the League of Nations and is to lecture in the U. S. next year. His wife wrote and published a notable book on Nationalism in India before she met her husband.

27th.—Last evening Alfred Garrett addressed Professor Brandel's English Seminar at the University on the subject of George Fox. There were about three hundred students present and a few visitors, all of whom listened with rapt attention. It was a splendid opportunity to present Quaker ideals to the young, and it was of course done in a masterly way.

Except at The Hague I have not come in contact with the German pacifists as much as I could wish. It has been due partly to lack of time, for Alicia Salomon, one of the leaders, is entirely accessible, and Fräulein Lüders, member of the Reichstag, gave me her card and a cordial invitation to visit the Reichstag on her introduction. I hope to see Carl Vetter the originator of the world-wide "No More War" demonstration when I return to Berlin.

I hope to write again from Frankfurt.

Sincerely yours,
AGNES L. TIERNEY.

AN APPEAL FOR SEEDS.

Florence M. Barrow, head of the Friends' relief mission in Poland, writes as follows concerning the need for seeds in Poland's devastated areas:—

"Our minimum budget does not include any money for seeds or agricultural implements. We are realizing more and more how much these will be needed in the Vilna district. We find that the cost of our seed packets filled last year amounted to about half a dollar each. These family packets contained ten varieties of seeds, and were enough to sow half an acre.

"We think that in the Hóduczski district there would be about three or four thousand families to whom a gift of seeds would be very valuable, while in other nearby districts there would be need for about the same amount. Most of the people in these districts are living in dugouts. In place after place there is a great pool of water below the floors, and the people tell us that often in the morning the water rises above the floor, and they are obliged to bale out many bucketsful."

How could half a dollar go further than in providing seeds with which a family of Polish refugees can plant a half-acre garden, thus helping it to start producing food once more? Those who are interested to help in this way may send their contributions to the American Friends' Service Committee, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., with a note stating that they are to be used for this purpose.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

OAKLAND AND BERKELEY FRIENDS OPEN NEW MEETING HOUSE, SECOND MONTH 11, 1923.—With hearts full of joy and thankfulness about sixty Friends and guests gathered for the morning meeting for worship in the new meeting house. The meeting was truly a spiritual feast. The presence of our visiting Friends was encouraging, several being present from San José and Los Gatos. Mary Travilla, who had come from Pasadena to be with us on this occasion, gave us a strong, clear Quaker message. It seemed most appropriate to have Charles Cox with us. The morning meeting adjourned about 12.30, after which a good lunch was served under the direction of Hanna Erskine.

The afternoon meeting was started shortly after two o'clock with the reading of the 91st Psalm, by Robert Wm. Clark, who presided, and who has taken up the mantle of our late Friend Edward A. Wright in carrying much of the responsibility of the Meeting.

Mary Travilla then gave us a brief but very enlightening address on "The Message of the Society of Friends to the World Today." One of the important timely points brought out was that of William Penn's and other early Friends' methods of dealing with the Indians. These principles are so much needed in today's national and international affairs.

We then had the pleasure of hearing from Charles Cox, who recently returned from the east, where he had attended several Friends' conferences and later had worked very hard in collecting funds for the purchase of our Meeting House. The interest in and the response to his appeal from Philadelphia and vicinity during this time of economic pressure is very encouraging. It is largely due to this and the substantial help from Thomas P. Cope that the Meeting is able to start free from debt.

We take this occasion to thank all the Friends who have manifested their interest in this Meeting. We trust that you will remember us in your prayers, that we may succeed in making this Meeting a true Quaker stronghold with Christ as our leader.

WM. C. AND ANNA E. JAMES.

As others see us was well brought out when two or more English Friends, just returned from a hasty tour of the States, reported briefly to the London Meeting for Sufferings. John Henry Barlow said in part: "Distance was a great obstacle in America, as many Yearly Meetings are separated by thousands of miles. The meeting at Vancouver was visited and he spent one and a half hours with Friends at Victoria. The visits of English Friends are greatly valued in British Columbia. Some schools and colleges were visited and he had felt it a great privilege to meet these large gatherings of students. The pastoral system had been defended as an adaptation of Quakerism to the special conditions and circumstances of American Friends who have not the leisure for pastoral work. The system may yet be open to modification, and it is not inherent in the system that the pastor should be the sole speaker. In its present form it need not be regarded as final.

American Friends do not take so much part in national affairs as English Friends. Very few are in either House of Parliament or on municipal bodies, but they are very active in social and religious work. The sending of American Friends to England and of English Friends to America was all to the good. "The more these two branches could be bound together the better it would be for Quakerism and for the two nations; and if only the two nations could be more united, the better it would be for the world as a whole."

THE Friends' Group at State College has felt that the best way to honor Robert Tomlinson for the service he has rendered during the last year in Poland under the auspices of the Friends' Service Committee was to support concretely the relief work. Last month, therefore, the Bob Tomlinson Fund was started and a total of $93 has so far been raised which will be turned over to the Service Committee. Former members as well as the present personnel of the Group have helped to honor Bob in this way.

FREDERICK J. LIBBY attended meeting at State College on First-day, Second Month 4th. In the evening he spoke at the Methodist Church on "America's Place in the World," and the next morning he spoke to the students during "chapel" services on the subject of peace, again emphasizing the need for activity if international friendship is to remain.

NOTICES.

YEARLY MEETING NEAR.

New features of business administration that have been introduced into our Yearly Meeting within the past twelve years have called forth from not a few Friends expressions that demand a respectful hearing.

One says:—"Our Yearly Meeting has largely ceased to be a waiting body, wherein we shall have time to know the Mind of Truth in our deliberations." Another writes:—"So many and so varied are the 'concerns' that come before us, and in such quick succession, that with some of us, at least, the mind becomes bewildered and we have no clear judgment for ourselves, and, of course, are in no fit mental attitude to offer even a sentiment to the meeting."

Another with as deep a religious feeling as any, but perhaps not as clearly expressed, mourns the passing of the day when it was possible to wait, and to wait in patient expectancy for the Divine message to come to us through an anointed messenger. In the waiting we had the soul exercise of communion, and in the receiving of the message we had the realization of what it is to be Divinely instructed.

Another Friend has written rather tersely: "I regret that our sessions are no longer deliberative, as I have known them in the past." "Probably," he adds, "it is not possible to touch all the subjects we do now with the same poise and dignity that we once knew, but let us not lose all the old-time caution and deliberation."

Other messages like the foregoing and some touching on other matters not hinted at in these, have come to the writer during the year and he has come to realize that with many of our membership there is an honest conviction that we are losing something that is of great value to us and something, which, if once lost, we cannot re-establish, for the trend of the times is against it.

I know that not all share this feeling; there are many who can sympathize with the utterance made from the head of the men's gallery years ago, but not forgotten by some of us. The speaker was one who came nearer ruling the decisions of the Yearly Meeting than any one has done since his day.

What he said was simply this:—"Friends, this is not a meeting for preaching, it is a meeting for the transaction of the business of the Church."

During the brief period of twelve years we have enlarged the number of Committees reporting to the Yearly Meeting not two but probably three-fold, by this very increase we have enlarged many-fold the number of those who are actively identified with the Committee's report, and whose labors throughout the year have made some of them super-sensitive toward the interests of their own Committee. We are no longer a body addressed from the galleries, that is, by a select company, relatively small, but experienced and competent.

The Friends who do the work of the Yearly Meeting during the other fifty-one weeks of the year speak oftener from the floor; with rare exceptions they are clear in what they have to say, they are concise and logical in their presentations, and the Meeting is given matter well worth considering. We rarely, if indeed ever, have long doctrinal papers read, which are supposed to be weighed in open meeting. We ask of our Committees brief reports and in the main we receive them. Some who read this paper will be surprised to learn how few are the minutes consumed in the actual reading of one of our regular reports—the length of these reports is not responsible for the pressure; it is much more probable that the multiplicity of subjects thrown open to general consideration is what consumes the time.

This, if correct, at once shifts the burden from the Committees to the Meeting at large, and, if one ventures to be a trifle more specific, to those who feel a call to speak to a question, actuated by the thought that they have a real contribution to make.

Now what expedients can be offered to relieve the situation? Is it to add hours to our already over-long sessions, or to add to the number of those sessions?

We added one half-day session (which means in the final analysis little more than one-and-a-quarter hours); this was done a few years ago; we propose to add the same this year, and with this addition of time we have about reached our limit, unless a second week be mortgaged, which many Friends would regret to have to add.

But is not our remedy to be found on an entirely different line? Are we not prone to grow inconsiderate of the body and indulge the thought that our individual message is more important than it actually is? Are we not given sometimes to add to what we have already said, that which does not strengthen our message and which lacks in real life? Do we ever regard the Yearly Meeting as a place where we can indulge a liberty that we would not take elsewhere? Do not some of us forget that we are not seasoned? We want a very clear call to consume the time of such a gathering, and furthermore, have we not learned that in a multiplicity of words, the thought is often confused if not entirely lost upon our hearers?

There is a dignity and propriety that should crown every session of our Yearly Meeting. It is not easy to define it, but it is easily recognized when it exists, and its absence one can as easily detect.

COPIER

There is no way by which it can be attained and then lived in, but for each one of us to set a guard upon himself—mindful alike to refrain from adding to the Meeting's burden by words that can be comfortably withheld and none the less watchful that he keep nothing back which the Master calls for at his hands.

This is what makes a Divinely ordered meeting, whether it be a meeting for worship or one for the transaction of business—between the two there should be no divorce. It is His cause that we wrestle for in both and in both our first wish should be to honor Him.

D. H. F.

What is God Like?

Wm. Littleboy.

Through the Christian centuries bitter feuds, sanguinary conflicts, have raged round the proposition that Christ is like God. And all to no purpose; for apart from Jesus we know little enough of God. The heart of the Christian revelation is that God is like Christ. "This is the true God and eternal life."

It is only gradually that the momentous nature of this supreme fact comes home to us. There is scarcely one of the urgent problems of human life which does not depend in the last resort on an intelligible answer to the question, "What is God's disposition towards us? What is His character?" If we can be quite sure that God is what Jesus set Him forth to be, although we may be still unable to find a clean solution to all life's riddles, we may yet rest content; all will certainly be well at last in the hands of such a God. Any hypothesis short of this leaves us walking in darkness.

If any questions arise in our minds as we think of the past history and present condition of the human race, granted that many have found in Christ one who can speak effectively to their condition, what about the countless millions who have never even heard His name or message? What of those, the vast majority of the race, who through the ages have lived and died without one clear ray of heavenly light? Or of the dark ages before the dawn of anything worthy of the name of religion, when man was slowly and painfully becoming "a living soul?" Or, once more, what of the innumerable little ones who have died in infancy, or the multitudes of the mentally afflicted? To none of these questions, so perplexing and so challenging, can we formulate a categorical reply. But if God is like Christ, our spirit sinks to rest. The Father to whom the fall of the fledgling sparrows from the nest is not a matter of indifference will not fail or forget these unknown myriads, and we can leave them calmly and confidently in His care.

There are those who, as they look upon the world to-day, despair of the future of the race. So dark is the outlook that many even of those who profess and call themselves Christians have abandoned hope for all but a select few. Disregarding the method of Jesus, they are looking for a sign from heaven, for some portentous manifestation of divine power which shall cut through the tangled skein of human destiny, and cut the world's agony by a stroke which shall save a small remnant at the cost of the destruction of the vast majority. But if God is like Christ, suffering with men, bearing their load of sin and sorrow, and appealing to them with a patient love which can never be discouraged by indifference or rebuff, how can we doubt that at long last love will win the victory, and the kingdom of the world become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ?

And what of the future? Sooner or later even the meanest amongst us will attain to the dignity of death. His presence is always with us; He enters our homes, and ignoring our unavailing cries, calls our best and dearest from our side. Do they live still—these beloved ones, or have they ceased to be? Is there any certainty of a life beyond, or are we moving forward, victims of relentless force, into nothingness? Science cannot answer our cry; philosophy can at most only suggest; the best we can obtain is uncertain inferences and yearnings which, because they are universal and persistent, we fondly imagine must find some satisfaction. But if God is like Christ, if He is the Father whom Jesus revealed, then in a moment all is changed, darkness and uncertainty vanish, and we know that we and our loved ones are safe in His keeping. He is our Father, wise and tender; He gave us the precious gift of human love; He can never disappoint the hope which He Himself has implanted. Death may still be a leap in the dark, but it is a leap into the everlasting arms, outstretched to receive us.

Most intimate of all are my own personal problems, so many, so harassing, so insistent that the cry of my spirit is always going out in a ceaseless urgency of enquiry, How? and Why? Many of these problems are insoluble, they are beyond the compass of any logical demonstration. There is so little I can see, so much I cannot understand. I turn to the great Revealer and He introduces me to a God who, He tells me, is a Father whose love and tenderness I may estimate by taking myself at my best in my relations with my children, and then raising this to infinity and applying it to God. He tells me that this Father runs to meet me, overjoyed when I am moved to turn to Him. He tells me that this Father of mine delights to give me the highest and best; that He knows myself and my needs so intimately that He has, as it were, counted the hairs on my head; that He loves me with a deep, personal love, and not simply in a general way as one of the race; that though I be the solitary wanderer in God's great flock, He notes my absence and cannot rest until He seeks me and finds me, and that the Father's heart rejoices and the bells of heaven ring jubilantly when I—even my own poor self—am restored to the fold. All this and much more He convinces and illustrates by His own relations with God and by His own attitude towards men. When I have grasped all this there is no room left for fear and doubt. "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed to Him."

In this matter of our estimate of God I repeat that it is a case of all or nothing. We do not take God seriously enough. We fail, not because we do not trust in Him too much, but because we do not trust Him completely. The words faith, and believe, "figure in the message of Jesus as second not even to His teaching on love. He seemed surprised at the continual failure of His disciples to appreciate what could be achieved through faith. 'Why are ye so fearful? Wherefore didst thou doubt? Only believe; it's quite simple. Just trust in God. Let not your hearts be troubled. Your cure is no marvel; your own faith has done it. Don't you yet understand? Don't you remember what faith achieved only the other day? All things are possible to him who believes. Where is your faith? Don't be so anxious, and don't be of doubtful mind. Fear not, little flock. You ought always to pray and not to faint. Don't worry. Come unto me and I will give you rest.' The question we must ask ourselves, and it is fundamentally important, is this, 'Was that teaching of Jesus about faith and fear simply so much talk? Is it, or is it not, relevant to Christian practice in the twentieth century? Can men who profess and call themselves Christians continue to use so little that which Jesus used so much?' ("Psychology and the Christian Life": T. W. Pym.)

Our attitude is reflected in the common saying that a thing is "too good to be true." If Jesus was right, God is so splendid, so completely good and tender, that anything we hope for from Him is, as Rendel Harris used to say, too good not to be true. Let us throw over once for all our old reserves and hesitations and half-beliefs, and try the great experiment of trusting Him completely in everything and always.

SELLY OAK, Birmingham.

THE ONLY BOOK NEVER OFF THE PRESS.

Four hundred and sixty-seven years ago the first book was printed from movable type. That book was the Bible and it took five years to complete the task. One of these books sold recently for $50,000. Today great presses printing for the American Bible Society are turning off copies of the Gospels at the rate of 10,000 an hour to be sold anywhere in the whole world for one cent each. In the intervening years the Bible has never been off the press. It has had a steady run for more than four centuries. Yet if all the Bibles printed in all the years since printing was invented were available today, there would not be enough to supply the world's present population. The present rate of production of Bibles is not as great as the birthrate. Large portions of the population of the world are still unable to get the whole Bible or even a main part in their native tongue.

It must be said to the credit of the Church that a vast work has been done in giving the Bible to the world. In whole or in part the Bible has been translated into 770 languages or dialects. During the past decade the Bible has appeared in a new language on an average of every six weeks. In the past century some 550,000,000 copies of the Scriptures have been prepared by the Bible Societies. Millions of dollars have been given by the Church for this great task. Thousands of consecrated men have given themselves in sacrificial service.

But still the fact remains that the Book is undelivered. When the Bible Societies are asked for an explanation their answer is immediate, direct and simple: "It could be delivered in hundreds of languages to millions of people, if paid for." It is merely a matter of dollars and cents. The scholarship of the Church is equal to the gigantic task of translation, if it can only be made available. The mills are equipped to furnish the paper and the presses to print the sacred words, if only funds are at hand to meet the expenses. The man power and woman power of the Church are adequate for the task of distribution. In the most literal sense all that is wanting is money to finance the venture.

No phase of the Church's task is so basic as that of giving the Bible to all men everywhere. It is probable that no other phase of the Church's work produces so large a return for the same amount of money and service. And yet the Church has never given as generously to this part of its work as it has to other branches of its missionary program. The percentage devoted to Bible work in the benevolent program of the Church as a whole is not something of which the Church may boast. If a great wave of generosity were to sweep the Church in behalf of the Bible cause, it would bring a revival of spiritual life to her membership. This thing is fundamental to the Church's success as a spiritual force in the world.

Nor have the stewards of great wealth seemed to realize the unlimited opportunity for far-reaching service presented by the Bible program. The really conspicuous gifts made during the first hundred years of this work could be counted in the proverbial way on the fingers of one hand. No one has come forward to create a foundation for Bible circulation as has been done in behalf of other worthy enterprises, such as public health, education, music, literature and art. After a century of operation, the total endowment of the American Bible Society, which is second in importance to no other American institution, is less than two millions of dollars, yielding an income of less than $100,000. May God stir the hearts of those whom He has richly endowed with material things to see this work as an opportunity fraught with vast possibility for human betterment and spiritual advancement.

FRANK H. MANN,

General Secretary, American Bible Society.

Germany's Despair.

This is written not as a member of any Committee, but as a member of the human family.

WIESBADEN, Second Month 2, 1923.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

Alfred Garrett, Gertrude Giles and I are sitting in a restaurant in Wiesbaden looking out into one of the lovely little parks of this beautiful city. In the distance is a statue of one of the Kaisers. It is said that William II could not bear to look at it because it is not equestrian. A Hohenzollern should always be on horseback.

We came down from Frankfurt yesterday in a motorbus (one-and-a-half hours) which has been running since the railroad strike began in the occupied area. A. C. G. and I had an engagement to speak in the evening. As the trains were not running and the rain descending in torrents as evening fell, we scarcely expected to find an audience. But in the parish house of one of the churches we found twenty people, of whom sixteen were men. Five of them were Lutheran pastors. Alfred Garrett spoke on the present situation and, so far as he could determine, its probable effect on England and America. I gave a brief discourse on education as a path to higher international ideals. The discussion that followed was one of the best we have had. The profound interest of many Germans we meet in the ideas behind the Quaker ideal is often surprising to us. Naturally they cannot all accept our views, but they are eager to know why we believe as we do and why so many Quakers were C. O.'s. A certain largeness and generosity of nature makes some of them very satisfactory in discussion.

The awful strain of the present situation makes our task very difficult. The bitterness toward William has flared up again with perhaps increased intensity. It is hard for most Germans not to believe that he deliberately betrayed them. In these days fraught with such fearful possibilities for the future of Europe it is natural that what America failed to do should take a large place in their minds.

Despair and utter misery seem to have settled over a large part of the population. It is not the working people who are suffering the most from hunger and cold as in England and America. They are all working and wages are regularly increased with the fall of the mark. But those who represent in a sense the sensitive soul of Germany and her finest contribution to life and thought—these are starving and watching their children starve. We rarely meet anyone who really has enough to eat. An egg costs just now 200 marks; a can of condensed milk 1500 marks. Professional salaries range between 20,000 and 30,000 marks per month—not fifty cents when the mark is 45,000 as it has been. People are wearing the last clothes they have. A fine-looking old gentleman, an architect, who designed some of the beautiful buildings in Frankfurt, came to meeting last First-day in an evening coat. Probably it is the last suit he will ever have.

Wiesbaden is the first town we have entered in the French occupied area. Soldiers abound—among them great numbers of Moroccans and Arabs wearing red fez or white turbans. Their presence has been the crowning bitterness of the occupation. Many of their acts are semi-barbarous in character. Their faces are often hard and cruel—very different from the Negro type we have at home. What a wrong their enforced presence here is doing colored people everywhere! We have been told here by Dr. Olga Knischensky, a remarkably fine woman and a pacifist, upon whom we called, that the Germans did not resent the occupation of the Rhineland just after the war. They said: "We have lost the war and this is to be expected." But the conduct of the troops has inflicted so much suffering of mind and body, so many families and individuals have been sent out of the area to permit the French troops to have quarters that a smouldering hate has replaced suzerainty. Whole families are crowded into one or two rooms in a house, while French soldiers are in possession of the rest. Women must often use the same kitchen with the French cooks, and while they prepare their meal of potatoes or turnips with black bread, quantities of meats and provisions, for which Germany pays, are being prepared for the French. The feeling is intensified where the billeted men are Moroccans.

Now has come the calamity of the Ruhr occupation with the consequent fall of the mark and increased hardships and despair. We cannot but feel that it is a false move on France's part, and that it will result in disaster for herself and increased sympathy for Germany, if Germany can only keep calm and not break out in revolution or useless resistance.

It is interesting to hear reports of the way the people in the Ruhr greeted the entrance of the French. When the invaders came bringing their guns and tanks into the midst of an unarmed people, they were greeted with disconcerting laughter. On one occasion, at least, a young man told us, a crowd of German workmen gathered about a little French officer. He was nervous and apprehensive, but good-natured voices said soothingly: "Don't be afraid, Kerlchen (a term of endearment), we only want to sing you a little song." Then arose in full chorus "Die Wacht am Rhein!" "A spirited resistance," some Germans call this. "If we Germans can only be strongly quiet," said Dr. Olga Knischensky—a beautiful phrase born out of her imperfect English. "In quietness and confidence shall be your strength," leaped at once to mind.

Already the papers say, the French have had to alter their plans. A Paris paper has had two delightful cartoons—one of a great machine gun labeled "A new invention, the French Coal Extractor." The other, representing a group of French officers, overcoated, mittened and muffled, one of them writing back to French headquarters: "Our soldiers are in good health and spirits, but freezing with cold. Please send coal."

Our sympathies are very deeply with Germany in this crisis. It is difficult to make others see what we have seen in our nearly three months' stay. As Wilson reiterated in those far-off days when a new world seemed about to be born, the people are as innocent of having brought on the war as we ourselves are. The courage, and in many cases, the deep, spirited strength with which they are bearing their sufferings is a lesson to us. We are being taught and helped in undreamed of ways. Germany yet may turn her defeat into a spiritual leadership of the world.

We have not come in contact with the great war profiteers and only to a limited extent with the monarchists. Our path takes us among university professors, teachers, professional people and young people of the "Jugend Bewegung," which aspires to create a new Germany on spiritual foundations, and in some meetings, a sprinkling of working people.

In Elberfeld last week we spoke to about two hundred people in a private Council Chamber of the Town Hall, a room decorated with rich carvings, mosaics, paintings and stained glass windows. People of many callings and opinions were there and the discussion of points ethical, political and educational, lasted hours.

The next morning I was asked to come to a public school in Barmen, which is joined to Elberfeld by the famous Schwebebahn, or swinging railway, suspended over the little river running through the narrow valley. Between three and four hundred children about thirteen years old plied me with questions for an hour-and-a-half about American customs, schools and social and industrial conditions. The questions were for the most part remarkably pertinent and intelligent.

There were seven or eight masters in the room, and finally one of them asked me to tell the children why Quakers couldn't fight. The children listened with eager attention and there was a moment's silence after I had finished.

This land is over-run with foreigners who are fattening on Germany's need. They buy the family heirlooms, house furnishings, pictures, jewels, etc., to re-sell in other lands. Bavaria suffered so much from the hordes who came to Munich and Oberammergau last summer that it is with difficulty that a foreigner can enter her borders now. We had to give good reasons for going and get a visa in Berlin. Americans gave Germany a great moral shock for they seemed to come chiefly to buy and drink.

In conclusion, I would say, what all believe here, that another war would destroy Europe. If only some beneficent power could come to the rescue of this thoroughly defeated yet striving people, hope for civilization, which was newborn at the close of the war, might again fill all hearts. What an opportunity France lost to make of her ancient enemy, a friend! The fact that France did not win the war unaided took the sting from Germany's enmity toward her. Now all is changed, and the world will suffer if the nations can find no way out of this terrible impasse.

Very sincerely,
AGNES L. TIERNEY.

IS ANOTHER WAR INEVITABLE?

Just before leaving England late last month I had lunch with a group of international thinkers, including a man in close touch with world affairs, who had been ambassador to Poland, has close family ties in both France and Germany, and an intimate knowledge of and acquaintance with leading men in all these countries as well as in England, Holland and Scandinavia. He had been in Paris the week before and had just come from three days in the Ruhr.

As we discussed the tragedy of France's present action and to what it was likely to lead, he expressed the conviction that another war was imminent unless France could be persuaded to change her course, and in explanation told us what was happening. Not only has France invaded the Ruhr, but she is using her influence to force Poland to attack Germany on the east. Poland realizes the seriousness of such a step, but France finances the Polish army and largely officers it. Now she demands this return. Russia is ready to come to Germany's aid, and the Poles know only too well what this means. They have had enough of fighting and their distracted country needs peace and settlement, but it will be difficult to refuse France's demand.

In the Ruhr Germany is trying passive resistance and so far there has been little of violence, but the suffering is great, the provocation terrible, and how long they can be restrained cannot be foretold. If it comes to invasion by the Poles, with Russia to help her, Germany will resist, and war will have started. When and where will it end?

The invasion of the Ruhr is part of a large scheme that looks to the division of Germany and the setting up of an "independent" state in the industrial centre of the Ruhr and the Rhineland, which would be managed by the French industrialists and under control of the French army. France is bankrupt and desperate. The money Germany has paid for reparations had not gone to rebuild the devastated territory, but to support the army of occupation; the people are questioning; elections come next year; the government is playing a dangerous game for a large stake. At the close of the war the new German Republic had little bitterness toward France, and many of the people were ready to be friends and to pay reasonable reparations for the devastations they acknowledged they had committed; it seemed possible the feud of centuries might be healed.

Unfortunately, France took the other way, determining to ruin her adversary rather than try to make a friend. By the impossible provisions of the Versailles Treaty and the spirit in which they have been enforced so far as possible, and the terrible conditions under the army of occupation, a widespread spirit of hatred has been engendered amongst all classes in Germany, and revenge is likely to be the cry of the future. Meanwhile the Turk awaits results, postponing any settlement at Lausanne; the Balkans is a seething cauldron of hatred, strife, jealousy, ambition; and Islam grimly, eagerly watches as the "Christian" nations kill each other and destroy their vaunted civilization.

It is a black tale, but I talked to a number of men and women in Europe and the facts are generally recognized. Hatred and fear are underlying causes of Europe's troubles and must be overcome if Europe is to survive. A new vision and a new spirit must come to the peoples of the earth. What is the vision and how is it to come? France is distracted with fear. She needs and deserves our keenest sympathy for all she endured through the terrible years of the war and since—her mental agony, her physical suffering, her devastated homes. Everywhere in Europe the results of the world war are working disaster, and sooner or later America will surely be engulfed in the general ruin if Europe falls into chaos.

We feel ourselves far removed from what is happening over there. But it is only a sheet of water that separates us. The very fact of our distance and comparative isolation adds to our responsibility, inasmuch as it should make it less difficult to think sanely and constructively. I am not a pessimist, but only the ignorant or the thoughtless can be optimistic today. This article is written only as an attempt to present to the reader something of the danger that confronts our civilization, not to suggest a remedy. It is, however, also a plea that we trouble ourselves more than heretofore with the problems of a sad and weary world, facing the existing conditions and needs of the situation with minds open, unbiased, filled with charity and understanding.

THE EUROPEAN CRISIS.

[The following was issued a few weeks ago by the Meeting for Sufferings of London Yearly Meeting. It is the desire of that body to give the Minutes a very wide circulation and already steps toward that end have been taken. We most cordially commend it and the spirit it inculcates.—Eds.]

Where shall we seek for the source and where find the remedy for the ills of the time?

The Society of Friends believes that it is possible to explain and to remedy these ills if we are willing to face the question with absolute honesty. Both explanation and remedy are to be found in men's idea of God, and in their unfaithfulness or faithfulness to His laws. A God of force, a punishing, vengeance-taking God, has been so much worshipped that Europe today presents a far more fertile field for war than even in 1914. There are joyless victors, haunted by debt, poverty and unemployment; there are despairing vanquished, nursing the desire for a revenge that will only perpetuate strife. In the East the Turkish army faces the British navy, there is mobilizing in the Balkans, and agitation on the Baltic; the new frontiers are often new causes of inflammation and resentment. On this strife, which threatens our very civilization, men's eyes are fixed; their talk is of political demands, economic necessities and military sanctions; and, obsessed with these obvious matters, they almost entirely disregard the realities that lie behind these scenes of tense disorder. To enshrine force in the place of ultimate power is to blast life at its roots, to blind men to human suffering and to set them on a road where they must travel down through darkness to failure. A Christianity, all too often merely nominal, that, whilst speaking words about love, acts on the belief in material force as the final word in human affairs, does, in practice, worship a pagan god. The Europe of today is the result.

The real Lord of the souls of men, the real Lord of the world, is far other. The God whose home is in man, whose creative love works within him, is a reality so tremendous, so actual, that the pre-occupied minds of men fail to be aware of Him. Yet it is only by the venture of faith in this real God, made many times by prophets and saints of old, made by common men in every-day life, a faith stamped on the consciousness of Christians by Jesus Christ, that any constructive remedies can be applied to a world that has lost its way along the road of disbelief. Men must be released by this truer conception of God from their vain trust in the efficacy of external measures of force, either as means for securing the safety of nations or for the reclaiming of individuals. They must turn aside from the hatred that engenders oppression if they are to become conscious of the Divine Presence within them, and thus to be bringers of righteousness.

We believe this so strongly that we would make treaties and settle frontiers on this basis, with a view to common happiness rather than to national power. We would look for safety, not to the helplessness, but to the friendliness of our neighbors. Let us act, at once, on this truer conception of the all-loving Father. Let us make the venture of faith before it is too late. There is no time to be lost; let everyone urge the immediate calling together of the nations in conference, so that the grave questions at issue may be settled, not in the atmosphere of national rivalry, but in that of the unity of mankind as children of one Father. The treaties, remade in this belief, might be, as it were, the birth cry of pain which would usher in a new world order responsive to the new-found sense of the reality of God.

WESTERN QUARTERLY MEETING.

The exercises in the first or religious meeting at the Western Quarterly Meeting at West Grove on Second Month 23rd, very largely followed the thought that Friends should feel a distinct responsibility to minister to the spiritual needs of a war-sick world, just as we have responded to the cry for food and clothing from those who are in great physical distress by reason of the world conflict. We were reminded that opportunities for this service are right at home as well as in distant lands, and that it can only be best of the Master when entered into in spirit of brotherly love and fellowship, with hearts consecrated to this service.

During the consideration of the subject of worship and ministry as called to our attention by the reading of the third Query, a concern spread over the meeting, that our members would seek to obey every rightly-directed impulse to encourage others by vocal expression in our meetings. We were reminded that a live meeting should normally have frequent vocal messages given them.

Friends were urged to individually and collectively labor diligently for the passage of State legislation to prohibit the liquor traffic, and to take active part in the peace work of our Society.

After remembering that some of our interested members were house-bound through sickness and with an expression of thanksgiving for the rich blessing of the day, the meeting adjourned.

In the informal afternoon gathering, A. Neave Brayshaw outlined his concern for Friends to be faithful to the call to share in the vocal exercises of our meetings—taking up the matter about where the discussion in the business meeting of the morning had left us and explaining very feelingly how Friends had come to fear so much the consequences of light and frothy vocal offering, that it has been easy to fall into the other error of surrounding the ministry with an impenetrable hedge from behind which, with false humility and timidity, we too often survey the field of harvest from afar, secure in the thought that that line of service certainly was not intended for us. From the many expressions heard after the meeting it was evident that the lucid, yet fervent, appeal of our Friend Neave Brayshaw and that of Wm. Richie, who followed him, found answer in many hearts.

THE TOLL OF THE SEA.

(THOUGHTS OF CLOVELLY IN WINTER.)

He was a seaman, old and brown,
—Hark to the stones dragged down on the beach—
Climbing the steps of the old sea town
Wedged 'twixt the cliffs where the sea gulls screech,
And the sea is calling, calling, calling
For those who can hear no sound.

"Seaman, how did you come ashore?"
—Hark to the rumble of stones below—
"A broken spar and a bit of oar,—
And the crest of a wave that swept the shore
With the lift of the tide at its flow;"
And the sea is falling, falling, falling
Steadily, sure and slow.

"Seaman, where is thy brown-winged trawl?"
—Hark to the thunder of waves on the shore—
"Ask of the gulls who are circling the squall Seeking their prey where the breakers roar."
While the sea is sobbing, sobbing, sobbing
For those who will come no more.

"Seaman, where are thy comrades four?"
—List to the wail of the waves above—
"Perchance the waves may wash them ashore,
Carried in on the breakers' roar
To the beach, 'neath the cliffs, in the cove"—
While the sea is moaning, moaning, moaning,
Moaning for those they love.

DRAFTED.

(ON THE SUSSEX DOWNS—1916.)

Over the hill he went, my boy,
Over the hill toward the sea—
He waved his cap as he stood on the ridge—
Then dropt—and was lost to me—
And I fell on my knees in the grass and sobbed
Till the stars looked down on me.

Off in the distance I heard the guns
Booming far o'er the sea—
Will he come again? My boy, my loved,
Will he come again to me?
And I crouched in the grass till the morning dawned,
And the sun shone down on me.

Over the hills I saw him come!
Over the hills from the sea—
I saw him stand on the ridge and look,
But, 'twas only a letter for me!
"Killed in the trenches"—was all it said—
—My boy!—that was dear to me.

LOVE is not getting, but giving; not a wild dream of pleasure and a madness of desire—oh, no, love is not that—it is goodness and honor and peace and pure living—yes, love is that and it is the best thing in the world and the thing that lives longest.—HENRY VAN DYKE.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

During the Second Month two appeals came to the United States showing the great need Europe feels for American help. The Lutheran archbishops and bishops of Sweden appealed to President Harding to take action for the relief of the present dissension. "We had hoped," they say, "for the blessings of peace after the horrors of war, but the disunity in the European commonwealth grows worse—the course now being taken will bear fruit in new and more frightful wars."

Sweden had great difficulty in maintaining neutrality during the war and evidently has grave fears for the future.

The German Trade Unions, with 12,000,000 members, has appealed to America "to save Europe and the world from irretrievable disaster." Because America promised that justice should prevail "the German people submitted to complete disarmament and gave an unqualified expression of their desire to work for peace and international reconciliation." But they go on to say, "We have been reduced to a nation which is chronically hungry, our infants are wrapped in paper instead of swaddling clothes, while our women and children are succumbing to physical misery." The Dean of Windsor and chaplain to the King of England, at a dinner in New York, tells us this is true. "Think of a population in a cold climate where 80 per cent. of the people have no clothes except those that you see—no underclothing whatever. Think of a people who never see meat, except perhaps in small quantities, rarely more often than once a week. Think of the large population of the middle class, absolutely starving. These people starve and die, except as they are kept alive by charity."

Usually a Trade Union of one country addresses the Trades Union of the other country. But in their great need the German workers have ignored diplomatic procedure and spoken from the heart. Samuel Gompers, himself "no pro-German," has asked for United States action for peace between France and Germany, "without regard to whether either or both nations will be pleased or displeased."

How can we convince Congress of the frightful disaster ahead unless they get behind the administration for a real foreign policy of fearless helpfulness?

THE churches continue to be active in their interest in Peace—The Detroit Council, the Chicago Federation and that in Columbus, Ohio—all clearly stating that unless the United States aid Europe the world is threatened with chaos.

The Quaker church should be stirred to the depths by this paragraph of a letter of Dr. Jowett, from the Copenhagen Conference of the World Alliance:

"I think that the proceedings of the Copenhagen Conference were of such outstanding importance as to deserve the close attention of all who seek the restoration of European harmony and peace. It was a gathering representative of the people who dwell behind the feverish frontier-line of Governments and the subtle and wily movement of professional politicians. The members of the conference came from over twenty nations, and they expressed the Christian sentiment which is found in colleges and universities, and in the quiet everyday life of multitudes of men and women whose loyalty to the moral ideals feeds the springs of civilized life. But the true value of the gathering lay in the fact that it sought to express the convictions and feelings of great masses of people who had been silent during the past few years. There are multitudes of people in Europe who, however partial and fragmentary may be their achievement, are trying to face the issue of life in the light of the Christian ideal. Their judgments about things are clear, but they have no adequate utterance. The energies of their convictions are not organized into effective witness. Their testimony is not heard. And it was the vital worth of the Copenhagen Conference that it endeavored to give some expression to these deep Christian sentiments which are seeking a voice in every nation in Europe. In reality the Conference represented a partial awakening of the Christian Church to the exercise of one of its gravest and most neglected functions. The Church in Europe offered itself as the organ of international conscience and as the voice of moral sentiment and convictions."

CARL HEATH in speaking of the conditions in Europe growing out of a combined economic and moral breakdown feels the future civilization of Europe is threatened more than many realize. Everywhere despair and weakness are following the economic hardships.

Friends have felt the call for international service for physical and spiritual relief, but while doing this service we at home "need a great liberation of redemptive force, which shall so enlarge the life of our Society, that that life flowing out from all the meetings and centres around the world, may touch to flame the searching spirits of modern men and speak with power to the condition of Europe, and, by a natural reaction, encourage us too on the path of a vital faith. Here lies the inward significance of the International Service of Friends."

"NO MORE WAR" for Second Month,—a publication on behalf of the No More War movement (British Section of the War Resisters' International)—contains much of interest. George Lansbury, M. P., is the Chairman. Theodor W. Wilson has urged the members to make a definite levy on their incomes on behalf of the movement!

Are we of the U. S. too far away from the suffering and failures of the great War? Are we too engrossed in our little business to give of our time and means toward the world need? If we put off the call until a more convenient season it will be too late, if not for those who are seeking our help, at least too late for our own soul salvation.

The World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches in its issue for Second Month, in a very enlightening section on the Ruhr Situation, says, "Germany has gone to pieces and the mark is worth practically nothing. She claimed she could not make the payments as promised and asked for extension. The general impression is that the British Government believes Germany and is in favor of making the terms of payment easier. France has refused and has undertaken the collection of the debts without the aid of England. The British point of view shows thought for the welfare of all Europe, humaneness to a crushed people, a large part of whom were honestly struggling to get on to their feet, and it also shows wisdom. There could be much more chance of France ultimately getting her just reparations by showing a more sympathetic attitude toward the new Germany and helping it to recover industrially and economically. Europe is living over a powder magazine. What is the United States going to do about it? What can we do? If we were not so 'splendidly isolated,' we would have a voice and an influence now when the need is so great.

RECENTLY in New York, a dinner of 800 leading men from Boston, New Haven, Philadelphia and New York celebrated the joining of the Non-Partisan Committee for the League of Nations and the Association for International Co-operation, under the name of "The Non-Partisan Association for the League of Nations."

Their platform calls for immediate steps on the part of our government to associate us with the League in solving what Senator Borah has termed problems in which we are all concerned.

BE yourself, no base imitation of another, but your best self. There is something you can do better than anybody else. Hear what the morning says, and bravely obey that. Do the thing at which you are great, not what you were never meant for. Remember that we are but pipes through which the breath of God doth blow a momentary music. Trust thyself.—EMERSON.

RESOLUTIONS

Offered by Henry S. Conard.

ADOPTED BY THE FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH OF GRINNELL, IOWA, FIRST MONTH 14, 1923.

We, the members of the First Congregational Church of Grinnell, Iowa, wish to express our hearty sympathy with our pastor in his efforts to awaken his hearers and the church to the imminent danger of another war and the need of peace on earth. We wish especially to recommend his message to the next Fellowship Conference.

Believing that overcoming the seething hatred of the world with love is today the absorbing duty of the church, we urge the ministers and churches of Iowa to make the matter their first concern.

We plead with the official church papers of the country to take a more earnest and definite stand for peace.

We suggest that our Iowa church organization bring the question before our national organizations, hoping that they, acting with other denominations, may so organize the Christian sentiment of the world that Christians working with others of like mind may speedily bring about—

1. An international political organization to prevent war.
2. A general limitation of armaments to a police status.
3. Above all, a world where international good-will has driven out national and racial hatreds.

BOOK REVIEWS.

TWO BOOKS FOR PARENTS AND TEACHERS.

Any book intended for a special class of people should be judged by those it is intended to reach.

We have all tried reading "Children's books" (so called) to children, and finding that some we enjoyed meant very little to them.

But when a mother recommends a book for mothers, and says "it has been the greatest help" to her, we need not be afraid that it will prove disappointing to other parents.

"The Dawn of Character in the Child," and "The Dawn of Religion in the Mind of the Child," both by Edith E. Read Mumford, M. A., of Manchester, England, are not exactly companion volumes, for the first contains fourteen chapters; the last but seven. The religion of the child has one chapter in the first book, but in the main "The Dawn of Character" deals with the development of the mind, the habits, the will. "Yet," the author says, "complete development of character as well as intelligence can, I believe, only be attained when all these are dedicated to the highest ends; that is, when life is inspired by a religious purpose." And so in the second book she traces the development of the spiritual life from the first impulse to "be good," possessed "in some degree by every child," on through the childish experiences of religion, to "an increasing store of spiritual energy, which seeks its fulfillment in a righteous life, in which there is a conscious relation between the child and God."

A very interesting series of illustrations, which the author tells us "are drawn from real life," add greatly to the value of the book. It is a temptation to quote, but we will be satisfied with one, as follows:—

"All her childhood, when she was not at school, Nellie had helped her mother to make artificial flowers; and the strain of incessant work and grinding poverty had told upon the child's health. So kind folk planned a holiday for her; and the day came when the child found herself, for the first time, amid all the beauty of a country garden. Up and down the garden paths she wandered, saying nothing, only gazing intently at the gaily-colored flowers and at the close, green border of box. Then, in a soft whisper, she asked if she might 'just touch the flowers,' and in ever-deepening wonderment softly she passed her frail fingers over flower after flower, round leaf after leaf. 'I was thinking,' she said presently, when they asked what was in her mind, 'I was thinking what good work God puts into the flowers,' and then, with a wistful longing in her voice, she added, 'We couldn't afford to do it for the money we get.'"

"I appeal," says the author, "for a sympathetic consideration of the religious attitude taken up in this book, not only to those upon whom the responsibility for a child's religious training is commonly held to rest, but to all who are in any way brought into contact with children," and certainly there is much to stimulate thought and to help in solving the problems presented by the varieties of child-nature, in these modest little volumes.

They are on sale at 304 Arch Street, and one copy of each is the property of the Sub-committee on Religious Training of the Yearly Meeting's Extension Committee. These can be loaned to interested persons. Apply to William B. Harvey.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

BOBBIE YANK.

KATRINE BLACKINTON, BLACKINTON, MASS.

The bird-books call him the White-breasted Nuthatch—my friend out there on the trunk of the maple tree—but I call him "Bobbie Yank." The reason for my familiarity is the fact that we have been on speaking terms for over a year. It began on Thanksgiving Day, 1917, over a piece of suet tied to the balcony post, and has continued in a progressive fashion, by means of little devices and encouragements like sun-flower seeds and nut-meats put in unexpected places, until now we are old friends, even though our relations are seasonal. Of course, spring and summer find him with intensive family duties on his hands (at which I lay a wager he is no slacker) and, with at least two batches of husky youngsters coming on to be sheltered, fed and taught, what time, I would like to ask, has B. Yank for as much as a thought of his winter pals? Why, I have it on the highest authority that he passes Downy and Chickadee, whom he dotes on in the cold months, without as much recognition as the turning of an eyelash—rushes right by them with such rude haste, that our Alice-in-Wonderland Ears and Whiskers Rabbit would feel obliged to pause and raise a monacle of astonishment, so I need not feel that he singles me out for personal slight, and when he tells you that he really did call on me during his rush season, won't you understand how honored I felt?

Last summer, as I was giving my garden a good "hosing" after a very hot day, I heard a familiar yank close to my ear, and, turning, saw my friend, his wife and five children on the trunk of a young black walnut at the garden's edge, only a pace from where I stood. If the most distinguished man in the world had made a pilgrimage with his family to see me, I couldn't have felt more "set up." There were the proud, sleek parents and their five overgrown, fluffy youngsters, a study in blue-grey! Their father's look told volumes: "Well, here they are! And a fine looking lot, if I do say so; I'll tell you a family like that represents work. Now there's just the feeding alone—many's the time I've gone to bed hungry after a hard day carrying grubs to those children, and the worst of it was, you positively couldn't fill them!" Of course, his manner was bristling with ego, but who could blame him? Certainly not I, as I stood spell-bound with admiration watching those young, black-capped, blue-greys imitating their parents, I wouldn't have given a cent for the life of a grub in that tree, with those lively, new, inverted grub-enthusiasts carrying on their bill-driving campaign with all the pristine vigor of youth.

Months intervened before I next saw Bobbie, and then in the company of a male friend, which prompted me to draw the conclusion that he has set up bachelor's apartments for the winter. Upon my first glimpse of him I put some nut-meats on the upper balcony and just inside my bed-room window, and waited. The balcony meats made a prompt disappearance, and then, sure enough, in he came—very cautiously at first—hopping over the window-sill with his individual zigzag hop, and changing his Yank Yank, as he entered into a subdued colloquial tone which F. Chapman has well described as his "conversational twitter." Later on, when the nuts appeared, not only on the floor but on the furniture and in unexpected corners, Bobbie made his entrance by flying from the balcony rail onto the corners of the dressing-table, which stands between the two long French windows, and there he took a survey in order to decide which lunching-place gave the best promise. These visits often came at about 7 o'clock in the morning, and I could watch him from the vantage ground of my bed. The steady stream of conversation which he carried on with himself, under his breath, interested me almost more than any other cunning wild thing about him. The more acquainted I grow with this altogether fascinating bird, the stronger is my impression that he conceals an adventurous spirit behind that matter-of-fact mask of his. Every new device for feeding that I put out he is the first to approach, and one sunny day I sat in the open window of his room with a nut-meat riding on the toe of my boot, foot extended. He came hopping in very cautiously, looking at me with head on one side, his bright eyes questioning my face, plainly saying "Will you keep still? Really, will you?" Then in a most casual way he grasped the nut and made off with it in no undue haste.

WHAT GERMANY NEEDS.

After serving in the Friends' relief missions in both Germany and Russia, the writer of the following article is now in Germany in connection with the message work of the American Friends' Service Committee.

Germany is a terrible place just now—mentally harder to bear than Russia—for in Russia, speaking generally, the present difficulty has a purely physical basis—at least that part of it that we face. And there is something that one can do for at least a part of the people. Most of all, beyond today's difficulty, there is always hope and confidence in an enormous future.

Here in Germany it is a different matter. The whole country seems to be crumbling. And what mental agony it costs! Starvation is really rampant here this winter (with bread now at 570 marks per loaf). All my friends are hungry, and the faces of the people in the streets so white and wan and big-eyed.

Out of all this suffering there grows, of course, much fineness. If one could only see spiritual values segregated, and forget physical things, including human pain, I think that one might say that Germany is leading the world in some essential ways. It seems to me that there are deep experiments being made here in things of the spirit, which even if the nation goes to pieces must live and be passed on to humanity at large.

Say what you will about political guilt, about withstanding pressure to pay reparations debts, etc., etc., the actual people here, das Volk, is in the position of a martyred nation. The people of Belgium were physically so martyred, but the world never let Belgium stand alone; and the seeking in the average man here for some international recognition of his struggle, some real place in the world, even if it is only a place to die honorably in, is a dreadful thing to see. I spend a considerable part of my time making friends with casual people, and trying to carry over to them some appreciation of their effort as a people to play the game.

It is really a joyful job, though by no means always easy. For instance, yesterday I had been having some clothes dry-cleaned, and got into conversation with the man in the shop. At first he only wanted to deliver me a lecture on the position of Germany, the sins of France, and the duties of America. After he had raved for a little and got somewhat out of breath. I said, very gently, for I quite understood and sympathized with his attitude to foreigners, "But what good do you think it will do to tell me all this?" Of course he did not think it would do any good—he had simply let the cork out of the bottle. He raved a little more.

I told him that I had been in Germany pretty much the whole of the last three years—he had already asked about the star I wear—and gradually he became convinced that he and I were really friends. He tried many lines of talk, about the necessity of getting just men into leading positions in France, for instance. Asked whether he thought German politicians universally just, and how he would suggest going at the problem, and so on, he gradually came to the conclusion that the only field which he and his brethren could really work was Germany, and that the situation pretty well reduced them to pacifism. From then on we developed a fine dream of a Germany freeing herself spiritually and helping to free the world, and save humanity from its wild downward rush.

That is the only real help I find to give here. Of course anyone who has anything to give away must do it and I can only stand the strain—I should say we all can only stand the strain by giving concrete physical relief where we can—but I think there is very simple spiritual healing to be done everywhere.

People do not wish to hear Quakerism preached, though all their hearts are sore and spent for a lack of the love of mankind which evidences the love of God. They are sick of recipes and doctrines and dogmas and creeds and churches, but I have not found one human being who was not ready to expand and flower under a little loving treatment. People do want to be good and beautiful and to be appreciated and loved. I am so sick of fights myself—I can guess how they must welcome the chance for a little peace, anyhow, anywhere.

That, I conceive, is the Quaker message to Germany now—first, to bring the realization that we warmly love them as we warmly love all humanity, and that out of that love we have the insight to see hope for them—hope that all material disaster cannot quench. But you can't prelend that sort of love, and a dose of our ideas is no substitute.

SCHOOL DAYS IN RUSSIA.

(Extracts from the Diary of a Quaker Worker.)

"Every morning now as we go across the icy fields to the warehouse we meet the little handful of children coming over from the station to go to school. They are a happy little group carrying their wet sacks of bread for 'obyet' (dinner), and they chorus 'Zdrahst' che' to us when they meet us and howl with delight when we miss our footing on the river bank and come rolling down in front of them.

"I ask them whether they like to go to school, and there is no mistaking their spontaneous chorus of assent. To-day some of them were carrying heavier sacks than usual and I stopped to find out what was in them. It was grain to go towards paying the teacher's salary and to help buy school materials. They have no school materials at all now. Indeed, some of them had to be sold when the schools closed last winter, to keep the teachers from starving. And even so one of them did perish of hunger.

"The different families are being taxed whatever they can pay, and for the present, the school can take in only the children from families that have something to contribute, because they have no room for more children until another house is prepared. This we are planning to have done immediately, paying for the work with Quaker rations. Thus we will help some of the poorest people to secure food and at the same time see that all the children get to school.

"All over the district they are doing everything possible to get the schools into shape. But there is such an utter lack of everything that is needed that the attempts are pathetic.

"The old teacher from Bourdigen who has been working for us in the clothing warehouse this summer, came back to see me today to ask for some clothes for her children. The small pyok that the government is able to give in these parts leaves no margin for children's clothing. It was terrible to have to refuse her. She had walked the nine versts in the snow and would have to return on foot. But our clothing stock is so limited at present that we cannot give out to special people or institutions, but have to issue to the poorest people on the list as they come. There are two schools in Bourdigen, she told me, but only one is open, as the other is out of repair, and there is no money to buy glass for the windows. That means that out of 400 in the village who are begging for school, only 140 can be accommodated. But even though the school-houses were in order the children could not attend unless they had more clothes. The children that go now are the only ones in the village that have any clothes at all, and that of a pitifully inadequate sort.

"The teachers are supposed to receive from the local Soviet 3 poods of flour a month, and in addition for the whole year 5 poods of potatoes, 1 pood of kerosene, and 1 of wheat. But the village is of course very poor; and they do not know what will happen after the village fund gives out unless the Quakers can give some help, as I hope we can. The village is certainly doing its part.

"Later two young girl teachers came in from Barabonovka village, bringing the same story. Their ration was very small and the children needed clothing badly. In that village there are teachers for 280 children, half of the children in the town. The other half have no clothes enough to leave their 'isbas.' When I asked how the pupils learned without materials the teachers answered, 'With their tongues. It is all we have.' There are no pencils, slates or paper in the school."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

ELIM A. E. PALMQUIST, Secretary of the Philadelphia Federation of Churches, has arranged for the first of a series of important conferences. A full notice of this first meeting is announced below. Friends will wish to mark this date on their calendars and to give what assistance they can to the advancement of the plan.

The Olney Current, which is published four times a year, and is the medium for exchange of Friends in Ohio, under date of First Month, has just reached us. It is full of interesting matter and calls for a word of hearty commendation and generous financial support.

Among other papers is a ten-page letter from Drohiczyn, Poland, by Arthur Gamble; even after one has become saturated with news from across the Atlantic, he can absorb this letter and will find enjoyment in the process.

BARNESVILLE FRIENDS' BOARDING SCHOOL reports among persons who have visited them during the past term: George L. Jones, of Westtown; Paul Jones, Secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation; President Edwards of Earlham College; Murray Kenworthy of Friends' Service Committee; Dr. Sina Stratton and Anna Walton, of Philadelphia; Marianna Wood, of Ithaca, N. Y., and Louiza Richardson of Canada. Much regret was felt that Dr. Hodgkin could not stop off and renew his acquaintance with the School family on his way to the Pacific. If present plans hold, A. Neave Brayshaw expects to be at Barnesville soon after Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

JAMES HENDERSON, of Barnesville, and Cyrus Cooper, of Middleton, both of Ohio Yearly Meeting, have recently received from their respective Meetings minutes liberating them for Gospel service "amongst the industrial classes of the country." The former at the present writing has already been visiting some of the districts around Pittsburgh.

The dates of the Young Friends' Eastern Conference to be held at Westtown, Pennsylvania, have been changed to Eighth Month 27th-Ninth Month 3rd.

The latest message from English Young Friends says that they are hoping to be able to send a group of eight to America next summer. As plans are developing now, our English Friends will arrive in the United States about Seventh Month 10th. They will attend the Richmond Conference. The group will then divide, to visit in different parts of the country. They will remain in this country until after the Westtown Conference. It is possible that one of them will stay long enough to visit some of our colleges in the autumn.

The largest order for the daily Bible reading, "Through the Year with Christ," has come from the Young Friends' Board of Baltimore Yearly Meeting. They ask for 450 copies and are endeavoring to get the outline used by every family in the Yearly Meeting.

An editorial in the Haverford The Meeting makes this reference to their membership:—

In looking over the mailing list recently it appears that, in addition to quite a number of persons who, though living in Pennsylvania, are too far away to attend meeting, we have forty members living in the States of California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Iowa, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Ohio and Texas. One of our members is in Munich, one has her permanent home in Japan, one has just come to us from Jamaica; two are now leaving for an absence of many months in Australia and New Zealand. For those of us who keep closely at home and perhaps especially for those who are shut-ins, of whom we have a few, it would bring some of the freshness and larger interests of the world to have some of these Friends write us occasionally of what they are doing, the kind of people they meet, the books they read, the share they are able to take in the world's tasks, large or small, and whether they are able to pass on to others anything that they may receive from their fellowship in Haverford Meeting.

THE engagement of Robert L. Simkin to Margaret Timberlake is announced. She is from Portland, Maine, a graduate of Earlham College, Class of 1922, and a leading member of New England Yearly Meeting. Robert Simkin is studying at the Haverford Graduate School this term.

WILLIAM LITTLEBOY, of Selly Oak, Birmingham, England, most pleasantly remembered for his helpful visit here a year ago, and Edith M. Winder, of Woolman School, Swarthmore, Pa., have announced their engagement. Edith Winder is a member of N. A. Street Meeting, Richmond, Ind. She has been hostess at Woolman School, but plans to sail for England in Fourth Month.

NOTICE

A WORLD PEACE RALLY is to be held in Philadelphia Third Month 13th. The speakers for the occasion are Dr. Irving Fisher, Head of the Department of Political Economy, Yale, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton of Brooklyn and Dr. Linley V. Gordon, Associate Secretary of the Church Peace Union, New York City.

There will be three sessions, one at 10.30, one at 2.30 and one at 8 o'clock in the evening. The morning and afternoon sessions will be held in the Friends' Meeting-house, 20 S. Twelfth Street, the evening session at Witherspoon Hall. From this Philadelphia meeting there will be planned ten district meetings in the larger centres around Philadelphia, and from these ten centres in turn meetings will be planned in five centres. The Philadelphia meeting is one of the regional character. Throughout the country altogether 2,000 meetings are to be held.

Special objectives of the meeting are to urge the United States to enter an International Court; to continue its humanitarian work with the League of Nations and to enter some Alliance of Nations, with the understanding that the ultimate purpose is to establish the abolition of war as a means of settling international disputes.

DIED.—First Month 10, 1923, at her home in Germantown, MILDRED WHITALL WARING, wife of Bernard G. Waring, in her thirty-ninth year; a member of Germantown Monthly Meeting.

—, at Barclay Home, West Chester, Pa., First Month 19, 1923, PHILENA HOOPES, in the seventieth year of her age; a member of Goshen Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, Eleventh Month 1, 1922, at her home in Langhorne, Pa., EDITH SATTEBRIWAITE, in her fortieth year; a member of Falls Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, Second Month 24, 1923, at his home, High Point, N. C., RUFUS P. KING, in the eightieth year of his age; a recorded Minister in the Society of Friends.

IF you want a lace that will save you stops from break-downs you can depend on Tannate. Users say that Tannate lasts from two to three times as long as ordinary rawhide, sometimes more. It is very tough and does not so soon grow hard and brittle.

It reduces stops, often to less than one half. It gives you a large saving in fixed charges and idle wages. Lace leather is a small item, and when you consider how much of your possible output may be lost by stops you appreciate the importance of using the best.

The price may be higher, but it lasts so much longer than cheaper laces that it will cost you less per year, plus the satisfaction of less trouble.

A FRIEND OF MINE.

R. BARCLAY MOON.

There is a friend of mine who was a very good mechanic. He did a better job than most workmen do. People began coming to him, because they could depend upon it that whatever he did would be well done. If he were making a table, he would make it so that it would stand square, and not have one leg shorter than the others, causing it to be unsteady. He would be careful not to use wood with bad knots on chair legs. "I would not want to buy something that had a defect in it, and so I must treat the other fellow as I would want to be treated myself," he would say. It was his rule to make everything he made as if he was going to use it.

While he was working he saw sickness and suffering on every side. So he stopped his work and began to help those who were in trouble, and to heal those who were sick. Soon he was so well known that people came to him to be cured of their diseases. They went away strong and well. But this friend of mine saw that simply healing people was not enough. Persons were still selfish and indifferent to the suffering they saw around them. Making people well did not make them honest in business. He saw the result of hatred and greed all about him. Pride seemed everywhere, love forgotten. Men were proud of the fact they held places of distinction, and they used these positions as a means to gratify their personal ambitions. What was needed to make the world better, was to change men's desires. People needed to have created within them a new life. Then greatness would not consist in what one gained for oneself, but in the spirit of loving service which filled one's life.

This friend of mine is a friend of yours also, Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world. He taught and lived so we might know how God would have us live. If we become His followers, love, not selfishness, will be our dominating thought. Our chief aim in life will be that a measure of His spirit may fill our lives.

We are not like animals. Men cannot remain satisfied by simply having a comfortable bed, and being warm, and having sufficient to eat. This is enough for a horse or cow, who have no craving for anything more. There is a longing in the soul of man which makes him turn his face toward God for knowledge of the meaning of life, that comes with a sense of right and wrong. There may be times when we wish that we might return to the merely animal world, and escape the knowledge of good and evil, but the consciousness that "I ought" to do this or that remains with us. Sometimes it may seem as though this longing to know God's will remains unsatisfied, and we cannot tell what He would have us do. We may feel as though we are lost in a fog, and know not what way to go, but Jesus came that He might show us the way. All we need to do is to follow Him and we shall find God. The spirit of Jesus Christ did not leave the world when He left it. His spirit has remained through the ages, and in proportion as the human race has yielded to the influence of His spirit, just so far has the Kingdom of God progressed in the world.

Jesus wants to be our friend and help us. We know something of what a true friend is. He is one we can depend upon, someone we can trust under all conditions, someone who is always ready to help us. Think what it would mean to have Jesus for such a friend. Someone who would never go back on us. We know that He wants to be our friend, because He gave His life for us. What greater test of friendship can there be? He did so much for us. What are we going to do for Him? If you are a friend of someone, you want to help him. Jesus wants to be our friend and help us. Can we help wanting to be His friend and help Him? Think of the joy that will come into your life, with the knowledge that Jesus is your friend, and that through your life, He can use you in spreading His message of redeeming love.

Jesus said, "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." Here then is the real test. Shall our lives show that we have accepted Jesus as our Friend?

HOW TO INQUIRE.

It was a fine day in spring. The clouds were flying high and the spirits of two boys were almost as high as the clouds. The sense of the chase was not only in the air but also in the lads as they made their way across a meadow in the valley of Ridley Creek. A flock of farm ducks rising from the grass made the game of flight and pursuit inevitable. Unfortunately, one duck was lame and so fell an easy prey to the marauders. But what can one do with a dead duck? The crime became intense. There was only one way to finish the affair, to bury the murdered fowl under a heap of stones and promise, in heart's blood, never to tell a soul.

Boys who are not in the habit of killing ducks are liable to develop inside a rather guilty feeling. The matter came to a crisis when the youth whose hands were red with duck blood was quizzed by his parents as to whether there were ever adventures in boydom that did not come to the parental ear. With this question, the whole affair unrolled before the child's mental eye, the chase, the slaughter, the victim, the burial under stones and the solemn promise to secrecy. Without hesitation the answer indicated that there was nothing to report.

Years have passed since this adventure of boyhood, but a reading of the queries in a late monthly meeting brought it freshly to mind. The analogy is not quite complete, but certainly some of the queries require answers which, if not exactly misleading, do equivocate.

Even more unfortunate is the disproportionate stress that our present system of answering gives to the inquiries. To illustrate, one Monthly Meeting reports that one member, a highly respected and useful county official, administrators oaths. The answer from this meeting reports the single exception. The Quarterly Meeting does not feel free to omit its mention. As a consequence when the matter comes before the Yearly Meeting the mere mention of the exception swells into a disproportionate fault. I suggest that an informal discussion of the particular exception or possibly the serious consideration of the Yearly Meeting of those valuable officials among us who share Quaker ideals would not only save the meetings' time but create the proper emphasis. The answer as it now stands reverses the effect. Figuratively, we release a hundred policemen to correct the position of a flower in a vase.

Nor is the seventh query the only one that may lead us into the same trap. The fourth query in questioning about diversions is equally difficult for overseers, to say nothing about needless chagrin that besets those that tell the truth. One might go through one question after another with the same just comment; do the queries obtain the answers which they seek? Is not the machinery too ponderous? The system too tedious? Are we not using a laborious process of wood-cuts when we should use photography?

There are several ways one could inquire, and at the same time inspire the membership to happier life. For instance, a well-organized public meeting demonstrating our faith in a free ministry would probably do more good than trudging through the third query on the three separate occasions during the year. Further, a stirring address on Peace would do more in our Society to promote the policy of good-will than the answering of the dry negative questions:

"Do you maintain a faithful testimony . . . against . . . bearing arms, training and other military services?"

In short, could not an intelligent, competent and representative committee either prepare answers or more happily prepare a program that would inspire where the queries should inspire and inform where the present answers seek to inform. Such a program could remove the mechanical tedium and inject real life and vigor into the annual review.

There are grave dangers in any official summary, dangers which we must avoid. First, there is always the temptation toward an over-developed introspection. Secondly, there is always the stupid stress of any deviations from the prescribed course, as if there was something sacred and unchangeable about "the good order amongst us." To speak plainly, the discipline as it now stands, almost invites infraction by the young, healthy and adventurous spirits. Parents can make the pursuit and slaying of ducks an enchanting adventure by the pressing of questions. If we stress accomplishments, aims and ideals as matters of virile inspiration we can look forward to our Yearly Meeting as a rare period for a varied and helpful review.

Where the Knife Cuts.

The True Story of an Experience at Ellis Island.

Fire!

With a roar that was heard for miles, the red flames, spurning and leaping, seemed to lift and consume the little house of the Gulumian family under the very eyes of the watchers, and shower after shower of brilliant sparks vomited upwards to be absorbed quickly in the heavy blackness of the Constantinople night. Rafters fell with a sickening thud, drowning out for a few seconds the smaller cracklings and snappings, as a fresh shower of sparks shot up into space. Raging and swirling with every new puff of wind, the fire swept from one house to another, throwing its weirdly red brilliance upon the hundreds of hurrying figures who sought refuge and found none.

It was a sight that burned itself deeply into the mind of eighteen-year old Siranouish Gulumian. She never forgot the wild terror of that night, and the hopeless despair which took possession of her as she gazed in fascinated horror at the glowing embers of her home—her father's home. Two charred uprights in sharp relief against the smouldering furnace behind seemed to confront her, all that was left of the happiest of homes. Instinctively she drew closer to her the shivering forms of her father and mother, whispering to them and to her little brother strange words of comfort.

They would all go to America, the land of opportunity. How glad the older son, her brother, would be to take them in! They would all be together, and in America there was no fear of Turkish raids or of devastating fires. She wondered vaguely if it was her real self that was saying these things, but as she talked on, low and comfortingly to her parents, a new life seemed to take hold of her, and she felt mysteriously happy.

Hovsep Gulumian creaked his way clumsily up the narrow stairs to his third floor room. He was tired to-night. But a good night's sleep would fix him up, he thought, and in the end, this diamond-cutting business paid. He was lucky to get the job after being in France so long.

Hovsep, or Joseph, as he now called himself, was about to sink down on the bed, when he saw something on his little table. A letter!—yes, and from his sister, too—he knew the writing at once. Opening it, he read it slowly, and with increasing horror and unbelief; then he read it again. As if dazed, he stared at the familiar writing without seeing it. Suddenly the whole truth burst upon him, as an electric searchlight flashes upon a dark road. He saw clearly every object, and knew that there was not a moment to lose. A father, a mother, a sister, and a younger brother all suddenly deprived of their home and all their belongings, and left would a relative in that part of the world, except an aged uncle. And he, Joseph . . .

"I'll do it if I die in the attempt," he thought, "Surely an ex-service man and a citizen of the United States who has money to meet expenses will not be refused. I can have a flat already rented for them, and help them get settled here."

That night Joseph wrote a long letter to Siranouish, urging her to bring the family to America on the next boat that sailed. He was sure there would be no trouble, and he would see that they were comfortably settled near him in Boston.

A few weeks later, Joseph received a telegram saying that his family had arrived on the Greek steamer Megali Hellas from Constantinople, and were now detained at Ellis Island awaiting admission to the United States. He left at once, but the trip to New York seemed endless, and the train interminably slow. But what a meeting that was when he arrived! There were tears and caresses of welcome, and joy at reuniting as one family, and promises of a happier life in America in the future, in the land of opportunity and justice.

But a disappointment also awaited the successful diamond-cutter. He soon learned that under the existing immigration law, his father, mother and brother would be allowed to come to him in Boston, while Siranouish, his little sister Siran, would probably be deported. She had been born in Turkey, while the rest of the family were of Armenian birth. The year's quota of Turkish immigrants had been exhausted many months before. The quota for Armenia, however, was still open for a small number of immigrants, and there would be little trouble about the admission of his mother, father and little brother.

This was but the beginning of several long months of anxiety for the Gulumian family. Joseph's little brother finally went back with him to Boston, but his mother and father, also at liberty to enter the United States, refused to leave their daughter. They still had hopes that she would be allowed to accompany him, and their hardships across the sea had given them an unshakable courage. Siranouish herself was cheerful, and even happy, through it all. Always pleasant, and never complaining, she cherished the hope that shortly, when another fiscal year began, she would be admitted under the new Turkish quota. She also appealed to authorities at Washington for special consideration of her case. Meanwhile she devoted all her powers to cheering her parents, and also helping with the children in the kindergarten and school-work which took place both morning and afternoon. She was skilful in designing and needlework, and whether it was games, singing, or sewing, she would always be on hand, with her cheering smile to help out. It was no wonder that the teachers and workers connected with the school came to love her and look forward each day to seeing her pleasant smile. Nor was this all. While she was on the Island, she cared for twelve little Russian children as if she were their mother. She took them to meals, kept them clean, and put them to bed each day. The officials, also, admired her courage and fine personality.

Finally, in three weeks' time, an answer to Siranouish's appeal came from immigration authorities at Washington. The answer was "Deport." That was the law.

Siranouish's mother and father received the news with a quiet courage born of long exposure to danger and hardship. Their daughter might yet be admitted, with her brother's aid, under the new year's quota. The mother fought against persisting visions of her daughter being sent back alone to the aged uncle in Constantinople, living there practically homeless and at the mercy of the Turks.

"No, no," she thought, "it cannot be. Surely they will listen to my son, and not send her back alone!"

At Washington, Joseph was interceding on behalf of his sister. He was a citizen, he told them, and an ex-service man. Surely he must have a right to bring his sister into the country. Also he had money which he had been saving for many years for this very purpose. There was no danger of her becoming a public charge. He could support her, at least, until she could find work. And Joseph came dangerously near spending his savings by engaging a lawyer to help him out with technical complications. But the officials were powerless to help him. It was the law, they said, and nothing could be done.

Still with their daughter at Ellis Island, Joseph's parents received this news with bowed heads. Their son had failed. There remained only one thing for them to do. With a desperate hope that by some miracle Siranouish would not be separated from them, they decided finally to go to Boston to join their two sons. The anxiety of the past few months had caused the food, the sleeping quarters and the early rising at the Island to become distasteful to them, and with the forlorn hope that America, the land of Justice, would not cause their daughter to be separated from them, they left her at Ellis Island, her last cheery words singing in their ears, "Don't worry, mother, I'll be with you in a week or two."

It was a fair morning in early summer, six days before the opening of the new quota year. A certain tenseness pervading the women's detention was snapped suddenly by the entrance of an official. All knew only too well what it meant, for they could read it in his face, and some burst into tears openly. Slowly the official approached Siranouish who was walking back and forth, back and forth, at the end of the room. There was not a dry eye among those that followed him on his painful errand. For another second all was quiet as the official spoke a few words to Siranouish. Quickly a circle gathered. With her mother's name on her lips, the girl had fainted.

MENCIOUS AND MILITARISM.

"God gave all men all earth to love,
But since our hearts are small,
Ordained for each one spot should prove Beloved over all."

With these well-known lines from Kipling, Edward W. Evans opened one of the most interesting Tea-meetings that has ever been held in the Coulter Street Meeting-house, Germantown, and following up the introduction, Henry T. Hodgkin proved very conclusively that "though our hearts are small" yet love for our fellow-men can and does blot out differences in boundary, race, and religion and can at will forge chains of friendship stronger than time or custom. As far back as the days of Confucius, brotherly love was considered one of the highest attributes attainable, while his famous follower, the great old philosopher Mencius in the third century, B. C. extolled its virtues, bidding his followers believe in the ethical goodness of man's nature, which goodness he took to be the essential characteristic of the humanity of men.

Thus long before the coming of Christ, the highest type of Chinese thinker believed in and handed down his belief in an ideal of brotherhood only to have his theories rudely shattered in this, the twentieth century, by the so-called Christian nations and their anything but brotherly behavior.

For a thousand years China has kept the peace, refusing to take part in war-like deprecations against her neighbors, and what has she gained by her attitude? Overrun by the nations at her doors, and over-ruled by those farther away, she has no say in her own government. Is it any wonder that she is beginning to think a military backing necessary to attain and maintain a place in the sun? Slowly but surely she is awakening, and if in this limited time Christianity cannot prove itself to be other than the tool of greedy, violent, unprincipled self-seekers, China will turn from it forever, and woe betide the world when she turns.

If the reader cares to follow up the Dr. Hodgkin's lead, he will find a most interesting review of the whole peace problem in Fred Smith's book "On the Trail of the Peace Maker," which has already been reviewed in this paper.

As a whole, Dr. Hodgkin's talk was decidedly a challenge to Christianity and to Quakerism as an integral part of Christianity..

Will the faith we believe in stand or fall in the years to come? Whichever occurs will we have done our part?

WHO IS A. NEAVE BRAYSHAW?

Just who is A. Neave Brayshaw?

We publish below a few facts about this kindly, distinguished-looking English Friend, who has lately come to Philadelphia, and who has spoken at many varied gatherings in this vicinity.

First of all, he is interested in young people, particularly boys, and especially young boys. He has taught at the Bootham School in York, England, and at various times has taken parties of boys with him to France.

A. Neave Brayshaw was also a lecturer at Woodbrooke, England, and served as a member of the Yorkshire, 1905, Committee, which has published pamphlets on Quakerism, theology, and social and international questions. He holds the degrees of Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Laws, and has written several books and pamphlets, among which are: "The Personality of George Fox," "The Quakers, Their Story and Message," "A Historical Sketch of the Society of Friends," "Friends and the Universal Light," and "Life that is Life Indeed." Most of these books can be obtained at the Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia. The Encyclopædia Britannica is indebted to A. Neave Brayshaw for its section on "Friends, Society of," and he has also written other sections for this great work.

His purpose in coming to America at this time is to visit Friends in and around Philadelphia, especially isolated groups in this vicinity. In addition, he plans a trip to Barnesville, Ohio, and hopes to be in Philadelphia again to attend the sessions of the Yearly Meeting starting on the twenty-sixth of Third Month. He is interested in visiting different kinds of Quaker groups, and during his stay will attend meetings of both "branches" of Friends.

Accompanied by J. Wilhelm Rowntree, the institutor of the great Rowntree Series of Quaker History, A. Neave Brayshaw visited this country before in 1890. His present home address is: 50 Aberdeen Walk, Scarborough, England.

A LYRIC.

Whispered gently from the long-vanished past,
O wondrous song, breathed from some ancient lyre,
Thy sacred strains my secret soul inspire,
And thrill me by the beauty of thy long, clear blast.
Thy singer, heedless of all age or caste,
Poured from his innermost soul, aglow with fire,
Thy flowing verse, that rises ever higher
And sparkles like a fountain, bubbling fast.
What skilful hand has touched that instrument
That sends thee forth like incense sweet, to bear
Tidings of love divine to every heart,
Or purest joy, or sorrow's deep lament,
Or simple lays for childhood's mind so fair?
What joy thou art, through life, in every part!

MORAL MUCLAGE.—That is what many of us need. It is not so hard to lay hold upon some task, but to stick to it is where the difficulty comes in. It is easy to begin something, but to finish it is not so easy. A starter has not the highest calling of life. The people of dogged persistence have counted most in all the problems of living. Nothing holds us to our work like love. That is moral muclage of the best brand. It will soon kill any person to work for money. There is nothing harder in the world to make than a living, when that is all we are trying to make.—J. A. MAXWELL, in Baptist Commonwealth.

YOUNG FRIENDS—A DEVELOPING MOVEMENT.

At a supper meeting in the Twelfth Street Tea-meeting room, following the regular meeting of the Young Friends' Executive Committee on Second Month 9th, A. Neave Brayshaw met with the representatives of the Young Friends' Committee. In an undramatic but very earnest manner, he laid before us some of those ideals which we believe are most essential as objectives for any Young Friends' Movement.

He first reminded us that our basic goal idea as Christians must be the spreading of the Kingdom of God in the hearts of men. But to do this, it must mean something very real and natural to us. And equally we should be natural in the enthusiasm with which we try to spread it. Our tradition of reliance and reserve which is not all wrong may be carried too far and may attempt to justify itself by claiming credit for unwillingness to "proseolytize." We should be so filled with joy in having acquired this that we are eager to share it so that others may also enjoy it.

In doing this, we must be practical and use the means at hand. People to-day are not so much interested in the theological differences between the denominations, as in the sort of people that belong to them. People will judge of Christianity by what they see of Christians and of Quakerism by what they see of Quakers.

Thus it behooves us to develop our own personalities. For this we find our inspiration in Christ, the perfect, the master personality. If we are to develop our own selves to the greatest we must come in contact with Him. As an aid to this he suggested that "The Galilean," by Nathaniel Micklem, might prove to be a good book to study and think over. But in daily practice and conduct, each of us has a means of getting acquainted with the Master. There is that within each of us which tells us what we ought to do, and often this is contrasted with what we want to do. We cannot think of this as the outcome of the physical and chemical reactions of the material particles of our bodies, as we follow that which we feel we ought to do, we come into a fresh experience of God as Jesus Christ has shown him, and that which was difficult becomes more natural. To those who are skeptical about their own ability to make this acquaintance with Him, he had confidence that, if anyone would follow this inner guide, after each failure still pressing forward, before long that person would not fail to receive a fresh impression of Christ.

This inner guide is often weakened by neglect or drowned out by the distractions of life, so that it is necessary often to come into the quiet. Here we see one of the strong points of our contribution to Christian worship. In our method of worship, we have something which the rest of the world lacks, but cannot permanently get along without. And in the meantime we hold it as a trust, and our failure to carry it out well is the reason why others have not yet appreciated its value.

In the work of spreading the Kingdom of God, our understanding of the mind of Christ is deepened and strengthened by Fellowship. Fellowship is more than good-natured sociability, it is the sharing of the best we have, our spiritual experience and everything that is good, and this Fellowship must find its expression or outlet in action. We are usually willing to express it by deeds but we shrink from the service of the spoken word. Nevertheless, both forms of expression are necessary, and neither may be omitted without a lowering of spiritual life. Looked at in this way, vocal service in worship becomes a natural thing for every one of us to engage in from time to time. While this will not be easy (perhaps ought not to be easy) we need to rise above the terror which grips us and this we can do if a deeper love takes hold of us, a sense of what a meeting might be in its spiritual contribution to the world. The service must be natural; forced speaking is as injurious to spiritual life as forced silence, but it is not necessary to conceive of a call as something wholly apart from our own mental and spiritual selves. The Holy Spirit does not use us as talking machines which do not know what they are doing

He calls for our willing co-operation and our deliberate and conscious putting ourselves at His disposal.

A. Neave Brayshaw concluded by saying that into many English Young Friends' meetings, and he supposed into ours also, there was coming a spirit which it would have been difficult for an older generation to understand, nearer as they were to a convention of repressiveness. He put it before young Friends not to stand aloof from older ones, to do nothing that might seem to be pushing them off, but to extend to them the fellowship for which many were longing. Their sensitiveness about seeming to force themselves on those who were younger might give the impression that they did not wish for their company, but sometimes they felt sad at feeling themselves shut out from the happiness and spiritual life of the younger ones which they rejoiced to see. It was right that younger Friends should at times have their own meetings, and older ones who remember their own youth ought not to complain of their doing so, but we all need the help of one another, and no section of us can afford to stand apart from the rest.

HOWARD E. YARNALL, JR.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[Readers will recall two letters that appeared in the last Young Friends' Number. We publish the following letter, as it illustrates helpful, friendly, competitive thought.—Eds.]

I want to thank thee for thy letter to Anna Cope Evans printed in THE FRIEND this week. I think it is worth while to speak a word of caution of that kind occasionally. I feel that a combined use of heart and brain will lead to a clearer and more helpful result. It merely clouds the issue to use such a play upon words as "share" instead of "give." All giving is sharing.

To use Jesus' teaching of love and compassion and generosity as an admonition to a socialistic state is quite on a par with Christian Science arguments in the field of therapeutics. Certainly, His commands as to baptism and the Lord's Supper were much more explicit.

Some people seem to forget that there is much friendly and generous competition in every walk of life. To condemn the competitive system because it is often abused is not rational; as well abolish the home because it is at times betrayed, or religion because it has often had grotesque and un-Christian interpreters.

I believe, of course, that we can attain by degrees to a fairer distribution of the social output, but I gravely fear that some earnest Friends are encouraging social experiments that would serve only to increase vastly the amount of suffering and need in the world. Not every one that sayeth, "Lord, Lord" shall heal the present wounds of humanity.

Our radicals often forget the doctrine of free-will: that God has made it possible for men to sin and shirk and waste, and many do so from deliberate choice. My feeling is that the kindest, humanest, most Christian thing for such people is to let them feel the spur of their self-imposed need. The worst thing would be to adopt a system that would encourage their sloth. Jesus offered no rewards to the slothful servant. For myself I feel that my whole life, in every field of its activity, has been shifted to a higher gear of efficiency and service by the competition I have met,—hence I say it has been friendly competition.

The cases of undeserved need are of course in an entirely different class from those mentioned above, and call for our vigilant Christian solicitude. Such cases can be met, however, by a gradual readjustment of economic rewards, among which our so-called "charities" should be considered as a perfectly honorable form of social remuneration.

My final conclusion, in brief, is that we should make our "competition" and our "capitalism" more Christian, rather than destroy them outright; we should strengthen and beautify our present economic structure, rather than barter it for an air-castle. For our present foundations are the result of the wisdom and experience, the toil and tears, of many generations of human kind.

Please forgive the length of this letter. It springs from a real concern.

[Although the author permitted the use of this letter, he preferred that we omit signature, as his communication was an extemporaneous expression and not a studied reply. We feel indebted for just such frank opinion.—Eds.]

[A LETTER from a group of Young Friends follows. It is the first response received in answer to a letter sent out from the Young Friends of our community as a Christmas greeting. The group in Philadelphia are for the most part young in years. The group in Berlin, whose letter we are glad to publish, are not so much younger in age as in membership. One, although over forty, signs as a six-year old in the Society. Another ranks herself as an infant only two. A third confesses that she is not yet born!—Eds.]

BERLIN, W. 8, February 1, 1923.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

We were extremely pleased to receive your kind letter, which proved to us that you are near in these serious times. We feel that unity of spirit with our friends all over the world gives us courage and strength in hours of danger and strengthens our hope that we shall emerge triumphant out of the present violent struggle which threatens our inner and outward life.

The consciousness of man's deep trust in God, and God's in man, seem to be revealed to the youth of the present time with new force and wonder, and the immense task which lies for each in this knowledge urges them to action. The power of the individual, however, does not go far, and therefore we are all striving after fellowship which lends full force to our action.

So we thank you most heartily once more, and are glad that we can confidently lay our hands in yours,

CANTON CHRISTIAN COLLEGE, Canton, China.

First Month 4, 1923.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

Yesterday a large mail arrived from the United States, and among many letters and Christmas cards, which were only about ten days late, was a copy of THE FRIEND for Eleventh Month 16th, with a wealth of very interesting material. The things that particularly caught my eye there were Faith Borton's suggestions for increased activity of the Young Friends' Committee.

It seems to me I was on that committee, a few years ago, but I had exactly the attitude Faith mentions, of feeling that with my college work, I was too busy to do anything much, and so I would leave it all to the secretary to do, and if nothing was accomplished, why it wasn't my fault. I am, of course, heartily ashamed of my past indiscretions in this line, and at the risk of having some of you say, "Well, he is safe from being asked to do anything, as long as he stays 10,000 miles away from the centre of things," I want to applaud heartily the various suggestions made in the article I have mentioned.

As one thing I can do, I am writing you herein a little news of things as they are in China today, at least in the southern part. Only yesterday, we heard that an army is marching toward Canton, on the outside of the Province somewhere, and whether it is Dr. Sun trying to come back, or a group of Kwong Si and Yunnan bandits, nobody seems to know. You know in China, if a man hopes to be elected Mayor, or Govern-nor, or President, he runs for the office, and when defeated, he borrows a sum of money, hires soldiers, and tries to run the successful candidate out by force. If he fails, those who have loaned the money lose it, and if he wins, he rules by force more or less, until some other man seems to want the office more than he does, and displaces him by the same method. Fortunately, most of the Chinese soldiers try, not so much to kill the enemy, as to scare him into flight, by shooting into the air, and while some are hurt by accident, casualties are, in general, slight.

There are, however, more and more young men of the upper and influential classes who see the undesirable conditions only too clearly and who want to change the old order. They come, not only from the numbers who return from foreign lands, but from the Christian Schools and Colleges of China. In fact, very frequently a boy will become a Christian here, then go to America, and fall in with the wrong crowd in an American university and come back to increase "squeeze" and selfish dishonesty more than he would have if he had never left the country, because he is more "educated." So you see it is a work well worth while for any of you who can, to get hold of the Chinese students at Pennsylvania or elsewhere, and show them that in America there are some Christians.

It seems that the best way to influence the future of this country is to manufacture the men who can do it, so we are trying as hard as we can to turn out Christian leaders to do what no foreigner can himself accomplish. Recently Sherwood Eddy of the Y. M. C. A. gave two very powerful addresses, which were translated by a splendid, spirited fellow, a Chinese, who had a perfect command of both languages, and as a result over one hundred of our boys stood up as a public confession of their faith in our Master and a desire to follow Him. One of these boys was an old friend of mine, and at the risk of making this letter so long that Faith Borton's Correspondence Column may take up the whole number, or more likely, that the Editors won't print it, I want to tell you about him. Last year his father was on his way to Hong Kong, from Shanghai, on a good big steamer which was captured by pirates and he was shot through the back of the neck and killed. Poor little Sheh Hin Shing was away from school for a while, and when he came back and told me about it, his big eyes looked like polished black beads, and his hands said more than his broken English. But he is a capital English student, and by this time, can converse freely and easily in the foreign language; He always seemed to consider "Good Man" and "Christian" as synonymous terms, and yet would not take the plunge of becoming a Christian himself.

About a week before Sherwood Eddy arrived in Canton, several of us took a walk to an old pagoda, near the campus, but away from any village with its disturbing crowds, and Charles Haines spoke to him again, on the proposition of following Christ himself. He sparred and stammered for a while, but finally saw he had no good reason for not yielding his life to God, and he prayed, in English, for forgiveness for his sins, and promised to follow Jesus the rest of his life.

When we told him that Charles and I belonged to a Church which believed in a spiritual baptism only, and that we had never been baptized with water, he was much interested, and said he wanted to join our church. "Let me write a letter to your church in America, and ask them to take me in."

END OF THE YOUNG FRIENDS' NUMBER.

A Visit to the Ruhr District.

So much stir has been made in the world by the French occupation of the Ruhr Valley that I have thought it might be of interest to record our impressions of a short visit there a few days after the occupation began.

In Berlin we had heard some rather wild rumors, and had met some excitement and tension in Cassel, a city where we stayed three days, about two-thirds of the way from Berlin

We thought about that, but it seems best out here, where being a Christian often involves much family difficulty for those who become Christians to take a stand very publicly and "face whatever music may come," so we finally persuaded him to join one of the Chinese churches.

This occurrence has made me wish we could have a Friends' Meeting in Canton, as we have in Tokyo. At the college there are now three families of Friends, but all of us are trying to make Christians, not Quakers. It hardly seems feasible at the present time, but whenever visiting Friends, such as William Allen, or others more recently, have come to the College, we have had a First-day Meeting, attended by several interested members of other denominations.

With every good wish to all of you, from Evelyn Byrd Page Wood, who though not a member with us, is most sympathetic with all our efforts in good work, and from myself,

Sincerely your friend,

MORRIS WISTAR WOOD.

NOTES.

YOUNG FRIENDS interested in Germany, German thought-life, and the German language will like to hear of a publication received at the Young Friends' office, entitled Neuerwerk, to which we are invited to subscribe for the sum of one dollar per year. The sample copy sent is highly interesting. It seems to be written mainly for the purpose of spreading the ideals of "primitive Christianity" and Peace. We hope from time to time to give the names of other publications in Germany for which Young Friends might care to subscribe.

In conjunction with this thought, we would also suggest Young Friends send copies, for which they have no further use, of American magazines and periodicals for which they subscribe to the office of the Religioese Gesellschaft der Freunde, Berlin W. 8, Behrenstr. 26a 11. In this way it is hoped that there may be a furthering of the understanding of the ideals and thought and viewpoints of different nationalities, which is quite an important part of Young Friends' work.

AT BALTIMORE.—In Baltimore during the week end of First Month 27th and 28th, there was a young Friends' Conference at the Park Avenue School and Meeting-house. Delegates from New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Yearly Meeting Groups were present to the number of about 75 and were comfortably accommodated on the school premises. Baltimore Young Friends made us feel very much at home.

On Seventh-day afternoon there were reports of activities in the varied groups and an outline of the aim and plan of the coming Eastern All Friends' Conference at Westtown this summer. In the evening we listened to an address by Dr. William Forbush regarding ministry in Friends' meetings.

First-day morning was occupied with the Bible class exercises and the meeting for worship. After dinner Dr. Forbush followed his theme of the previous evening and at the end there was some very interesting and helpful discussion.

This finished the Conference proper and we then adjourned to the new Homewood Meeting-house to partake of tea and sociability. A spirit of real fellowship pervaded the whole occasion. Above all, it was a fitting time for the renewal of past friendships and the beginning of new ones.

to the Ruhr. It was said that the French had served notice that if the mine-owners would not deliver the coal required, they would be taken out and shot, and that if the miners began a general strike their leaders too would be taken out and shot. The morning that we started for the Ruhr it was also reported with head-lines in the papers that the French troops had begun to loot the banks. To anticipate for a moment, I may say that when we reached our destination and inquired carefully of our friend Paul Helbeck, he at once said these statements were not true at all; no threats of shooting had been made, and though the banks had been closed, nothing had been taken from them. This naturally put us on our guard against accepting statements made by the newspapers.

As our train rumbled over the bridge that spans the Ruhr river we were struck by the peace and beauty of the scene:—high wooded hills looking down on the pretty stream, a castle above, and no sign of mines or mills. Then as we proceeded and reached manufacturing districts we watched for soldiers, but there were none; no crowds, or delays; no passports called for; and when we rolled into the station, there were no sentries or excitement; everything seemed normal. Our kind friends met us and took us to our hotel; so we sat down to supper and began diligently to inquire how these things could be. It had been reported to us that this town—or rather the twin cities, Elberfeld-Barmen, where we were—would be occupied by the French troops that very day, and we had come with a little trepidation, but now we learned that there was no such occupation, nor was there likely to be. These cities were on the southern margin of the Ruhr district and had no steel mills or mines; the centre of the difficulty was at Essen, fifteen miles to the north. How were things at Essen then, we asked? Oh, the people were taking the occupation quietly; at first there had been processions of young workers in the streets, singing war-like songs, but no more serious demonstrations. We at once concluded that there was less excitement in the region of occupation than in the rest of Germany.

Our principal meeting was held in the splendid Council Chamber of the Elberfeld City Hall. About two hundred people were present, and a representative of the city government sat by us and opened the meeting. Our subject had been decided on before the occupation—"Quakerism and the Present Crisis;" naturally since the occupation it took on a much more acute significance, and we looked forward to this meeting with much apprehension. The gist of our message was that in all ages one of the manifestations of Christian love had been to persevere in a strong and courageous endurance under injustice and persecution, and that this was the surest way to win over the sympathy of the world. Our addresses were well received; no serious objections were raised; no bitter discussion followed; no sharp outbreaks of patriotism, as we had feared, took place; we were greatly relieved. We concluded again that the people living close to the seat of trouble took it more philosophically than the rest of the world.

Later we heard from eye-witnesses more exactly how the German populace met the French troops. One man said that as they met soldiers on the streets they paid no attention to them, simply ignored their presence. Another young man reported an incident that greatly interested us: a French officer found himself surrounded by a German crowd that looked threatening, and he drew his revolver; the crowd jeered him a little, but said, "Never mind, old man; we're not going to hurt you; put away your pistol; but we just want to sing you a few songs." And then they sang in ringing chorus to the astonished officer, who could not escape, "Die Wacht am Rhein!" Those who recall the proud militarism of the words of this "Watch on the Rhine," will perceive the grim humor of the situation. An impressive feature reported by more than one witness was, that as the French drove their artillery and long lines of tanks through the streets, the people simply laughed; they sat on their door-steps or the curbstones and simply laughed them to scorn—the idea of sending those huge instruments of violence against a people who had no weapons and offered no resistance! When Fritz Thyssen, the principal capitalist captain of industry who was arrested by the French, was undergoing his trial by court-martial, an immense throng gathered about the court-house; the windows of the building were crowded with French soldiers, rifle in hand; soon the crowd began to shout at the soldiers, "Get away from the windows! Get back! Away! away! away!"

They kept up this cry for an hour or two. Finally, the troops, finding that no violence was intended, and no shots fired at them, gradually acceded to the crowd's wish and withdrew from the windows, thus removing the danger of exchange of shots. From such incidents as these we may gather something of the temper of the German people in the newly occupied area. They are said to cherish an intense resentment at the insult (as they would call it) of this slavery by occupation, and they exert in every possible way, psychological and vocal, their vehement protest against it; but they appear to have no intention of resisting it by physical violence.

As we left the district and drew near Cologne, which is only about twenty-five miles from Elberfeld, we saw the first French troops for ourselves—a carriage-load in their light blue uniforms looking rather insolent, as they stared across at us, and next to them a load of troops that puzzled us,—they were in rough khaki and looked like Chinamen with gross, bad faces; we later learned that they were no doubt troops from Cochin China in pay of the French. It was a pleasant contrast when a nice, clean-looking English soldier came through the train to see our passports as we entered the English occupied district of Cologne. Farther up the Rhine we observed one lone French horseman apparently patrolling the main road on the east bank of the Rhine beneath the famous castles, while opposite Coblenz we looked up and saw the bright gleam of the Stars and Stripes floating high over the walls of Castle Ehrenbreitstein, as our train sped beneath its cliff. That was the very day of the withdrawal of our troops from Germany.

We are now in Frankfurt on the borders of the Rhineland, and find that there is great agitation not only in the Ruhr district, but also in this older occupied area. Most hotels here have placards saying that Frenchmen and Belgians will not be received, and twice there have occurred in the last few days riotous demonstrations in front of one hotel around the corner from us because it was thought to have received Frenchmen, but I believe no damage was done. The great weapon for opposing the French is, of course, for workmen to strike; most of the railways in the occupied regions have now gone on strike. This made it awkward for us a few days ago, for we had an appointment to deliver addresses at the great watering-place Wiesbaden, twenty-five miles down the river Main on the Rhine, and of course within the occupied area; there were no trains, but we found an auto-bus, and so kept our engagement. As we drove along we came to a sign-board announcing entrance upon the area of occupation, but no sentinel or soldiers were there. In Wiesbaden, however, were more French soldiers than we had seen anywhere, as well as plenty of Moroccan troops in fez-caps, and even some officers with long, white cloaks like Arab chiefs. We went to the railway station to see how things were there, and found a French sentinel with fixed bayonet at the passenger entrance, and no one allowed to enter, while another sentinel with his long cruel bayonet was pacing up and down before the baggage entrances. A short way off sat an Oriental soldier in black-cap bound with a white Mohammedan turban upon his Arab pony. This appeared like a rather war-like situation, and small groups of people seemed to be zealously watching. But we also saw a long train of artillery—five or six small field-pieces or howitzers with carriages, caissons, etc., guarded by a company of very business-like French infantrymen—trundling heavily along the principal fashionable street, and no one seemed especially to notice them.

Townspersons told us that the inhabitants were taking things with a fair degree of patience, but it was feared they could not maintain this much longer—the strain was growing greater every day, and the people's nerves were getting more and more on edge; the greatest danger was that of a sudden passionate outbreak on this account, when overstrained nerves should give way. We can only pray that this may not occur, and work for the removal of such dangerous oppression; for the German people are beginning to see the might of passive resistance,—or perhaps more accurately, of active resistance without violence or weapons, and this might prove a valuable discovery for civilization.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

BOBBIE YANK.

KATRINE BLACKINTON, BLACKINTON, MASS.

Another outstanding quality of Bobbie's is his great love of playing to the gallery. Give him an appreciative audience and he is made. One day I sat down at my desk to write, glanced out of the window and saw Bob all tucked into the corner of the seed-tray of the Packard feeding-station on his favorite maple, obviously settled for a luxurious siesta after a large meal. As soon as his eye caught mine he gave himself a quick shake, assumed the defensive attitude of a man who has been caught napping, but won't own it, moved out into the center of the tray and made his bill fly in all directions like a person vigorously using a broom, scattering seeds to the winds. I rapped on the window and shook my finger at him, mentioning Herbert Hoover's name. He stopped an instant, then went at it again with all the recklessness of a drunken sailor on first shore-leave after a long voyage, and "a fig for your Hoover" in every motion of that active bill.

And now I have come to an interesting psychological fact about Bobbie. I have in my room a plaster Barye lioness standing out rather large and white against a mahogany bookcase. Bob has taken nuts from every piece of furniture and every object in the room except the lioness; he has never touched her, but on two occasions has taken nuts from her pedestal. I thought I would force the issue by putting a very large nut-meat (he is especially weak about large ones) in her jaw and not a fragment anywhere else in the room. That day I was putting a shining new coat of paint on our east-enclosed veranda, which we use as a breakfast room, when I heard the worst clatter—a perfect din—out on the east maple. It has the scolding note of the robin at his most excited moments, combined with the blatant quality of the flicker. I saw, to my amazement, that it was Bob, single throated, and the rating was unmistakably directed at me. At the moment I entirely forgot the lioness incident and went out in all sincerity to find what was wrong. As I approached he threw off his challenging attitude like a flash, dodging around the bark of the tree, assumed his most business-like grub-searching expression—"positively not a moment to spend in conversation." Not until I had resumed my paint-and-brush activity did the picture of the nut in the lioness' mouth come to me. So that was the cause of this outburst of unparliamentary speech hurled from the maple, and then it came to me that, sandwiched in between anathemas, I had detected something to this effect: "I'm not going to fly into the jaws of death for you or any other woman! My mother told me at a tender age to recognize that combination of lines as cat, than which bird has no worse enemy." Now if somebody who has studied bird psychology would explain this little quirk of Bobbie's, or at least advance a theory, I would be grateful. I held out about the nuts until the following day, when he came to meet me as I approached our front door after a marketing trip. He flew from the west maple, lighted on the top of the spindle of the lower blind nearest me, came down the spindle as he comes down the trunk of a tree, inverted, head up and his conversational "twitter" transformed into a genuine teasing tone! Could any one resist such an appeal? And now do you wonder that my window stands open in all kinds of weather, and that I cast aside such frills as curtains that blow and shades that flap, in order to receive every winter such a delightful guest?

A FRIENDS' TRACTOR SCHOOL.

On the edge of the busy market-place at Sorochinskoye, Russia, stands a low brick building painted yellow. At both ends it has big iron doors that clamp shut and are fastened with a huge iron lock. The dusty windows, too, have iron shutters. I am told that this was formerly a sciad (warehouse), where some prosperous wheat merchant of pre-war days stored his products, profitably purchased from the peasants of the district.

For a year this building has been used as a garage by the Friends' Relief Mission operating in the famine district of East Buzuluk—the only garage between Buzuluk town and Novo-Sergeevka, a distance of 150 miles on the Tashkent railroad.

I stop in the garage on a dull, grey, snowy day in early winter. In the outer room, cold and unheated, stand the Ford motors and trucks that serve the Quaker Mission even up until Christmas, scouting over the snow long after the peasants have begun to drive about in their saniis (sleds). The other room is heated by a stove that resembles a large rusty can. The smoke pipe makes a graceful exit through a hole above the door. The floor is black and oily—machines have been repaired here for over a year; the sides of the room are lined with work benches and shelves containing a few spare parts. In one corner there is a pail of oil and an empty barrel.

On one side of the room stands a partly torn down Fordson tractor, covered with chalk marks and arrows. On the other side is a blackboard, and in front of it two planks have been thrown over some soap boxes; on the planks sit the members of Parry Paul's Tractor School.

Last spring, when the Fordson tractors arrived in Sorochinskoye, and the steppe land west of the village was ready to be plowed for millet, Parry Paul, the chief of the Transport Department of the Friends' Mission, sent out a call for drivers. The very country-side responded. Experienced chauffeurs there were none in the district, or if there had been, they had died of hunger or moved away. But blacksmiths and carpenters and tinsmiths and eager young fellows who had worked in machine shops—plenty of these volunteered. Not one of them had ever seen a tractor. Not one of them but was dying to drive one. To them tractors represented the genius and culture of the fabled and overdriven America.

From the group of applicants Parry Paul picked ten or so, who looked as though they could steer a machine. He put them on the tractors, and in no time they were running them day and night, to be sure with some errors and smashes and bad handling, but they were learning day by day to solve the mysteries of the powerful little motor tugs that had been put into their hands.

The story of their achievements is too long to recite at this point—the 165 acres of land plowed for millet, the 700 acres turned for fall rye and next spring's wheat, the 52 tons of potatoes harvested from the land plowed for Children's Homes, and the remarkable influence on the peasants who saw these fast machines at work pulling plows or harrows or seeders or wagons full of hay or millet in the sack.

By the end of the summer the ten chauffeurs knew something about tractors. The practical experience in making the little iron insects work in the fields had given them a knowledge of gas engines and cylinders and crank shafts and valves that could not have been gained in any other way. But Parry Paul was not yet satisfied with the training he had given them; so he established the tractor school to systematize and make coherent the knowledge these men had gained in the fields.

So on this dull winter day to which I have referred, I find sitting on the planks in the garage ten chauffeurs—listening eagerly to an explanation of things that an expert should know about a Fordson tractor.

Parry Paul uses the question method of teaching. Clad in a black leather suit and a warm cap, he stands before his class, and fires question after question. The practical experience of the men comes out in almost every answer. They check each other up and explain and correct. And on a box beside them sits Gregory Yerebin, the transport messenger boy who has been with this department so long that he knows almost as much about motors as the chauffeurs—he laughs and his round cheeks glow with merriment when the others make a mistake and he happens to know the answer.

"Now if the electrical system is O. K., and the carburetor works, and the kerosene is in the tank, what may be wrong?" Paul asks, turning to Mitya Lukim, aged twenty-one, the smartest chauffeur in the class.

Mitya scratches his red head, and delivers the answer to Mucha, who passes it on to Paul, who in turn emits a satisfied "Pravda!" (Right!)

"And what else may be wrong?" he asks Leon Lukim, Mitya's older brother.

Leon has an answer just as right as his brother's. "Pravda!" says Paul, and so the lesson continues.

This is the Tractor School. Everyone on his toes to learn, some with note-books and pencils recording the new facts that are thrown up by the lesson. And all of them are lads who might have been dead had the Quakers not arrived with food in 1921.

This school on the market-place of Sorochinskoye will secure the success of the agricultural reconstruction plan of the Friends' Mission this year. Moreover it will help Russia in the way that she most needs help, as the darker shadows of the famine recede a little. It will help Russia technically in the upbuilding and improvement and modernization of her greatest industry, the cultivation of the soil.

FRIENDS' SERVICE NOTES.

UNDER the auspices of the Minnesota Russian Relief Committee, which is raising funds to be distributed by the Friends' Mission in Russia, Miriam West, one of the returned workers, recently addressed the Senate and the House of Minnesota on behalf of Russian relief.

THE following note accompanied a recent contribution to the service work:—

"I have arrived on January 15th and my parents are very happy about it, though I yell a great deal.

"I want to help a Russian baby, and so I send my first money birthday gift to you. I am very sorry it cannot be more. Very sincerely yours, Richard Wirth Taylor (one month old)."

Two of the Mission workers from the outpost at Hoduciszki, in the Vilna district, spent considerable time in First Month in investigating conditions in surrounding areas. In one nearby township they found that 900 families possessed only 300 horses, less than half of the number which they owned before the war. Less than one-third of the land is cultivated. The Mission plans a seed distribution for the district, and Mission horses will be lent for plowing if any of them can be freed from demands elsewhere. Blisinki is a typical village in this township. It consists of forty families, only five of them having yet been able to rebuild their houses.

FRANCIS FISHER KANE, the well-known Philadelphia lawyer, is to sail in the near future to join the Friends' Relief Mission in Austria. He will serve as joint secretary, heading up the American side of Friends' work in Vienna.

"THE family is typical of many that the Friends' Austrian Mission is helping," writes one of the workers from Vienna, Third Month 1, 1923. "The father worked on a Vienna newspaper before the war, and at that time they got along very well. At the outbreak of the war he had to go, and now he is a hopeless cripple. He is unable to work and receives from the state a weekly employment benefit of 72,000 kronen, which is barely enough to buy ten loaves of bread. His wife has sold everything that they can possibly do without. As I visited the family, the man lay in bed and his wife had taken his last suit of clothes to the pawn-shop. They had no sheets, no bed-covers. There are two children. Johann is sixteen years old and is doing his best to help support the family by working as an apprentice in a bank. The other child is a daughter. She is fourteen years old, though she scarcely appears to be ten. She has not gone to school for weeks because she has no shoes. She dreams of saving up enough money to go to America, 'the land of freedom,' where she could earn enough to provide for her parents and to return later and found a home for destitute children."

Shall not we who are at present enjoying the comparative plenty of the "land of freedom" do everything in our power to send help to the families that are now suffering so intensely abroad?

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

ESTHER MORTON SMITH of Germantown Meeting and at present Chairman of the Yearly Meeting's Inter-racial Committee, has recently been visiting in the Middle West in the interests of race relations.

On Second Month 16th she spoke before the Women's Federated Missionary Societies of Richmond and in the evening was the guest at a supper at the local Y. M. C. A., attended by representatives of both white and Negro races, to whom she spoke effectively. On the 18th, she spoke at South Eighth Street Meeting in the morning, and in the evening at another Friends' Meeting House in the city, the afternoon program including an address before the Negro forum. The next day she addressed the students of Earlham College.

MURRAY S. BARKER, known to many Philadelphia Friends as a former teacher at the Germantown Friends' School, has added to his many other important duties that of representing his home district in the Indiana Senate. Three Friends are members of that body and the speaker of the House of Representatives, Raymond Morgan, is also a Friend.

THE Nation has given space for some weeks past to representative papers by experts on several outstanding feature of each of the States of the Union. On First Month 10th there is an article entitled "Alabama: A Study in Ultra-Violet," by Clement Wood, a Friend. This is an article well worth reading, championing as it does the cause of the Negro in the South.

IN the series of States appearing in The Nation, Johan J. Smertenko, formerly a member of the faculty of Grinnell College, Iowa, has contributed the paper on Iowa. He entitles it—"Iowa: A Mortgage Eldorado." It is interesting to note that, of the three "products" which he finds to praise, were the Quakers whom he sees as "fine, deep, quiet backwaters," along with the Hollanders of Pella and the religious communists at Amama. He characterizes all three groups as "peaceful colonies."

HERBERT HOOVER'S son, Herbert, Jr., recently communicated by radio with amateurs in Switzerland, 5,000 miles away. He was stationed at the Bureau of Standards' experimental station in Washington, where he had built his own set. Now he is conducting further experiments with the same set while he is attending Leland Stanford University in California.

NOTICES.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING is due to begin with the Meeting of Ministers and Elders in the Meeting-house at Fourth and Arch Streets, Seventh-day, Third Month 24th, at ten o'clock. The second session of this Meeting may be held the afternoon of the same day or on Second-day afternoon the 26th. The exact time will be decided by the Meeting at its morning session.

There will be the usual meetings for worship on First-day morning, the 25th, and the General Yearly Meeting will convene in joint session in the west end of the Fourth and Arch Streets house at ten o'clock on Second-day.

The practice of last year of closing all doors at ten o'clock for a short period of devotional silence will be followed again this year. An urgent request is made that all will endeavor to be on time.

There will probably be two sessions on Third and Fourth-days. Some of these may be joint sessions.

The business for the various days may be after the following order:—Second-day—The reading of the Minutes of the Representative Meeting and the consideration of subjects brought up in said Minutes, the presentation of letters received by our Correspondent during the year and the disposal of these, at the present writing there are nineteen such communications.

The morning session of Third-day will be needed in part for the completion of this business—to be followed later in the day by the reports from the Quarterly Meetings, including the Query Answers. Fourth-day—Reports of Extension Committee, Visitation Committee, Social Order Committee and Peace Committee. Fifth-day—Westown Report and Educational Report. Sixth-day—Report of Indian Committee, Inter-racial Committee and other Committees not mentioned above.

The foregoing is of course only tentative. The evening meetings at Twelfth Street for the week we hope to publish next week, the schedule not being quite complete at the present writing.

FRIENDS from a distance who desire accommodations at the time of our approaching Yearly Meeting, should communicate with Wm. B. Harvey, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, who will be glad to render assistance.

MARGARET KENNEDY, of West Grove, will be in the Fourth Street Rest Room during the Business Sessions of the approaching Yearly Meeting. She will be glad to play with any children between the ages of three and ten years of age when they tire of Meeting.

A MEETING for children between the ages of ten and fourteen will be held in the East Room at Fourth and Arch Streets, on Fifth-day of Yearly Meeting week, Third Month 29, 1923, at 10.30 A. M.

ALL Young Friends between the ages of fifteen and thirty-five are invited to attend a meeting for worship to be held at Twelfth Street Meeting House on First-day, Third Month 25, 1923, at 3.45 P. M.

As we gather may it be with hearts eager to give and receive the very best. God is anxious to pour out on us of His blessing. We will be strengthened by the knowledge that our older Friends love us and are interested in this meeting, and we believe that they understand it is with no sense of alienation that we do not include them, but only with the desire that we may gain the strength which comes from bearing the responsibility ourselves.

NOTICE.

FRIENDS' TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION desires this special notice of a meeting to be held at No. 20 S. Twelfth Street on Third Month 26th, at 4.30 P. M., at which Roy A. Haynes, Prohibition Commissioner for the U. S., and Fred A. Hazeltine, of the Philadelphia District, are expected to speak. It is desired that Friends will attend and also bring with them business and other acquaintances to whom this may be an exceptional opportunity to learn more of the importance of the Eighteenth Amendment.

YOUNG MAN!

Get the Saving Habit. The way to begin is to fix things so that you MUST save.

We can show you how to do that, and at the same time how to perpetuate your income—or part of it—in case you die while you are saving.

We can show you how to insure against the uncertainties of life as well as the certainty of death.

The cost is reasonable too.

YEARLY MEETING TEAS.—For the purpose of extending hospitality and also for the convenience of those wishing to attend the evening sessions, during Yearly Meeting week, supper will be served at Twelfth Street Meeting House, on Second, Third and Fourth-day evenings and at the Arch Street House on Fifth-day evening. The expense thus incurred, in the past, has been met by a fund raised by private contributions.

As it has been difficult to reach by the appeal (which has been sent by mail) all those who would be interested to participate in this object, a general invitation is hereby extended to Friends to join in the sociability thus afforded and, also, to join in furthering the general purpose by sharing the expenses with those whose contributions have been much appreciated in past years. It would be gratifying to the Committee in charge to feel that supper guests, whenever possible, lend their support to the particular work represented by being in attendance at the evening meeting.

Contributions to the supper fund may be sent to J. Henry Scattergood, Treasurer, 355 Bourse Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

A FRIENDS' summer school at Haverford College is announced for the week from Sixth Month 18th to 25th, inclusive. Several groups of Friends are co-operating in the plans for this summer school. It is intended that the spirit of the school shall follow that of the All Friends' Conference three years ago in London, emphasizing those things on which Friends ought to send a clear message. Probably there will be two courses of lessons running throughout the week, one on a Biblical subject and the other devoted to an interpretation of certain phases of the Quaker message. The speakers are to include some Friends from the Five Years' Meeting and, it is hoped, one or two Friends from England, as well as a few Philadelphia Friends and a few distinguished outside speakers.

The groups co-operating in the arrangements include the Extension Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, Haverford College, Woolman School, and the Advancement Committee of the Race Street Yearly Meeting. The Executive Committee of the Five Years' Meeting has been invited to appoint representatives on the Committee of Arrangements. The members of this Committee already appointed include Jane W. Bartlett, William W. Confort, Susan J. Deewes, J. Passmore Elkinton, Walter W. Haviland, Rayner W. Kelsey, Mary J. Moon, Edward G. Rhoads, Elbert Russell and Wilbur K. Thomas.

Friends of all branches are invited to keep this week free from other engagements in order that they may attend the sessions of the summer school, of which more detailed announcements will be issued as the plans progress.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL extends a cordial invitation to all who may be interested to be present at a lecture by A. Neave Brayshaw at the School, Seventeenth Street and the Parkway, Sixth-day, Third Month 23rd, at one o'clock. Subject—"Ancient Manuscripts and the Printed Bible."

DIED.—Of pneumonia, Second Month 22, 1923, MARIA JACOB, daughter of Katharine and the late Joshua Jacob, in the forty-third year of her age; a member of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting of Friends for the Western District.

—, Third Month 6, 1923, LUCY BURTON CHILD, in her fifty-sixth year; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

—, Third Month 1, 1923, at her home in Moorestown, N. J., MARGARETTA THOMAS MICKLE, widow of Howard A. Mickle, in her eighty-fifth year; a member of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, N. J.

FOR RENT—At Jamestown, Rhode Island. Cottage directly on west shore waterfront. First Floor—Luzo oiled pine, living-room with stone fireplace, dining-room, kitchen, pantry, back porch and toilet, 1 double and 1 single servants' room. ### "SHUT IN."

Shut in, shut in from the ceaseless din
Of the restless world, and its want and sin;
Shut in from its turmoil, care and strife,
And all the wearisome round of life.

Shut in with tears that are spent in vain,
With the dull companionship of pain;
Shut in with the changeless days and hours,
And the bitter knowledge of failing powers.

Shut in with dreams of days gone by,
With buried joys that were born to die;
Shut in with hopes that have lost their zest,
And leave but a longing after rest.

Shut in with a trio of angels sweet:
Patience and Grace all pain to meet,
With Faith that can suffer and stand and wait,
And lean on the promises, strong and great.

Shut in with Christ! Oh, wonderful thought!
Shut in with the peace his sufferings brought;
Shut in with the love that yields the rod;
Oh, company blest! Shut in with God.

DREDGING CHANNELS.

Decade upon decade, century after century, rages the ancient, futile conflict of "faith" and "works." One of the most earnestly contested questions in the apostles' day (vide James and Paul passim), behold it, two thousand years later, dressed up in new terms and centering on fresh issues, as lively a contention as ever, its vitality wholly unimpaired by the long struggle of sixty generations, the ardent protagonists on one side or the other just as convinced, at heart, that only their way lies Truth.

The terminology is changed, of course. On the one side we hear how crying is the need for a renovated social order, and how (quite truly) impossible it is for us to expect people to be Christians, when they are ground down into the slime of the slums or into the bloody mud of the trenches by the greed of money-mad capitalists. If the six days in the working-week are twelve or fourteen hours long, is it any wonder that a desultory church service has no attraction? Read "Steel: the Diary of a Furnace Worker," by Charles R. Walker. No wheezy melodeon will ever remedy that sort of thing!

Then we "tune in" to the equally burning (and equally true!) contentions of the other side. What we lack today, they tell us, is the proper sort of "personal evangelism." Legislation and philanthropy, child-labor surveys and prohibition enforcement, even feeding Poles and Austrians, can never take the place of the "simple gospel" of Jesus—the good news of a personal, first-hand experience of God, of which Paul affirmed he was not ashamed, since it was the power of God Himself for the saving of mankind. Get right with God! Believe in His Son and be saved. Then go forth and preach Christ! Help save men and women for Him! Make Him so real as you uphold Him before the world, that He will, indeed, "draw all men" to Himself.

Now these contrasting viewpoints have two great things in common. Each side has truly caught the light reflected from one facet or another of that God-like personality whom we all call Master. Each side burningly realizes that Christianity implies a genuine concern for the welfare of others. Why cannot each side discover the truth that the other side holds? Must men ever continue "fools, and slow of heart to believe" anything outside the line of their own personal experience?

Rather, we need to go clear back to Clement of Alexandria with his memorable utterance on open-mindedness: Veritas a quocunque dicitur a Deo est (The truth, no matter by whom spoken, is of God.)

James rightly tells us that "faith without works is dead." But surely works without faith and insight are at least equally lifeless. With all our talk of "service," we need sometimes to stop long enough to ask ourselves if we really are in any adequate way prepared to serve? The Friends' Service Committee recently made known its need of a tractor expert for Russia. What they needed was a man of training and experience, who could and would keep their motor fleet in running order. No one else would do. With all the good-will in the world towards the starving peasantry of the steppes, any person without training in that special line would be as utterly superfluous in such a situation as a skating champion in the desert of Sahara.

We talk about "giving ourselves." But have we any real "self" to give? Some of us may discover we have so little to offer that we might as well be a benevolent philanthropist, endowing hospitals with Russian roubles. The only way that we can be of service is to have something to give. The more of a Person we can become, the more truly we can serve. This self-culture is not mere selfish ambition. It is far removed from Goethe's aim, as acknowledged in his letter to Lavater: "The desire to raise the pyramid of my existence, the base of which is laid already, as high as possible into the air absorbs every other desire, and scarcely ever quits me." This was a noble ambition, but after all, only an ambition.

Compare that with Christ's utterance: "For their sakes, I sanctify myself" (John xvii: 19), which, in six words, reconciles better than it has ever been done the two contrasting ideas and shows how they are to be combined and kept in balance. Dr. Fosdick writes in this connection ("Manhood of the Master," page 168):

"He fed Himself on the best reading of His time, the prophets of the Old Testament, and He sought spiritual insight into the beauty and significance of nature, that He Himself might have a richer life with which to serve the world; He purified His spirit in prayer, like water running through the sun, that He might be of largest serviceableness to His followers. He saw that His friends, that the world, needed Him at His best, and that therefore self-realization and service are two sides of the same thing."

Often the figure is employed of dedicated Christians being "channels" for God's will to flow through. Perhaps by now the reason for the choice of title for this article is less obscure. Channels do need dredging. "For their sakes" we, too, must sanctify ourselves—training, disciplining, learning, "studying to show ourselves approved unto God, workmen that need not to be ashamed." (2 Timothy ii: 15).

Where the "water of life" is described, it is flowing. It is sometimes spoken of as a spring, sometimes as a river, but it flows. If we are channels or cisterns, it is for the water to pass through. We must keep both intake and outlet open for the free course of this water of life. If our intake becomes clogged, what water we have will soon run out, leaving us dry and empty. And if we permit our outlet to become obstructed, no fresh water can flow in, however much attention we may give to keeping the intake free. The water of life can no longer flow; it becomes stagnant, breeding unwholesomeness. Our noblest impulses have no expression. We may be hearers of the word, we can never be doers.

Take time for channel dredging.

Some Notes on the Life of John E. Carter.

John E. Carter died Twelfth Month 1, 1922, in his eighty-first year, in Germantown, Philadelphia, where he had lived more than fifty-one years. In personality and character he combined unusual qualities of physical and mental vigor, strength and simplicity, independence of judgment and broad charity for the views of others, clearness of intellectual vision and reverence for the truth, gentleness, penetration, humor, practical knowledge based on accurate study and wide experience combined with sympathy and a constant, active desire to be of service to others,—a man of keen sensibilities and deep feeling who had himself under such control that those nearest to him rarely saw his calm ruffled.

This glimpse of his life and service among us is offered to his many friends and to others who may be helped by it. There is no need of eulogy, and certainly he would neither wish nor approve it. His real memorial is in the hearts of those who knew and loved him.

John E. Carter was born in Philadelphia, Second Month 25, 1838, the third of the ten children of John and Sarah Shoemaker Carter. He was a high-spirited, headstrong, determined boy with strong prejudices. When he was about twenty years old a great change came over his whole character on the death of his mother to whom he was deeply attached.

As a tiny boy he began school when he could do nothing but sit on a bench. Later he was a pupil two summers in the school of Hannah Williams near Plymouth Meeting, but most of his schooling was obtained at Friends' Select School, Philadelphia, which he left at the age of about fifteen. His summers were spent wholesomely working on the farm with his cousins at the homes of uncles and aunts at Hatboro or West Grove.

After leaving school he was apprenticed for four years at $50.00 per year to Charles Ellis, a well-known wholesale and retail druggist of that time. Simultaneously he attended the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy, from which he graduated in 1858, at the age of twenty.

Although he was attracted to the study of medicine and continued to read the London Lancet with more or less regularity throughout his life, he entered the employment of the firm of Carter & Scattergood, manufacturing chemists, and shortly afterwards became a member of the firm.

The following account is taken from notes submitted by Charles Evans, a nephew of John E. Carter, and a member of the firm from 1900 to 1911:

"The business of Carter & Scattergood, though almost uniformly profitable for a long period of years, was conducted in a most modest office and in an unattractive quarter. One's first impression in a call at Twenty-fourth and Bainbridge Streets would be, I think, the extreme simplicity of the surroundings which my uncle deemed sufficient for his office comfort. Visitors were really often scarcely convinced that they had penetrated into the actual working office, so meagre were the accommodations. Bare desks, a few cheap chairs, a letter press, a closet, the beam of platform scales for weighing the horse-drawn wagons, a coal stove, no pictures or chemical exhibit, no window screens and no clerk or stenographer, such was the interior of a room, about ten by fifteen feet, which served for counting-room and chemical laboratory for many years, and in which researches were carried out, some of which were of more than ordinary importance. The chemical scales and working bench would have been considered infra dig by any college freshman.

"A very old type of safe held the books and some records; all the cash used for pay-roll and petty expenses was kept for twenty years in a crockery saucer which accompanied a cat arriving in a box from the country. Of course, with the advent of younger partners the march toward luxury began, but for many, many years the quarters above described answered the requirements at a ludicrously small expense.

"If there was simplicity there was also neatness. Desks never accumulated papers, drawers and closets contained few, if any, odds and ends. The atmosphere of the office was one of quiet industry and complete order. The business of the day was attacked and dispatched; then often, if there was an interval of spare time, a round of the works was made, nothing apparently escaping his eye, and after that it was my uncle's custom on the backs of envelopes saved from the paper basket to draw elaborate geometrical figures, or to solve by algebra the binomial theorem or some similar mental exercise.

"My uncle did not spend much time in my period at the Laboratory, as it was always called, among the workmen. He knew and recognized them, but beyond a pleasant greeting had but little to say. Some of them, I know, consulted him in business matters. His name was always mentioned among them with the greatest respect. Nearly all of the men in the earliest days were Welsh and spoke Welsh among themselves, giving much secrecy thereby to some of the technique, but in my time most of them, nearly all, were Scotch-Irish, of great physical strength and all the qualities of that sturdy stock.

"All of my uncle's competitors operated seven days per week. The Carter & Scattergood plant never operated on

First-day, though this was a distinct disadvantage to the brick settings of the furnaces. Holidays were not observed, and six days in the week the furnaces ran twenty-four hours.

"The strictest type of justice was the only rule for business practice. Any project or plan which could not immediately be made to square with the golden rule was promptly dismissed. There was no attempt made to operate in a twilight zone of expediency.

"John E. Carter was in his business hours, as elsewhere, a great teacher. Visualizing the elements of a situation with the greatest clearness, he had the faculty, as well, of presenting any matter in a form of great simplicity, stripped of externals and available to minds of lesser calibre. This faculty was well recognized among his business friends and in conferences he was frequently asked to sum conclusions and prepare statements.

"Very many hours he spent patiently with his younger partners and assistants clearing up for them half-worked out problems, in mechanics, in chemistry or in life itself. He had a keen eye for a fallacy, but would suggest its presence in such a manner as to 'save the face' of the inquirer.

"Righteousness, charity, order, justice, diligence,—these with patience and keen analysis are qualities which I shall forever associate with him, and these with the most wholesome zest for a humorous situation, endeared him to all who knew him well."

As a comparatively young man he was left with little motherless children, and in the words of one of his daughters he "became father and mother both. His rule was just and firm, tender and loving, and aroused the wish to do as he desired. He entered into our plays and interests and directed our reading, and made our friends also very happy."

In early middle age the shadow of a great loss again fell across his life and made him feel that he was called into a very narrow path, from which beauty was excluded. From this condition he recovered in time, and while always strict with himself, he had wide charity for others.

His intellectual interests were chiefly scientific and he took keen enjoyment from the beauties of nature. For years he used the microscope, doing exquisite work in preparing and mounting specimens. His reading, however, was wide and varied, and education to him was a life-long process. Apart from science he was much interested in history, biography, church history, poetry and general literature. He regularly subscribed for and read a number of scientific journals, and throughout his life kept in touch with the progress of scientific thought.

At the same time he knew the history and literature of the Society of Friends and through "reverent reading of the Holy Scriptures," he had an intimate and accurate knowledge of the Bible. It is of especial interest to his friends to know that he had in the course of his study and reading, reached a point where science and religion were not in conflict, but in such harmony that his faith was not disturbed by the agitations and controversies of those who see but a part of the manifold unity of truth.

In his daily routine in business and at home he was prompt, exact, methodical and efficient. He never allowed back work to accumulate and thus secured a large degree of leisure.

He traveled but little, visiting Europe once in 1870, just before the establishment of his home in Germantown in 1871. Subsequently he visited Florida once and made one trip through the Great Lakes and to the Mississippi. He was happiest in his own home with its pleasant verandahs and ample yard, and there his friends and neighbors love to remember him quietly reading in the summer, or walking observantly among the shrubbery often with pruning shears in hand.

He was actively engaged in work on various boards and committees, especially those connected with the Society of Friends, and at one time in his young manhood acted as secretary for a large number of concerns at the same time. The Freedmen and the Institute for Colored Youth were important interests to him. He served on the Westtown Committee for many years and was a valued member of the Meeting for Sufferings. While still in physical health and vigor and before there was any failure of power, he retired from all these activities, acting on the principle that vacancies should be made for younger men. His withdrawal was a matter of regret to many of his friends who greatly valued his wisdom, insight and ability in harmonizing difficult situations and advancing important business.

Diligent and prosperous in his undertakings and simple in his personal tastes and expenditures, he was a man of great generosity and liberality. He gave freely and cheerfully to causes that appealed to him, and in tactful and unobtrusive ways was often able to help individuals in time of need. It became a common experience of persons who visited him to ask financial aid, that John E. Carter made them feel they were conferring a benefit by giving him an opportunity to help the work they represented.

His own meeting claimed his deep interest, in it he held many positions of trust. As an Overseer he labored faithfully. People of all kinds consulted him in matters of great delicacy, since he was one whose judgment was good, and yet who did not urge his opinions. He was recorded an elder in 1878. He traveled occasionally with Friends in religious service.

But his field of labor was largely at home. He was no stranger to the sorrows and conflicts of this life, but as an earnest Christian he kept the faith, and was enabled to be of good cheer to his own family and his friends. While he did not speak much of spiritual things he moved among us as one who walked with God.

The close of his earthly life came after a few days of illness, with no clouding of the fine, clear mind, no period of physical wasting and weariness, no impairment of his well-ordered activities and interests. When the end was near, and he was but little conscious of what was going on around him, he was heard murmuring, "Create in me a clean heart, Oh God, and renew a right spirit within me." His relations and friends are assured that with this prayer he passed into life that is life indeed.

EPISTLE OF SKIPTON GENERAL MEETING.

HELD ON THE TWENTY-FIFTH OF SECOND MONTH, 1660.

[Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin, in one of his impressive addresses in Philadelphia a few weeks ago, referred to the Skipton General Epistle as one of many illustrations that the Friends of the seventeenth century were a most remarkable missionary band. The Epistle in full has been handed us by a Friend and we gladly give it place.—EDS.]

DEAR FRIENDS AND BRETHREN:—

We having certain information from some Friends of London of the great work and service of the Lord beyond the seas, in several parts and regions, as Germany, America, Virginia and many other places, as Florence, Mantua, Palatine, Tuscany, Italy, Rome, Turkey, Jerusalem, France, Geneva, Norway, Barbadoes, Bermuda, Antigua, Jamaica, Surinam, Newfoundland; through all which Friends have passed in the service of the Lord, and divers other places, countries, islands, and nations; and over and among many nations of the Indians, in which they have had service for the Lord, who through great travail have published His name and declared the everlasting gospel of peace unto them that have been afar off, that they might be brought nigh unto God, and be partakers also of the same common salvation, through the riches of his love and grace which have abounded unto usward, that we might show forth his goodness, and faithfulness, and salvation unto the ends of the earth; and for this end and purpose that the Lord moved many to deny their country, and to leave their families and estates, that they might fulfil the will of the invisible God; which hath been effected and done by divers who have been moved thereunto, whereby the Truth hath been published, and the work of God greatly prospered in many parts, places, countries, nations and islands, which, in the hearts of many, is a sweet savour, which causes the faithful to rejoice. . . . So, if any be moved to the contributing and for helping them beyond seas, cheerfully do it, and every one to the ministry yourselves, which is (unto) the seed Christ; for England is as a family of prophets, which must spread over all nations, as a garden of plants, and the place where the pearl is found which must enrich all nations with the heavenly treasure, out of which shall the waters of life flow, and water all the thirsty ground, and out of which nation and dominion must go the spiritually weaponed and armed men, to fight and conquer all nations, and bring them to the nation of God, that the Lord may be known to be the living God of nations, and his Son to reign, and his people (to be) one.

REPORT OF THE MISSIONARY COMMITTEE TO THE YEARLY MEETING.

The Committee, appointed a year ago to consider ways of co-ordinating the missionary interests of our Yearly Meeting under a central body, has met a number of times, and has very carefully gone over means of organization.

We rejoice in the outreach of the members of this Meeting to the utmost parts of the earth in their desire to carry the light of the love of Christ to dark places.

The work in Japan, which has so faithfully been carried on by the F. M. A., must be the first interest of the new Board. The educational work of the girls' school, the international work which our Friends are doing there and elsewhere, and the gospel work of all members of the Mission, deserve our co-operation and support. The young Yearly Meeting in Japan looks to us especially, and we can not but feel a close tie with it.

While our Meeting is more responsible for this field than any other, the new Board should not confine its interests to any one field alone. We are thankful that our Yearly Meeting is feeling the impulse to minister to the needs of the world for Christ's Gospel, and that an increasing number of our members are actively responding to the opportunities of spreading His Kingdom at home and abroad. We desire that the New Board may help to bind these workers together, giving them the strength of fellowship with the great body of our Yearly Meeting at home.

We would submit the following as a plan of organization:

PROPOSED ORGANIZATION OF FRIENDS' MISSIONARY BOARD OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

We wish to state as fundamental, our conviction that Christianity is a universal and an essentially missionary religion, and that in so far as Quakerism realizes its early designation, as "primitive Christianity revived," it, too, will be driven by its world vision to the ends of the earth.

Realizing the need for better co-ordination of the various missionary activities of the members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, we would offer the following plan for consideration:

Executive Board.—The Yearly Meeting shall appoint fifteen persons for a term of three years to constitute an Executive Board. When organized, the Board may add to its membership, if the need warrants it.

It shall constitute an Executive Committee of the General Board and shall have charge of the various questions of an administrative nature which arise between the sessions of the General Board.

It shall, after careful study, prepare annually a budget for submission to the General Board for its approval.

It shall supervise the raising of funds with the aid of the General and Local Boards.

It shall each year prepare and submit for the approval of the General Board a draft of report to be forwarded to the Yearly Meeting, covering the missionary activities of the preceding year, and such other things as they think should be brought to the attention of the Yearly Meeting.

General Board.—The General Board shall consist of the members of the Executive Board and at least two additional members, to be appointed by each Monthly Meeting. A Monthly Meeting may also appoint one additional representative to the General Board for each hundred or fraction thereof by which its membership exceeds two hundred. (At present this will produce a membership of ninety.)

It shall endeavor to foster missionary interest throughout the Yearly Meeting and shall present the needs of various fields before our membership generally.

It shall consider and decide on all questions of general missionary policy.

It shall, upon nomination of the Executive Board, make all appointments of workers.

Local Boards.—A Local Board shall consist of the members of the General Board belonging to a Monthly Meeting and such additional members as may be appointed by the Monthly Meeting to compose it.

It shall represent the Executive and General Boards within the limits of a Monthly Meeting.

It shall co-operate with the superior Boards in arousing and stimulating interest throughout the membership of the Monthly Meeting in the missionary activities of the Yearly Meeting.

For the Committee,

WM. B. HARVEY,
Chairman.

N. B.—In order that there may be no confusion in transferring the responsibility from the old Board to the New, we suggest that the Executive Committee of fifteen members appointed by the Yearly Meeting be incorporated with the present F. M. A. Executive until reports can be received from the different Monthly Meetings and the new General Board organized.

Glimpses of Iowa and Iowa Yearly Meeting.

Leaving Iowa City at 8:30 A. M. in a "mixed train," (i. e., freight and passenger,) via one of the many spurs of the great Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific System, a leisurely ride of sixty-one miles leading by sundry junctions, and consuming four hours of the sunny day, restful and unique in many particulars, we are cheered by the station call: "What Cheer!" Here our kind friend Albert Emmons and daughter Sara await us with their car, to whisk us to their home to dine and further enjoy their engaging hospitality by accompanying them to the meeting appointed for us at Coal Creek in the early afternoon. Our feelings are again stirred with deep interest as we behold for the first what was once the home neighborhood and house of worship of several of our acquaintances, some living, others gone to their final home. Coal Creek is suggestive of the coal which here outcrops and has been mined in considerable quantities. Three-fourths of the State are said to be underminded with coal. The neighborhood is physically monotonous and uninviting; the meeting-house uninspiring as to structure and location; but when we were told that at one time it was not unusual for as many as three hundred and fifty to assemble here of a First-day morning in worship our interest was intensified. If the place spoke rather of the past than present, it was the present that controlled our feeling. Dear, kindly hearts were there to welcome the stranger—men, women and children seeking the uplift of the Gospel message—the inspiration from something coming afresh from beyond themselves, to lift head and heart above the daily care, affliction and soul hunger. Well says a writer: "What the world needs for its noblest, purest, grandest life is inspiration." The same writer tells us in a wonderful chapter on "Christ and the Country Church," how Christ is needed to lift the soul with visions of eternal peace and beauty. Comradeship with the Master is needed to arouse all that is true and noble in the heart of man.*

The name, What Cheer, is said to have been derived from an Indian name having its English equivalent, What's here? The message that came very freely in Gospel love to the meeting seemed to circulate about both these expressions, so suggestive and intimate with the daily interrogatories of life. While the sun shone outward, the spirit of tenderness visited hearts within. Is it too much to say, that had we choice to be anywhere in the world in those moments it would have been just there?

Being committed to the kindly care of Wilson T. Emmons and wife, after meeting, several calls were made in the immediate vicinity. First to the family and bedside of one who until recently had been a stirring business man, but now stricken when a little beyond the prime of life, and apparently nearing the end of life's journey, which since we have learned has been reached. Of other calls that afternoon, memory lingers on that to the two Sisters W—, within whose cheery cottage we noted how one is endowed with striking artistic gift, as manifested, among other samples, by a large collection of Iowa's flowers done in water color, and exhibiting plant, flower and fruit in a distinctive manner. The collection would possess high value for amateur class work in botany, say in a city school where the living specimens were not readily obtainable. Here love of nature, "leading up to Nature's God," was helping to disperse the shadows cast by invalidism and the shadows of remoteness from the activities of life, by sending forth to gladden others the summer sunshine, air and rain caught in the flower. Needless to say, it was with high appreciation of the favor, that on request to choose a gift the selection fell on Iowa's State flower, the beautiful wild rose (Rosa carolina—L.)

The close of the day, so crowded with incident and incentives to love of the brethren, found us gratefully settled within the home of our host and hostess—the Emmons, where amid the appealing interests of farm life,—father, mother, children, cows, horses, pigs and fowl, fruitage of apples, pumpkins, corn and hay, we were led back to boyhood days whose sweet significance has ever palliated the embattled cares of after life.

In response to arrangements effected by our kindly hosts, opportunity was given their visitors to meet again in evening social converse a large number of the Coal Creek Friends, and in this way an excellent opportunity was afforded of bringing those who had not been to Yearly Meeting into closer touch with the real significance of the message sent out by Philadelphia Friends.

Early the following morning a seat was afforded in the auto of two neighbors having a business trip to Grinnell. This place was reached near noon, after an interesting ride of thirty miles through pleasing farming country, whose main features were interpreted by our companions in travel. Many will recall that Grinnell is the seat of a college of that name, upon whose faculty are two names known to Philadelphia Friends—Dr. Steiner, by his book and lectures on sociology, and Professor Henry S. Conard, by his family connections and scholarly attainments in the field of natural science, notably botany. Upon being set down in this beautiful seat of learning, on that well-remembered day of autumnal loveliness, we readily fell captive to the charm of the college buildings set upon wide avenues bordered by trees and shrubbery, the campus, and athletic field—the latter ringing with the shouts of rivalry in a closely contested foot ball match between Iowa Agricultural College, located at Ames, and the home team. Henry Conard was not at home, being away for the day on a botanical trip. This information, given by the wife at their cosy home, was accompanied with a gracious invitation to tarry for luncheon, which being accepted gave opportunity for a friendly chat about Friends in general, and Grinnell in particular.

INTERLOCKING COMMITTEES.

The time for Yearly Meeting draws near and we shall soon be listening to reports from our various Committees. The work of these Committees covers a wide field, but it is interesting to think how closely related and interdependent this work is. Consider, for instance, those Committees that have at heart the missionary and extension work of the Yearly Meeting. Their efforts are intimately bound up with the work of the Peace Committee, the Social Order Committee and the Committee on Race Relations. They are working to bring the Kingdom of God into the hearts and lives of men, and without fundamental work of this kind there can be no international peace, no Christian social order, no satisfactory race relations. Our missionaries work for international understanding, better social conditions, and better race relations. On the other hand, everything that helps to solve the knotty problem of race relationships helps the missionary, and, as Fosdick says, "the whole program of foreign missions is inextricably tied up with the present economic and international situation in Christendom, and our evil deeds often speak louder than any words our missionaries can say. . . . Until we can make brotherhood work in industry and international relations we leave a great barrier across the path of all the heralds of the Cross."

Again take the Peace Committee. One can easily see how closely its work is connected with the work of the Committee on Race Relations, and the work of both is inextricably tied up with the efforts of the Social Order Committee. There can be no Christian social order as long as racial discrimination and industrial and international strife shadow our land. It is being widely recognized also that these evils spring from economic as well as other causes, and that the spirit of service must replace the spirit of greed if they are to be abolished. Our English Friends suggest that—"Industry for service, developed throughout the world, will ultimately destroy the roots of war and render armaments absolutely meaningless in face of the rising spirit of human comradeship."

ANNA COPE EVANS.

THE HEROIC AGE.

He speaks not well who doth his time deplore,
Naming it new and little and obscure,
Ignoble and unfit for lofty deeds.
All times were modern in the time of them,
And this no more than others. Do thy part
Here in the living day as did the great,
Who made old days immortal! So shall men,
Gazing long back to this far-looming hour,
Say: "Then the time when men were truly men;
Though wars were less, their spirits met the test
Of new conditions; conquering civic wrong;
Saving the state anew by virtuous lives;
Guarding the country's honor as their own,
And their own as their country's and their sons';
Defying leaguéd fraud with single truth;
Not fearing loss, and daring to be pure,
When error through the land raged like a pest,
They calmed the madness caught from mind to mind
By wisdom drawn from ead, and counsel sane;
And as the martyrs of the ancient world
Gave Death for man, so nobly gave their Life:
Those the great days, and that the heroic age."

MAUDE ROBINSON.

[We feel under special obligation to M. R. that she has asked us to publish through THE FRIEND her latest "Quaker Tale," we trust it may be the beginning of a third volume, which like "Nicholas, the Weaver" and the "Time of Her Life" have won a place for themselves with so many of our little people. Her letter addressed to the Editors is as follows.—Eds.]

SADDLES COMBE, Hassocks, Sussex,
Second Month 20, 1923.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE FRIEND, PHILADELPHIA:—

Dear Friends,—I have just finished the enclosed story of the sufferings of early Friends in Sussex, and think perhaps you may like to have it for your young peoples' page.

I have lived all my sixty-four years on a farm on the South Down Hills, and until a few years ago my brothers employed great black oxen for ploughing and other farm work. They gave them up because they were too clumsy a team to draw that blessed invention, the self-binding reaper.

It struck me that very few know, as I do, about using oxen—certainly not in England—and it might be of interest if I wrote it in with the sufferings of my very great grandfather, William Garton. Bonwick's Place is some twenty miles away. We motored lately to see it, but a new house has been built, and little trace of the old is left except a fine oak staircase.

I am sending the tale also to The Friends' Quarterly Examiner, but the readers who see both are so very few that it will be no disadvantage.

Your sincere friend,
MAUDE ROBINSON.

(In an ancient "Book of Sufferings" which is preserved in the safe at Dorking, there is the entry in faded ink:—"Taken from William Garton of Ifield one payer of oxon worth £14, for a tyth of £7, nothing returned." From this and a retort of an ancestress to a hiring priest, which is a tradition in our family, I have woven the following tale. All the characters are real people.)

"Sister! Sister Sue!" shouted a sturdy country boy, bursting into the great farm-house kitchen, "Blacksmith Miles wants a piece of fat pork for a pincushion."

"Oh! is it the day for bullock shoeing?" asked a comely young woman, looking up from the immense mass of bread dough which she was helping a stout maid-servant to knead in a wooden trough, with her capable hands and arms white with flour.

"Yes, and father says I may sit on their necks to-day!" said the boy.

"Do not hinder thy sister, Dickie," said the mother, coming in from the dairy; "is it pork thou wants? I will soon get it if thou wilt light a rush."

The boy selected a greased rush or "fried straw" as they were called in Sussex, from a long tin box on the dresser, lighted it at the fire and preceded his mother down the cellar stairs. In a dark corner she lifted the lid from a huge wooden tub and fished up from the dark pickle a large block of pinky-white pork, three inches of solid fat, yet such food as was much relished by hearty farm folk in cold weather.

"Cut a good square, mother," said Dickie; "Blacksmith said I may stick the nails in."

"It seems a pity to waste such good meat!"

"Oh, old Jowler will gobble it up when we have done with it!" and away ran the boy with his prize.

His elder brother, Josiah, came in as he went out.

"There will be three extra to dinner to-day, sister. We are going to make a day of it with the shoeing. Thomas Robinson has brought his three pairs from Larkins, and young Benedict Martin has his four here. He says no one can shoe bullocks like Friend Miles."

Susanna's face took a deeper pink as she bent over her dough. "Surely Benedict has not come all the way from Shipley this morning," she said.

"Oh no! He spent last night at Hunts Green. He brought over six sacks of seed wheat for his father. Had'st thou not heard that they who call themselves churchwards at Charlwood had cleared out the old man's granary for tithes? He had not a grain left to sow this autumn. Luckily Ben had not disposed of all his, so he brought some over yesterday."

"Oh, these miserable tithes, what trouble they make! Parson Hallywell has not claimed his yet, but he will. Didst thou hear what he asked mother yesterday?"

"No, I did not know they had met."

"She was coming up the path from Widow Steere's. The parson was standing by the graveyard gate, and pointing behind him, said to her, 'What call you that, Mistress Garton? He knows we Friends will not call a building a church, and his field house has no steeple, so if she had said 'Steeple-house' he could have mocked. But mother just said quietly, 'I call it the place where thou sellest thy wares and makes those pay who don't have them.' The parson just turned on his heel and went off without a word."

Josiah laughed heartily. "Yes, we do pay and very dearly, too. Father has been expecting a visit from Hen Hallywell and his men. I only hope he won't take a fancy for the young bullocks which I have been training."

"Oh, are thy pets to be shod to-day?"

"Yes, but they won't be any trouble. Father says he never saw young ones so handy and docile as Peart and Lively are. They are good-looking, too—such a perfect match, with the stars on their foreheads and not another white hair about them—but they will be wanting me in the plat."

"There is no difficulty about dinner, brother. One of mother's fine duck puddings is in the pot now and the bread oven is ready for some extra apple turnovers."

"That will be a treat for Ben after his old Betty's rough cooking," said Josiah as he went out.

The Secretariat of the League of Nations.

GENEVA, First Month 31, 1923.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE FRIEND:—

Dear Friends:—In reading THE FRIEND of Eleventh Month 30th, I found that you had kindly given place to a letter of mine regarding the League of Nations; but I felt surprised at the Editor's note of introduction. Inazo Nitobe is not "Secretary to the Japanese delegation," but an Under-Secretary-General of the Secretariat of the League of Nations—a difference I shall try to make clear not from personal motives, but because I think I detect a mistaken conception concerning the organization of the Secretariat itself.

I have been slow in realizing that in the minds of many the Secretariat is composed of a number of independent delegations, each working for national interests. There are in Geneva delegations from a few countries which are members of the League of Nations. They act as liaison groups between their own governments and the League. Because of the great distance between Tokyo and Geneva, Japan has, for instance, a small delegation attached to the International Labor Bureau. It would be impossible to send expert advisers (and every country must have such) back and forth over the long routes, to attend all the international Conferences on the various activities of the League.

[In the issue of THE FRIEND for last Eleventh Month 30th a serious error escaped our notice making in itself a meaningless passage. We congratulate ourselves, however, that the real interest of the paragraph was made so plain by what went before and by that which followed, that the error escaped notice on the part of most who read the interesting and informing paper. We also should state that our informant was at fault when he told us that "Inazo Nitobe was Secretary of the Japanese delegation to the League of Nations at Geneva." The error has worked to our advantage for it has brought to our table a further communication from Mary P. E. Nitobe, which we are glad to share with our readers and which, we fancy, will bring enlightenment to many of us.—Eds.]

But when one enters the Secretariat of the League of Nations one must cut off all official connection with one's own country. One is not appointee or representative of his own government, but in international civil service. In other words, he must become a world citizen during the term of his office and is even deterred from receiving honors from his own country, except for services rendered prior to his appointment to the Secretariat. If the above applies to the staff of the Secretariat in general, most especially must it apply to its higher officials—the Secretary-General, the Deputy and Under Secretaries-General and the Directors of Sections.

Now the delegates to the Assembly, which is really international parliament, do of course represent their respective governments and come with state interests to present. In the decision of many questions they have plenipotentiary power. Other questions—such as conventions requiring ratification—are referred to the said governments for ultimate determination as regards signature.

For instance—though a majority of votes was cast in the Assembly for the resolution against Traffic in Opium and against Traffic in Women and Children, fifty-one states in the former and thirty-three in the latter case, have actually signed the conventions agreed upon. Naturally there is unremitting effort made by the commissions dedicated to these moral questions to get all governments to become signatories. I cite this, however, to show that the individual sovereign powers of the States—members of the League of Nations—are not infringed upon and no state has its independence curtailed by the decisions of the Assembly.

Naturally the delegates, when they vote for any resolution, morally commit their governments to put into execution that particular resolution; but even here each government chooses its own time and its own method in doing so. I may say that abstention from voting is considered as equivalent to absence.

As is well known and often criticized, the Assembly does not represent the peoples, but the governments. In other words, the delegates to the Assembly are appointed by their governments and not by any popular body. This explains why so many of the delegates are Ministers of State or ambassadors. I am well aware of the criticism that the Assembly is not sufficiently democratic. On the other hand, there is this great advantage, that, as the delegates are persons holding government posts, the debates impose upon the speakers responsibility of action on the part of their governments.

Thus the Assembly is the parliament of governments—at present of fifty-two governments. The mention of "parliament" may naturally elicit the query—does it consist of one House or is it bi-cameral, and some have thought that the Council of the League of Nations, comprising as it does representatives of ten countries, may correspond to an Upper House; but from the character of its work, which consists in large measure of finding ways and means of putting into execution the resolutions of the Assembly, it does not impress one as a legislative body. It meets every three or four months, and any one attending an open session and hearing the administrative business it conducts would be struck with its resemblance to a cabinet rather than to a Senate. At any rate it is futile to draw comparisons between the existing political organs of any nation with those of the League.

There have been in the history of internationalism, various attempts at organizations similar to the League of Nations—their most prominent feature being periodic conferences. You may remember with what minuteness William Penn worked out his scheme; but few, if any, suggested the establishment of a permanent organ which should function in the intervals between successive conferences and thus secure continuity, and such an organ is the Secretariat of the League of Nations.

It is important that the Secretariat should be removed from the preponderating influence of any one or two nations. The Secretary-General makes the appointments, with the sanction of the Council, and here I return to the particular point with which I started—namely, the fact that the Secretariat of the League of Nations is not composed of groups of delegates from the various countries which have become members of the League, but is a body of men and women (there happen at present to be about 360, belonging to about thirty-two different nationalities) working together with amazing harmony for one great International Cause, which they believe to be the potential hope of the world.

As its name indicates, the Secretariat is an office or bureau. It is attached to the Council, in order to do the actual work (much of it naturally routine) necessary to carry out the resolutions of the Assembly under the direction of the Council, and to prepare the agenda for both these bodies. It is incumbent upon the Secretary-General to be present at the meetings of both Council and Assembly. He takes his seat at the left of the President of either body and is there in an advisory capacity to this officer. If he leaves his chair it is occupied by one of the Under Secretaries-General, but neither he nor they take an active part in debates.

May I stress again the peculiar importance of the organization of the Secretariat as being the first attempt of the kind on any large scale. Although, if I am correctly informed, there are over thirty international bureaus which have been established by treaties, even the International Postal Union, of greatest significance among them, has a staff of only about ten people—nearly all of them Swiss—as the headquarters of the Union are at Berne.

With sincere regards,

MARY P. E. NITBOE.

BOOK REVIEW.

"MENNONITES IN THE WORLD WAR."

This volume of less than two hundred and fifty pages differs from Rufus M. Jones's "Service of Love in War Time," in that the Mennonite book deals more with the experiences of the young draftees and the tribulations of their fathers at home, and less with the relief work done by the C. O.'s.

After a short reference to earlier non-resisters it gives the establishment of the Mennonite Church in 1525 by Menno Simons of the Netherlands, showing how his followers suffered in the wars of Europe, some fleeing to Russia, and some to Pennsylvania, but spreading also to Central United States and Canada.

The book reviews the Conferences held by the Mennonites to determine the stand and the steps to be taken at the time of the World War, and the petitions and visits to Washington. It gives vividly the experiences of their young men before examining boards, in camps, in disciplinary barracks, and in their furloughs to farms. These incidents we were prepared to expect to a certain extent, but the treatment their parents received when they refused to buy Liberty Bonds and War Stamps takes us by surprise, the mobs were so violent and abusive; the Mennonite houses were daubed with yellow paint, the owners beaten, tarred and feathered and otherwise maltreated.

Altogether, the account gives the idea that the Mennonites suffered more seriously than Friends in the United States from non-compliance with the war aims and spirit of the times, and stood for their peace principles even more stanchly. Noble words were spoken by the young men when on trial—"We would indeed be hypocrites and base traitors to our profession if we would be unwilling to endure the taunts and jeers of a sinful world and imprisonment and the tortures of death rather than participate in military service. We cannot yield, we cannot compromise, we must suffer."

The connection of these people with Friends in relief work is dwelt upon, as also other such work in the Near East, and in Russia.

It is interesting to notice that they realize the need of missionary effort and encourage it. "If the Church wants a deeper work of grace in the home congregation, if she wants less selfishness, if she wants Christ fully established, she must have a greater share in the salvation of a lost world."

Suffering with Friends as the Mennonites did for a common faith, we cannot but read with sympathy, interest and admiration this record of a sincere and brave people, who beautifully adhered to the law of love.

WHILE AMERICA HESITATES—THE FAMINE ACTS!

The press has recently given much space to reports which implied, though they did not always state, that the famine emergency in Russia is over.

First-hand information, based upon careful investigation by Quaker workers, shows that in Pugachev County and the Bashkir Republic—territories adjacent to the Quaker district—people are now dying of starvation.

The following report, just received from Russia, outlines the situation in these districts as the Quaker workers know it:

"At the Second Month monthly conference of the Quaker Mission the workers were faced with the terrible problem of deciding which of two groups of people should be condemned to death. Before them lay the report of Karl Borders, field director of the Mission, who had just been to visit Pugachev County, across the border to the south, telling of people there in the grip of terrible hunger, some of them dying already, thousands doomed to die within a month if no help came. Before them also lay the report of Dorothy North, supervisor of the Grachovka district, who had just returned from the Bashkir Republic to the northeast of her district where conditions are equally horrible, and whence piteous appeals for help have been coming.

"To feed these people 40,000 rations were needed at once—20,000 for the adults in the eleven nearby volosts of Pugachev (the A. R. A. gives a small ration to the children there), and 20,000 for both children and adults in six more thickly populated volosts in the Bashkir Republic. Outside of the 90,000 rations the American Friends are distributing monthly in the section of Buzuluk County for which they are responsible, only 8,000 extra rations would be available per month, according to latest advices from America. Somehow that 8,000 rations had to be expanded into 40,000.

"Conditions in Pugachev were possibly a shade worse than in the Bashkir Republic. The famine authorities rate it as the most needy of all the hunger districts. Its capital town is 200 versts from the railroad, the distances between villages are enormous, and help last year was very late in coming. Of the 100,000 inhabitants in the district visited by Karl Borders only 40,000 survived last year's catastrophe. Cannibalism was very common. The stock losses were appalling. In a typical town only one horse remained to every 58 people. Now the meagre crops of this year are exhausted. The people are subsisting on grasses and the last of their vegetables. With their food and cattle gone there is nothing left to sell; they face conditions even worse than last year. The Russian Government has shipped in thousands of poods of seed grain, and will send thousands more in the spring, but is unable to do more.

"It was decided that with the 8,000 available pyoks (rations) added to what could be saved by reducing the size of the ration in all districts, the 20,000 rations asked for could be allotted to Pugachev for three months.

"And the Bashkir Republic? What was left for them? Members of the Mission had visited them last summer when their crops were burning in the fields, and had swept through little villages where the whole population had been passed away by the famine of the summer before—the few who had not died having fled. Dorothy North had just been there again, and found them eating their grasses and crushed bone with their last shirt sold, with nothing to do but wait for a repetition of last year's horrors of the mad hunger which had driven so many of them to eat human flesh, of the slow tortured death which they had seen come to so many of their relatives and friends. And the visits of the Quakers had given them hope.

They could not be left to die.

"But where was the food coming from? "Funds realized through the sale of sacks, barrels and steel-bale bands were allocated to help buy it, members of the mission made pledges to raise money somehow, and every resource at the command of the Mission was taxed. In the next ten days it was decided to send food to the Bashkir Republic as well as to Pugachev.

"It was more or less a gamble. But it did not seem fair to deprive the Bashkirs of this fighting chance for their lives. And it is not possible that when the American people know they will allow them to die after the temporary supplies which we can send them are exhausted.

"A ration sufficient to keep a famine sufferer alive for a month can be provided for fifteen cents. A life can be saved by every person who can spare fifteen cents a month from now until the harvest in Eighth Month."

A FRIENDS' HORSE MART IN POLAND.

Extreme poverty is the only thing that makes an intending purchaser eligible to buy a horse at the Friends' mart. He must own nothing but the dugout that shelters him and the rags that are huddled around him. These circumstances produce many and varied buyers. They come at dawn, and before dawn, they come in ones, in twos, in threes, they come on their feet and in groaning, over-crowded farmkansas and they congregate in a great cluster outside the Mission outpost.

For hours they watch the Mission member's window, and for hours the Mission member's window remains shut like the window of a tomb. The reason is a good one; even Mission members must sleep, and the cluster has swelled considerably by 4 A. M. Some of the buyers stand, some squat; they are patient, for patience is their national characteristic, and for the most part they are silent, though here and there loud-tongued widows declare their grievances in no uncertain tones. Listening I heard one woman declare when the others had thrust her from their company as having a husband:

"Him! You call him a husband! Better if I was without! Then I would get a horse!"

These ragged, bare-footed buyers shuffled and spat in the dust as they waited. Some faces were surmounted with great, shaggy sheepskin hats, some were surrounded with brilliant colored handkerchiefs.

Apart from the main cluster stood an old man leaning on a crooked stick of silver birch. His feet were encased in birch bark shoes. He arrived at the horse mart first, led thither by his son, a lanky, ill-fed youth who sprawled at his feet on a dusty, well-trodden strip of grass. The old man was blind. He had walked all night, a distance of 20 kilometers, but though the stick he leaned upon shook beneath his hand he would not sit down. He feared he would fall asleep and the horse he had come to buy might fall into the hands of another.

Last winter the Mission lent him a horse, which he tended and cared for; it shared his dugout and became dearer to him than his own children, who were many and troublesome. When the spring came the Mission claimed the horse for the ploughing and the old man was bereft.

At the end of the ploughing season the Mission decided to sell a number of horses and to form the remainder into timber-hauling columns for their winter program. Word was circulated among the peasants. Only those who had been refugees were eligible, only those who were poor and who had no other animal. The old man heard, perhaps his horse would be sold. He sought out his birch bark shoes, he walked all night with his young lanky son, and long before the dawn he stood gazing at the Mission member's bed-room window, that magic window from which sales of every description were held.

At last the window opened.

The peasants pressed forward, all talking at once, trying to reach over the heads of the more fortunate who had got a position nearer the window. The Interpreter spoke to them, he shouted to them, but the crush became greater and greater and the voices of the widows and orphans shriller and shriller. "No horse will be sold until you are quiet!" he shouted at last above the din. "Quiet! Quiet!" and the voices became muffled by a supreme effort and finally died away.

The horses appeared on the scene suddenly, led and ridden by enthusiastic stable boys, and Babel broke loose again to be suppressed once more by the interpreter.

The first man to hand up his paper from the soltys was the old blind peasant and the interpreter translated his story to the Mission member while the other peasants nodded their heads and exclaimed, "It is true. That is quite true!" at intervals.

"Would he know the horse?" asked the Mission member.

"Know it! Does a man know his own children?" answered the blind peasant. His hands trembled more violently than ever on his crooked stick. "I know every hair of it."

"Right. Take him to the horses."

There was silence while the old man went from horse to horse feeling them and talking to them. Suddenly he was answered; the horse knew him and he put both his arms round its neck and sobbed, for these Polish peasants are children.

"The price!" eagerly he produced a homespun linen bag; all the summer he had been saving against hope. The price amounted to little, for Mission members meet their buyers half-way on occasions like these.

All through the long hot morning the horse mart went merrily on, but no foot stepped more lightly on its homeward journey than the foot of the old blind man.

CORRESPONDENCE.

RAS-EL-METN, Syria.
Second Month 18, 1923.

MY DEAR FRIEND:—

Enclosed are some pictures of the poor Armenians given to me by Sarraffian of Beyrout. I have been sending them in several directions—and I send thee the enclosed. Thou wilt make whatever use thee thinks best of them to spread the information of the need of these poor, poor, down-trodden people. We go down in the morning to arrange for a contingent coming up here. We have arranged houses, etc. Later I'll write to you more in detail. This is only a note with the pictures which tell their own tale. There are now over twenty thousand refugees in Beyrout, eighty thousand in Aleppo, and many, many thousands north of Beyrout in the villages and towns. Thousands are in absolute destitution. The need of clothes and blankets—and boots cannot be too often mentioned. Was there ever a time when the man with "two coats" should consider the words of Christ and get rid of the second one more applicable than now? I doubt it. I have it on my mind to write a letter to the Man with the "Two Coats"—sometime, if I can get a little leisure.

With loving greetings,

Affectionately thine,

DANIEL OLIVER.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

The following might have been issued by a paper this side the Atlantic, but it comes to us with added interest that it is taken from our weekly visitor, The Friend (London).

During the late autumn and early winter one may see daily passing southward along the Susquehanna Trail (the main highway from Boston to Washington) baggage-laden autos, autos with trailers, or neat little auto-houses with neatly curtained windows and doors; and it is safe to say many will be en route for Florida for the winter. Many of these spend the entire winter in tourist camps, moving from place to place, and are locally called "tin-can tourists." During the last few years the population of Florida is nearly doubled during the winter months,—over 700,000 of them, and 200,000 travel by automobile and camp along the way. Friendly centres are at Orlando and at St. Petersburg, where meetings are held in private homes during the winter. At St. Petersburg, in the beautiful home of Sarah Gardiner Magill, often as many as fifty gather on First-day; the same may be said of the Meeting at Orlando, which was established many years ago through the effort of the late George Abbott; his daughter, Elizabeth A. Christ, a resident of Orlando, continuing her father's interest in the Meeting.

DETROIT FRIENDS have been very active in protesting against the bill to restore capital punishment which is presented in the Michigan Legislature this session. The Monthly Meeting sent a strongly worded petition to both houses, asking that a commission be appointed to make a detailed study of crime in the State with a view to constructive legislation to remove the causes of crime. Copies of this petition were also sent to each of the members of the legislature from the Detroit district, the Detroit newspapers and the ministers of the city. Following this initial move of the Friends a number of the strongest ministers of the city recently preached against capital punishment.

At the last session of the Representative Meeting of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting on the 16th inst., four Friends were named to be present on the 20th at the State Senate in Harrisburg when Senate Bill 75 on Capital Punishment is before that body. The Friends named are William B. Harvey, Ann Sharpless, Anna Rhoads Ladd and Joseph Rhoads.

J. HENRY SCATTERGOOD, of Philadelphia, with Homer L. Morris, a member of the Earlham College faculty, left home within the past fortnight to visit the Ruhr region. They go under the auspices of the Friends' Service Committee to acquaint themselves with actual conditions there, and to report whether the F. S. C. should widen its scope of work to take in this field.

Should their decision be favorable to this move, it is expected that H. L. M. will remain in the Ruhr to supervise the undertaking.

DR. MILLER, of Swarthmore College, will lead an expedition to Mexico to witness the total eclipse of the sun on Ninth Month 10th. The expedition will be financed by one who desires that his name be withheld.

They expect to start for Mexico early in Seventh Month and will spend about six weeks in building and installing the equipment. The locality will probably be in central Mexico. The path of totality is a belt of about one hundred and fifty miles in width from the upper part of lower California in almost a straight line to the Atlantic Ocean on the coast of Yucatan. The usual time of totality is two minutes, but this eclipse will have three-and-a-half minutes of totality, so that, with clear weather, it is hoped to obtain many data. Dr.

Miller has participated in three eclipse expeditions and had charge of two,—one to Spain in 1905 and one to Colorado in 1918.

THE News Bulletin of the National Y. W. C. A. of New York City sends us the following:—

"The picturesque surnames of the Indians are rapidly becoming extinct. The former 'Drowsy Waters' and 'Sun-in-the-Eyes' is now Miss Sadie Jones or Daisy Smith."

Susie Meek, a Friend, a full-blood Indian and at the present time Indian Secretary for the National Board of the Y. W. C. A., says these changes are due to a desire for brevity. She writes: "The change of most of these names took place in the Indian Department at Washington. Naturally it requires less time and effort to deal with an Indian named 'Jones' than one named 'By Weeping Waters.' The unfortunate thing is that the next generation of Indians will lose their tribal distinction. 'By Weeping Waters' or 'Buzzing Walker' becomes only a tradition."

THE Quaker member of the Everest party, Dr. A. W. Wakefield, of Kendal, in course of an address the other day, described his own experience of the failure of the final attempt on the summit. He and another had been left behind with some of the coolies, to take up any supplies which might be needed the next day. It was about 2 P. M. and Dr. Wakefield was seated writing a letter in the sunshine and watching from time to time the distant progress of the party very slowly winding their way up the North Wall. Glancing down for a moment, when he looked up again the whole wall was white and the climbers had entirely disappeared from view.

He realized at once that a disaster had happened. Gradually a few black figures emerged from the white haze of snow-dust—but only some seven or eight instead of the seventeen. Eventually it was found that seven coolies had been swept into a crevasse and killed, but the remainder of the party were uninjured.

It was realized that the monsoons had begun in earnest, and that to contemplate any further attack that season would have been worse than madness.—From The Friend (London).

HUMOR and pathos were mingled in the incident related recently by T. Edmund Harvey at an A. F. S. C. camp-fire re-union. At a certain village in France, when the black and red star was in helpful evidence, were three town pumps which our workers facetiously dubbed Faith, Hope and Love. In revisiting the scenes of reconstruction some months ago, Edmund Harvey called at the village of the three pumps and found that Faith and Hope had pumped out and that only Love was active. Is it not so in a war-scarred world? He inquired. Certainly he found it so, he said, among the peoples for which Friends had worked. War's inexorable aftermath had shattered faith, and hope had fallen through dire distress, yet the results of our work were not lost since love remained. If the world could only learn! When love remains faith and hope may be reborn. This is the interpretation of Friends' service.—From The American Friend.

If you want a lace that will save you stops from break-downs you can depend on Tannate. Users say that Tannate lasts from two to three times as long as ordinary rawhide, sometimes more. It is very tough and does not so soon grow hard and brittle.

It reduces stops, often to less than one half. It gives you a large saving in fixed charges and idle wages. Lace leather is a small item, and when you consider how much of your possible output may be lost by stops you appreciate the importance of using the best.

The price may be higher, but it lasts so much longer than cheaper laces that it will cost you less per year, plus the satisfaction of less trouble.

The opening of Yearly Meeting was marked as usual by the session on Seventh-day morning, Third Month 24th, of the Meeting of Ministers and Elders. The living silence into which the meeting gathered was broken by earnest prayer. John D. Carter sat at the Clerk's table, and in the absence of Martha H. Bishop, the meeting appointed Mary R. Williams to serve as Assistant Clerk for the day.

Minutes were read for the following visiting Friends:—Alfred Neave Brayshaw, a Minister and Elder of Pickering and Hull Monthly and Yorkshire Quarterly Meetings, England; Mary M. Smith, a Minister of Fairhope Monthly Meeting, Alabama (accompanied by S. Elma Smith); William B. Stanley, also a Minister from Fairhope (accompanied by Samuel C. Smith); Anne E. Warner (widow of Yardley Warner), an Elder of Mid-Somerset Monthly Meeting, England. Thomas A. Batteny, of Providence, R. I., was present without a Minute. A warm welcome was expressed to all of these Friends, with the hope that we might do our part by offering receptive hearts to the messages which they might feel called upon to deliver while amongst us.

A. Neave Brayshaw spoke gratefully of his reception, and of his concern, ever since his last visit in 1898, to return to Philadelphia. He revived the words of George Fox: "Let it be your joy to hear or see the springs of life break forth in any," and urged us to be tender towards those young in years or in spiritual experience. God works through bands of purified, dedicated people. We must be willing to become that sort ourselves, and healing will go out from us to a sick and suffering world.

Max I. Reich, a Minister of Falls Monthly Meeting, Penna., introduced his concern to return to Great Britain, Ireland and parts of Germany for religious service. His concern was weightily considered and whole-heartedly united with, and a Minute drawn up, expressing our sympathy and confidence. The question of a companion was left until later, though all were agreed that it was a matter of serious importance, feeling that the example of our Master, in sending forth His disciples two by two, was a right one for us.

The first Query was read, with the answers sent up by the Quarterly Meetings, and a summary answer adopted. As we had been sitting for about three hours, adjournment was taken until half-past two that afternoon. Owing to the crowded sessions of the general Yearly Meeting, the regular time for the adjourned session of the Meeting for Ministers and Elders (Third-day morning) was given up this year. But it was felt that some other arrangement would be more satisfactory than to have two sessions on Seventh-day as a regular thing, so a committee of eight was appointed to join with a similar committee from the general Yearly Meeting to consider the whole arrangement of Yearly Meeting week.

In the afternoon session, the remaining Queries were read and answered.

It was felt that a brief address on Simplicity in Living might properly emanate from this meeting, and Edward G. Rhoads, Ann Sharpless, Max I. Reich, Walter W. Haviland and Frances Tatum Rhoads were appointed to draw up such a paper, if they felt the way was open.

A Minute embodying some of the exercises through which the Meeting had passed was then read. It is as follows:—

"In consideration of the Queries, we were reminded that it is part of our duty to invite others to our meetings for worship, as well as to attend them ourselves. We were urged to worship the Lord with all our heart and mind and strength.

"It was pointed out that it is necessary to a vital, living ministry that we be personally acquainted with our Heavenly Father and our Saviour Jesus Christ, through the Holy Spirit, that our love to Him should be shown in our lives, and that through us His love to others may shine forth.

"It is helpful that we be faithful to all intimations of duty, even those that may appear small.

"We were reminded that in the earthly ministry of our Lord it was the hungry that were fed, and that it is necessary for us also to feel the need in order to be fed spiritually. The early Friends were held up as examples which we should do well to follow, as they followed the leadings of the Light of Christ within them.

"The difference between blamelessness and faultlessness of life was set forth, with the thought that although we may not be free from faults, yet we should strive to be blameless among men. The value of struggles and hardships in our spiritual experiences was called to our attention, as also the great duty laid upon us to preach the Gospel in our lives, by our actions, as well as by our words.

"We were warned against the tendency to follow the example of others, leading away from true moderation and simplicity.

"It was pointed out that the simplicity which we desire largely depends on our having for our aim, the service of and devotion to our Lord and Saviour.

"We were shown that a large part of our service is, and must be, in the line of relieving physical needs, even as it was a large part in the earthly ministry of our Lord, and that we should strive to allow Him to live with us and work in us. A desire was expressed that we could attain to true simplicity in order to have wherewith to minister to others.

"A picture of the widespread rejection of our Lord in many lands, was brought before us, with a call to us to see our duty and perform it, trusting in the power of God."

The final item of business to claim the Meeting's attention was a brief memorial notice concerning our dearly loved Friend, John E. Carter, of Germantown, who was a member of the Meeting for Ministers and Elders for forty-five years. We then adjourned, to meet next year at such a time as may be decided upon by the Committee appointed for that purpose, if consistent with the Divine Will.

On First-day the usual morning meetings were held. In the afternoon, at Twelfth Street, about three hundred and fifty Young Friends gathered for their annual meeting for worship. A spirit of reverent, humble worship spread over the company, deepening into a solemn stillness, where we felt fused in love and adoration before God. We seemed to see Him, as did the young Isaiah, "high and lifted up," and His train filled the temple. There was little spoken, and it is doubtful if what was

EXTRACTS FROM A LETTER OF JOHN BARCLAY.

"Be not conformed to this world," said the Apostle, who knew that the fashions and customs of it are vain and pass away. To a mind disposed to avoid the very appearance and approaches to evil, this text is alone sufficient to induce a hesitation, a scrupulousness or tenderness; knowing that for every idle word he must give an account, and that every thought must be brought into subjection to Christ. But these libertines, who would think their own thoughts, and choose their own ways and words, and also wear their own apparel, must needs have things so cleared up to their blinded and darkened understanding, that, like the lawyers, no express (much less implied) prohibition of Scripture would have satisfied them; they would shuffle from it and fritter it away, bending it to their own wills. Whereas the spirit of Christianity testifies, and has ever testified, against such things, and not only among Friends, but more or less, and in different ways and degrees, wherever sufficient clearness has been arrived at, even from the earliest ages.

Picture to thyself any set of people raised up to a deep sense of religion, and carrying out their watchfulness and self-denial to all branches of their conduct, and endeavoring to follow that exhortation, "Be ye holy in all manner of conversation,"—and whatsoever ye "do in word or deed, do all to the glory of God, etc." Would they not soon come to be distinguished from other people, who follow the course of this world, or who secretly yearn after their heart's lusts, and comfort themselves with trying to think there is nothing in this and the other little thing, and that religion does not consist in these things? Would they not soon find themselves to be a peculiar people, a singular people, a very simple people:—their outward appearance, their manners, their very gestures, restrained and regulated after a mode totally contrary to the generality of those around them? According to that striking passage in one of the Apocryphal writings, setting forth the language of the ungodly respecting the righteous, so will it be respecting such a people or person as I have described:—"He is not for our turn, he is clean contrary to our doings; he was made to reprove our thoughts; he is grievous even to behold; for his life is not like other men's, his ways of another fashion."

Indeed it has never been any wonder with me, that a people gathered and settled and preserved, as I have hinted at,—or as Friends were, when they found themselves estranged from the world at large, and eccentric through this process of following their convictions of duty,—should value this their privilege, and these outward badges, which tend to keep up this desirable distinction and separation from the world's spirit. But they never set up a rule as to dress, or any particular color, cut, or fashion, on the same footing as the livery of the Monks, or religious orders of the Papists, etc.; they only left off their ornaments, and such things as were a burden to them as unnecessary and unsimple:—it was the ever-changeable tide of fashion, which did the rest, and in time caused their dissimilarity and strangeness to appear.

But as to the bare assertion, that George Fox and the early Friends, would have changed with the times, it is a conjecture which has its origin in the mere caprice and inclination of those who say so; and the contrary may be as flatly and broadly asserted upon far stronger ground, even upon the actual facts of the whole tenor of their dissent as exhibited in their lives, and especially in their writings. The common consent spoken of, is the very conformity they objected to,—a consent of worldly men, upon worldly principles; not the consent of men redeemed from the earth. On the other hand, all that have ever rightly given up to make a plain appearance, and to speak the plain language, etc., have done it on the very same sound ground, and not merely because George Fox and others did it.

They, the truly convinced, have continued to feel on the subject as he did; and though the instincts are rare, as the mercy is great, and the work marvelous, and no light and superficial one, such instances are yet from time to time occurring; they are the result of the cleansing of the inside of the cup, that the outside may be clean also. My case is, I trust, one of these and, perhaps, rather an unusual one; for I was brought up, as thou knowest, in the entire disuse of, and I even cherished a real contempt for, such singularities; until I came to see there was "no peace to the wicked," and that "great peace have all they who love the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus." Then as I yielded my mind to be in all things led and guided thereby, nothing offended me but evil;—nothing seemed too hard to give up unto, nor any thing to be slighted as insignificant, which in any wise contributed to this heavenly peace and progress in what was esteemed so supremely excellent. The cross of Christ, that yoke He puts upon His disciples, was easy and sweet; and peace was the reward of being faithful in ever so little.

It is in this way, I have been made ruler over more, and not by despising the day of small things; which is the sure way of falling by little and little; of this we have most painful instances now around us; and even some, who have deservedly stood high in our Society, as teachers and examples to the flock, but who have come to question, or have lost all their former impressions and tendering convictions,—those are, it seems, all gone, and almost forgotten, as the early dew that passeth away,—and they have turned, as the dog or the sow, to that which they once loathed and rejected. And truly it is a striking and unanswerable fact, that there has not been one individual, who has risen to any eminence for religious dedication in our Society, but has had to tread the narrow and straight path; and has had to attribute his progress to giving up, in the ability received, to obey the secret monitions of the Spirit of Christ, even in little things: nor has there, I believe, been one who has swerved from this course, that has ultimately turned out better than the salt that has lost its savor.

Therefore may I not fitly wind up, by subjoining to that Scripture with which I commenced, the language which follows it,—"Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your minds, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God."

Dikran Donchian.

"A Singular Life."

(We are glad to present for our readers this thrilling story of a life of Christian service, approved by New York Monthly Meeting. It is a moving story of personal inspiration.)

Dikran Bourgas Donchian, an Elder in our Society, in the height of his great usefulness, died suddenly at Berkeley, California, on First-day, Ninth Month 24, 1922, aged sixty years. With his wife he recently attended the Five Years' Meeting at Richmond, Indiana, and then proceeded to Pasadena, on a visit to his children. Leaving his wife at Pasadena, he went to San Francisco on business. On the intervening First-day morning he attended Friends' Meeting for worship at Berkeley, in which he had most impressive vocal service.

There he accepted the invitation of a Friend to dinner, and while on the way with him he was stricken and passed to the Eternal Home.

He was born at Diarbekir, a city in the province of that name, in the heart of Mesopotamia, that ancient "Land amid the Rivers," the ancestral home of Abraham. This strong devotion to home and kindred has been the preservation of the people of that land from that day to this, and was very highly developed in the subject of this memorial. The Christian history of this wonderful country extends back to the beginnings of our era, and if its legends tell true, even into the lifetime of our Lord. To the Armenian, Christianity means life, and since the days of Nero they have endured with steadfastness the fire and sword of persecution for their faith; and the end is not yet.

The father of our Friend was an Armenian merchant of high standing and influence in the business and religious life of his city, who with his son had become convinced of Quaker principles through the missionary efforts of English Friends. Those who have seen the fine oil painting of the father will remember his ancient style of dress, the long robe such as was doubtless worn by Bethuel, the son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, so changeless are the customs in "the land of the people of the East."

Young Dikran was brought up in the business of his father as a jeweler and watchmaker until, following the ambition of youth to reach the capital of his country, he came to Constantinople to engage in business, where he mingled with the Protestant community and was soon received in membership with Friends. What his standing became is indicated by the fact that in a short time he was president of the Y. M. C. A., and also served as Clerk of the Monthly Meeting of Friends in Constantinople. In the year 1860, being well established in business, he married Virginia, daughter of Dr. Constantian, and lived in a house adjoining her father's at Boyajikoy, a suburb of Constantinople half way up the Bosphorus.

In Eighth Month, 1866, a massacre of Protestant Armenians in Constantinople was deliberately planned and carried out as to time and locality, with the connivance of the Turkish government. Dikran Donchian's prominence as a Protestant Armenian from Diarbekir marked him as worthy of death. On a certain morning in that month he received at his place of business a summons to come immediately to Police Headquarters. Aware of what it meant, and in accordance with his constant habit in all his affairs, he sought the Heavenly guidance and felt led to delay somewhat his appearance. Arrived there, he went to the office of an Armenian acquaintance employed by the police, who on seeing him exclaimed, "What! Have you been sent for? Remain here with me. Don't leave the room;" and his friend took measures to keep him secluded from observation throughout the forenoon. They then left the building together and in the courtyard passed the headless bodies of some forty of their unfortunate countrymen who, like Dikran Donchian himself, had been summoned for slaughter.

Returning to the business district, he found the whole neighborhood, including his own store, had been sacked and looted during his absence, but on reaching home was rejoiced to find his family safe. Warned that search was being made for him, he and the whole family escaped by hiding in a well. During this time Dikran was persuaded by his father-in-law that, if they survived, it was his duty to go with his family to America, which, in view of the wreck of his fortune, seemed an impossibility. Meantime the wave of massacre had spent itself, in which between 6,000 and 7,000 Armenians in Constantinople perished. Comparative safety having been restored to the business quarter of the city, our Friend ventured down to his store, to find that his iron safes, in which his more valuable goods were kept, had resisted the efforts of the mob, and he was able to recover from them the greater part of his stock. This, however, since he contemplated departure, he was obliged to sell at considerable sacrifice. Nevertheless, with simple faith, he regarded all that had befallen as the Providence of God, and with his wife and two children he was soon safe in England.

In London he met, among others, J. Bevan Braithwaite, who gave him cordial letters of introduction to American Friends. At Manchester he met J. J. Crossley, a wealthy and humane Friend, who assisted him to embark with his family for New York.

Here, among a strange people of whose language he was utterly ignorant, he was received by the Friends of Twentieth Street Meeting, who were almost at once drawn in Christian love to him and his family. His Monthly Meeting in Constantinople having been extinguished by massacre, he was unable to present any certificate of membership, so he and his family joined our Monthly Meeting by request. In the smallest way, with the pitiful remnant of his worldly fortune, he began business in a narrow hallway back under the stairs of the old Y. M. C. A. building on East Twenty-third Street, the small rent of which was often a serious problem. It was an epochal day when a dear Friend purchased from him a rug which she really did not want. That transaction gave him his first start and was the material basis from which in a few years he built up the largest business in Oriental rugs in America.

One Fourth-day evening he handed a dollar to a Friend, and after much difficulty because of his imperfect English, made the Friend understand that it was the first dollar of profit from his business and he wished to contribute it to the fund for Foreign Missions. This richness toward God in the days of his straitened worldly circumstances gave him the right to say to a gathering of several hundred destitute, homeless men in the lower room of Twentieth Street Meeting House, a few years ago, "Don't wait till you have a dollar to do good with your money. If you have only five cents and see someone else whose need is greater than yours, share it with him."

Besides the son and daughter, Paul and Eugenia, who came with them from Constantinople, another son, Levon, was born here. In 1913, his wife, Virginia, who had patiently and loyally shared his misfortunes and sorrows, as well as his faith in God, was removed by death. This great affliction he bore with Christian fortitude, having the assurance that he would again join her in a brighter and larger life in the very presence of their Master. Soon after this event he went with his three children to England, remaining there for a year or longer, when he returned to New York to take up once more his life of useful service here. In 1916 he married Angel Agnes Chopourian, who, with her wonderful gift of song, was a helpmeet for him in his many religious concerns, enabling him the more to rejoice in Christ his Saviour. A third son, Daniel Dikran, was born in 1919.

Dikran B. Donchian "loved business" (to quote his own words) and was wonderfully successful in it. Ninety per cent. of the imported rug trade in the United States passed through his hands. The Shah of Persia, in recognition of his service in increasing trade relations between that country and our own, conferred upon him the insignia and title of Khan. When the World War shut off business communication with the Near East, he opened the market from the Far East, and while submarines preyed upon Mediterranean and Atlantic shipping, his cargoes from China traversed the Pacific in safety.

But masterful as he was in business, it is as one who had received the spirit which is of God, as one to whom it was given to know the mysteries of the Kingdom, that he was distinguished among us. With him in a remarkable manner all the affairs of life were spiritually discerned. He moved and acted as if in a world deeper and more practical, larger and more powerful, than that which man's wisdom teacheth. This was the secret of his success, realizing as he did the differences in experience, and yet the unbroken connection, between the life of the flesh and of the spirit. This familiar relation, to him, between the seen and the unseen, this movement of the soul toward God, he realized and established through the gate of private prayer. Every business enterprise was undertaken and executed in the power and grace that flowed to him through this means from the Infinite. On the evenings of the Armenian prayer meetings in Twentieth Street, which he instituted and maintained for many years to increase the religious privileges of his countrymen in this city, he was in the habit of coming to the Meeting House an hour beforehand and spending it alone with God in prayer. And needless to say, the earnest expectation of the creature was constantly rejoiced in the manifestation of the spirit.

What he was to the Society of Friends and to his own Meeting we know, and we loved and valued him for the life he lived among us. What he was to his own people in Armenia and in this country, it would far exceed the permissible limits of this memorial to tell. Seven of his countrymen he educated in America and supported as medical and religious missionaries at stations of his own selection in his native land. He also maintained an Armenian missionary for religious work among that people in this city. In addition, he spent much time in personal religious visits to Armenian families, and his time and abilities and substance were ever at the service of the refugees from that unhappy country on their arrival in America.

A great man has fallen in our Israel. But to us that remain there comes the message of his spirit: Be of good cheer; they that believe in Christ do not die. God is still our fathers' God because he is not the God of the dead but of the living, and there hath never failed one word of all his good promise.

SIXTH ANNUAL REPORT

OF THE TRUSTEES OF THE TEACHERS RETIREMENT FUND OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS.

To the Committee on Education:—

The Trustees of the Teachers Retirement Fund of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends submit the Sixth Annual Report for the fiscal year ended Sixth Month 30, 1922, as follows:—

During the year further contributions in the sum of $1000 have been added to the Fund, which has reached a total of $121,329.50. Pledges amounting to $1100 are as yet unpaid.

On Sixth Month 30, 1922, our investments consisted of $160,000 par value of twenty-two different railroad bonds and equipment notes with a book value of $144,933.80, yielding on that value the average interest rate of 5.206 per cent.

Appended are financial statements prepared by our Treasurer. Referring to these, it may be noted that deposits made by the twenty-eight participants under the Savings Fund-Plan amounted to $3858.80, and insurance premium installments paid by the fifteen participants under the Insurance Plan amounted to $2368.50, a total of $6227.30, paid by teachers, as compared with $5198.36 reported last year.

Two teachers withdrew from the Savings Fund Plan within the year, receiving $519.89, the schools affected also receiving their share on this account. In case of withdrawal the teacher receives the full amount of the Savings Fund deposits he or she may have made together with interest thereon; and also where the length of service has exceeded ten years, a share of the funds accumulated from the contributions made by the School and Trustees.

One withdrawal by death occurred during the year, and the accumulations arising from the participation are being paid in installments in accordance with the directions given by the teacher.

Two teachers withdrew from the Insurance Plan within the year.

Retiring allowances in the amount of $3881.67 were paid to fifteen teachers who have retired from service. For the ensuing year it is expected that payments totalling about $4158 will be made to sixteen retired teachers in quarterly installments of $37.50 to $75 each.

The principal of the Retiring Allowance Fund at the end of the fiscal year amounted to $53,275.33, while the principal of the Teachers Retirement Fund proper totalled $66,700.26.

There are twenty-six teachers participating in the Savings Fund Plan, thirteen in the Insurance Plan and two teachers participate in both plans. Fifteen of these participants are men and twenty-six women; of these

At the time the Retirement Fund was established it did not seem advisable to include in its plan of protection a provision covering the risk of total and permanent disability which would prevent a person from engaging in any gainful occupation. In recent years there has been marked development in the Disability Insurance offered by the insurance companies, and the Trustees are now ready to add protection against total and permanent disability in the case of those participating in the insurance plan provided the schools and teachers are willing to do their share in paying the relatively small additional cost. The granting of the disability protection is also subject to evidence of insurability of the teacher who desires it.

The Trustees directed that an audit of the Treasurer's books and examination of the securities be made for the last fiscal year. Financial statements prepared by the Treasurer are appended.

A NEW SPIRIT IN JAPAN.

EDITH F. SHARPLESS.

Ten years is a short time in an outline of world history, but the ten years from 1912 to 1922 have been crowded full of history for most communities. Mito, the conservative of conservatives, the seat of Confucian learning, the feudal fief of the family who gave the last of the Shoguns to Japan, has shown signs of giving away before the attacks of modernism. Ford cars go back and forth on its main street; there is talk of a trolley line connecting it with the coast. New and strange vegetables, such as lettuce, tomatoes, and strawberries, have appeared in its markets; bread has become a common article of diet. School children appear in dresses or trousers (according to their sex) and even the High School girls—conservatism clings to all institutions for women much longer than to those for men—even the High School girls have discarded their wooden clogs for shoes.

A government college for men has come to Mito, with University graduates and men who have studied abroad on its faculty, and youths from the great industrial centres among its students. Books on socialism, French and English classics, appear on the shelves of its book stores.

But all these things are only the outward sign of a spiritual change that has taken place in young Japan. The government goes on in its old imperialistic grooves, and as this is all that comes out in the papers, it is all that most of the western world knows. But the voice of its young men must soon make itself heard. It is not the voice of jingoism. Ozaki Yukio San, a former Mayor of Tokyo, has been traveling over Japan holding disarmament meetings, which have been very largely attended. He has called for a division at the end of his addresses. At Keio University, there were two thousand for disarmament and one hundred and eighty against it. There are absolute pacifist groups in the universities of Japan.

What are they reading—these young men? Books of fiction are not the best sellers. I have read parts of two of the best sellers for last year. One is written by a man, Kagawa, a graduate of Princeton, and a Christian, who tells about his work of salvage in the slums of Kobe. Another, written by Nishida Tenko, a non-Christian, tells what he means by "a life of penitence" (Zange no Seikatsu), a life based on service and not on money, and one which follows the guidance of a light within man.

They are reading books, good and bad, but all books that deal with reality, and they are tremendously alive to problems of life and society and the state. There is a universal suffrage movement in Japan. There is even a woman suffrage movement, and women last year obtained for the first time the right to attend political meetings. I can not touch on the present industrial situation in Japan, both from lack of knowledge and from lack of time, but it also is one of the significant evidences of the new spirit in Japan.

Again, in the educational world, as fast as new schools are founded, they are crowded and a demand for more is heard. The Mito girls' High School takes in two hundred girls each year for a four years' course. Last year seven hundred presented themselves for entrance examination—that in spite of the fact that a new High School has been founded at Shimodate, within the same province, during the year.

The old social code which kept the sexes separated before marriage is being largely discounted by the young people of to-day, and new and perplexing problems confront every young girl as to just how far she shall allow herself to go. In many cases there is no guide but her own common-sense, or her own desire for pleasure and freedom.

Into this mass of temptation and problems, of life and of potential energies, of opportunity and of red-hot eagerness, if we do not inject the Christian message and life, we have lost a tremendous moment. Any legalistic or irrational system has small chance today in Japan. But the Gospel that makes us free, that tells us there is neither Japanese nor American, capitalist nor laborer, man nor woman, but that all are one in Jesus Christ, can be of untold power. I feel we must put it into the lives of the young people. We must not think for a minute of the present enthusiasm fading out into materialism, and a sense of futility, for the lack of it.

The Christian Church, too, has felt the influence of this new spirit in Japan. Last spring there was held in Tokyo, a meeting calling itself the National Christian Conference, whose objective was to give to all Christian bodies—Catholic and Protestant, native and foreign, one central organization, that Christianity should face the non-Christian world, having many members, it is true, but as one body. A Russian priest of the Greek Catholic church, with long flowing robe and crucifix, was there; representatives from all the Episcopal bodies were there, and there was an enthusiasm for brotherhood. As one listened to the speeches and discussions of the Japanese leaders of the church, one realized more than ever that the church had found itself, could not be led hither and thither by the American missionary, but that it had a life of its own derived from above, and not all from the land across the Pacific Ocean. And yet they know they must still have our help. It is help, not dictation, that they want. There was never a time when I felt that they had taken us in, and made us so a part of themselves, as during this last year.

It was especially true at our last Yearly Meeting. It was no longer a case of foreigner and Japanese, but only of the Friends of the Japan Yearly Meeting. As we sat together on the straw mats, the sense of unity was so strong, that one must give thanks in one's heart.

It is not only the Japanese, who have changed, I suspect. We have learned how much better it is to consult and to go with, rather than to dictate and to try to lead. There will not be any more important changes in our work, I think, that have not been freely discussed on equal terms with our Japanese Friends. The time may be coming when the Girls' School will not be considered strictly the province of the Mission, or indeed when the Mission will cease to be a body distinct from the Yearly Meeting. We hope that Friends at home will be open to consider such possibilities. Some will say that there is the money side to think of. Yes, that is true, but the money will never come for a work that they do not feel to be their own.

Last summer in Takahama, just outside Ishioka, a little meeting-house was built, which cost $400.00. Our Mission Committee from funds that it held for that purpose, promised them $100.00 of that amount. The rest they are taking care of themselves, because they want it themselves. Some of you may not have known that there was any meeting at Takahama. The Shimodate Friends, for whom a new meeting place was recently bought, have received very great incentive from the feeling that it is their own, a feeling greatly enhanced by the collection and forwarding to our treasurer each month, the sum of six yen to pay back some of the original outlay.

All these things, friends, call for a new spirit in us. We must not be behind. We must go forward, borne on the wave of this broad, big life, that knows no national lines, where all men are truly brothers, where we suffer and rejoice with all the members of our human family. But it must be deep as well as broad, resting on the experience of God, based on His righteousness and His love.

STAVANGER.

The setting sun was already ruddying the west when we repaired to the station at Grinnell, to await the train by which we had arranged to reach our Norwegian Friends of Stavanger neighborhood. It may be noted, in passing, that Iowa is filled with railroads, but the reaching of desired points is often a matter of perplexing study of time tables. However, by a combination of the latter, the telephone, and the ever-willing readiness of helpful Friends, our "rough places" of travel, figuratively speaking, "were made smooth," and as darkness fell upon us we alighted at Dilman station, in a strange land. But a friendly hand and a friendly voice there were to greet us, along with an obedient car that soon brought us to the journey's end.

So intimate is the relationship between the Norwegian Friends and the town of Stavanger in their native land, it was only natural that the name having so many associations should have been transplanted to the New World, along with their chattels, their Bibles, and their language. Although descendants of the early settlers are now found in Paulina, Whittier and West-Branch, it is at Stavanger we find in true suggestiveness what remains of language and racial habits of those who as a body sought to exchange the rugged land of their fathers, with its military oppression, for the religious freedom and boundless opportunity of the prairie land of our Middle West.

Darkness was upon us, but the lights were beaming and supper preparing as we were welcomed to the comfortable home of our Yearly Meeting acquaintance, Malinda Thompson, who as we found lives the life of a "Mother in Israel," and broadly sheds her influence among her people. Through her kindly interest and practical arrangements, we met and learned to warmly love many of these Norwegian Friends.

The next day being First-day, brought the opportunity to mingle in religious fellowship with parents and children at their First-day school and meeting for worship. The conducting of the former was in the greatest simplicity. On assembling, a chapter of Scripture was read to the whole school and others who might have gathered in the meeting-house. There were two classes, one composed of the boys and one of the girls, the former conducted by a man holding a responsible station in the meeting, the latter by our hostess above mentioned—M. T. The chapter for the day was read around the class, verse by verse, and the meaning enlivened or expounded where it seemed needful. At the conclusion of the school another chapter was read (this time in the Norse language) to the whole company assembled. That selected was 2 Cor. v. Though we could not understand the words, (as did most of those present, we were assured) we could but be affected by the solemn manner and smooth tones of the reader, in the person of the aged Friend, Ole Bryngelsen, as that great consolatory message to the church to the end of time came forth in the foreign tongue, beginning:

Thi vi vide, at dersom vor Hyttes jordske Huus nedbrydes, saa have vi en Bygning of Gud, et Huus, som ikke er gjort med Haender, evigt i Himlene.

The meeting for worship that followed, lingers in memory as one of the answering of God to the call of the human heart, in its needs, upon Him; a sense whereof came forth in a message of love and cheer that readily found utterance. As already said, the stranger could not understand Norse, neither could a newly arrived immigrant woman understand English, yet as hand clasped hand at the close of the service, "the thought deeper than all speech" acknowledged the kinredship of religious fellowship without vocal expression.

Stavanger meeting property includes a large building, now idle, which was built for and for some years was maintained as a boarding and day school conducted under the superintendency of Nicholas Larsen, now resident at West Branch, whose deep, practical interest in educational matters we had noticed when the subject was before the Yearly Meeting. Perhaps the chill, wet day of our visit to Stavanger heightened the pathetic interest with which we looked upon this dull, forsaken building, within whose walls once sped the studious hours, and from without, at play, rose the shouts of joy and laughter from boys and girls who are now the staid men and women of the community.

Meeting over, it was with sustained loving interest we lent ourself to the continued pilotage of our hostess and son, together with Olesen who now joined himself to our company. Dinner was had at the home of the latter, where a large company was present. Then came a series of calls at homes, where family names were constant reminders of the rugged North Land of their forebears. Thus, bowed with the weight of near a hundred years, we found Mons. K. Vinjé, whose countenance and gesture bespoke the gladness with which he received the words that welled up for him in the heart of the stranger, and were interpreted by the daughter sitting by. The Saviour's love was felt overshadowing the room wherein lay a young wife stricken with invalidism, and anxious for her husband and little daughter. Tender memory also reverted to another home, where parents, still in the prime of life, could gather about them their twelve offspring, the eldest two being married daughters living in homes of their own, the youngest, a babe in the mother's arms.

The little cheerless station at Le Grand was enshrouded in the thick darkness of the chill autumn night, where we bade a lingering farewell to those who so kindly and steadfastly kept by us in our visit to Stavanger Friends. A flashing headlight, a thunderous roll, a gush of steam, and the long train of the Chicago & North Western stood still at our feet. The weary traveler, with a heart filled with thankfulness and the peace of God, lay composed in a choice of berths. Some hours after he peered from the window just in time to note that he was again crossing the Mississippi, leaving behind him a great commonwealth and those many new-made friends that had absorbed his interest so steadfastly for almost a fortnight. It was noted that the wide river here (at Clinton) flowed darkly beneath, in three sections, while above, the constellation Orion, all-glorious amid the starry host, shone down as it must have done two hundred and fifty years ago, when those two intrepid Jesuit explorers—Marquette and Joliet, pressing slowly northward in their frail canoes, rejoiced in heart with the discovery they had made—namely, that the great artery of the North American continent flowed into the Gulf of Mexico, and not into the Sea of California, as supposed!

In his journal of the voyage, the former has quaintly written: "We took all precaution, that if our enterprise was hazardous, it would not be rash."

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

A PAIR OF OXEN—1699.

Susanna and Josiah Garton were the elder children of William Garton of Bonwicks' Place, and had grown up in close intimacy. The sister had been much missed when three years before she had married John Deane of Horsham, a good but silent and severe man many years her senior. The union lasted less than a year, and Susanna had returned as a widow to her father's house, when only twenty-four, and became again the companion of her brother. They often went about together to visit meetings, for like their mother, both had early received a helpful gift in the ministry.

Josiah had of late begun to see the probability that he would again lose his companion, but as it was his own life-long friend who was seeking her, he could say no word against it.

Out in the level meadow by the farm-house a busy scene was now going on. Dickie was sticking long slender nails into his piece of pork, on the side of the box which held the blacksmith's tools and a large store of the iron shoes, or cues, as they were called in Sussex. The cloven foot, of course, needed two of these, and they were formed into something the shape of a comma. A bovine intellect cannot be taught, as a horse can, to allow one foot after another to be lifted for the shoe to be nailed on, so the oxen were thrown upon their backs for the needful operation.

Old William Garton was directing, assisted by his sons, with Benedict Martin and some farm lads, while John Miles stood waiting in his leather apron. He had his little smithy adjoining the Meeting House at Ifield, a solid stone building which had been erected some twenty years before.

A number of pairs of oxen, with the heavy wooden yokes on their necks, stood quietly chewing their cud and taking not the slightest notice of the strange things which were happening to their fellows. A large ox was released from the yoke, a strong rope was quietly twisted round its legs, a sudden pull from Josiah's and Ben's stalwart arms, and over went the great creature on the soft grass. Dickie rushed in and promptly sat down on its thick neck to prevent it from struggling. William Garton put over it a tripod of stout poles, to which the four feet were firmly tied, and the eight shoes were nailed on by the blacksmith. Uncomfortable as he must have been, the ox took it with great placidity, merely when released giving himself a mighty shake before quietly beginning to graze.

All of the group were Quakers, and it was natural enough as they worked together that the burning question of the seizure of their goods for tithes was discussed. Case after case was mentioned. How the Ruspier priest had taken Widow Prier's large iron pot and both her beds, so that she and her children had to lie on straw; how cows to the value of £18 had been taken for a £7 demand, and not a penny returned. The priest at Charlwood was more honest and did return the overplus, but his inconsiderateness in taking old Benedictus Martin's seed wheat was strongly condemned.

When Josiah brought up his young red oxen they were much admired. Three years ago they were the twin calves of Susanna Garton's favorite dairy cow, and her son had taken infinite pains to train them.

"They step out as lively as horses," said Josiah; "I hardly ever have to touch them with the goad. They are the best we ever had for delivering the meal from the mill at the houses round. They come like a dog, when I call."

The familiar voice soothed the animals during the ordeal of their first shoeing, and when it was over, Peart and Lively had just been yoked up again, when motherly Susanna Garton came out with a great red pitcher of sweet cider, the juice of the apples which but yesterday were lying in ruddy heaps in the orchard. As she dispensed it in horn cups to the hot and thirsty men, her husband with a twinkle in his eye, told the tale of her retort which had silenced the rector of field.

It was received by hearty laughter, especially from the young men, but the heroine herself looked grave.

"I fear there was too much of the corrupt nature in my speech," she said, "I ought to have taken his question more meekly. Yet it seems to me a strange thing that he can expect the Friends of truth to pay him for preaching doctrines which we believe are not of Divine ordering. If there are those who like and believe them, it is they should provide the money for the hiring priest. I hope," she added, turning to Josiah, "that thy poor mother's sharp tongue will not make things harder for thy father and for us all."

"Well, I don't precisely want any more idle spells in Horsham gale," said William Garton dryly. "It's a kind of gentleman's life which doesn't suit me. I would rather that the priest should spoil my goods and leave my body at liberty for my farm work."

BOOK REVIEWS.

"RELIGIOUS FOUNDATIONS."*

"The true spiritual drama of the last hundred years is to be found in the struggle of the soul of man to hold its own, and to re-assert itself victoriously in the face of paralyzing immensities progressively revealed by the natural sciences. This is the statement (page 46) of Willard L. Sperry, Dean of the Harvard Divinity School, in his chapter, "What Shall We Think of Nature?" in this little book. Dean Sperry's statement is the real clue to the purpose of the volume.

Here are ten studies, by eight eminent scholars, who have approached candidly and devoutly the religious problems raised by modern intellectual and social advance. The chapters deal progressively with God, Christ, Man, Nature, Human Relationships, the Bible, the Kingdom of God, Evil, Modern Progress, the Life Beyond.

The last chapter, on the Life Beyond, deals with the most difficult subject, and seems least satisfying to the reviewer. Professor Peabody's view is good and beautiful as far as it goes, but there are many modern scholars who could have gone more directly and helpfully to the question that comes perennially and inevitably to the average, unsophisticated seeker, "If a man die, shall he live again?"

In fact, the high water mark of the book is in the first three chapters, by Rufus M. Jones. His studies of God, and Christ, and Man, are written with a sure hand, and carry his readers to high levels. He concludes with this great saying: "So we do not need to go somewhere to find God. We only need to be something. We need to hate our sin and failure, our pettiness and narrowness of vision, to come back home from the arid land of the stranger, and to rise from our isolated, solitary aims and be merged in life and love and spirit with Him who is knocking at our souls, and lo! we have found Him and He is ours and we are His."

The book is of special interest to Friends because its publication was made possible by the funds of the Haverford College

"A DIARY FOR THE THANKFUL HEARTED."*

This uplifting book, as the name implies, contains quotations for daily reading, prose and poetry, from authors ancient and modern. The selections are calculated to cheer those who have met with misfortune, or trouble of one kind or another, and who desire to look on the bright side of life.

The author herself has tasted of bitter cups; she found that tiredness and pain were getting the better of courage; by earnestly seeking for spiritual uplift, hope and gratitude sprang up in her heart as she culled from many sources the selections which appear in this most helpful book.

We quote: "Joy of heart lies in the fact that every stop of life we can be dispelling shadows," and: "Do you ever stop to think how full this world is of 'o' things to love, if your heart's just big enough to let 'em in?"

We quote further: "Thou awakest us to delight in Thy praise; for Thou made us for Thyself, and our heart is restless until it repose in Thee." Again:

"Peace! perfect peace! with loved ones far away?"

In Jesus' keeping we are safe, and they."

"My dead soul heard His voice and by His voice was made to live. So through the righteous law of life in Christ Jesus, I was made free."

"Faith in Christ removes both fear of death and weariness in life."

"Every day I rise with a sweet consciousness that God loves me, and cares for me. I rejoice that in my own life, what exceeds in value all other things, is what I can share."

The book is a volume of comfort and gratitude, intended to bring refreshment when life seems difficult.

HADDONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING.

Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting was held at Haddonfield, Third Month 15, 1923. The reverent silence into which the company settled was broken by words of prayer. We were urged to remember that the Lord has need of each one of us. Only when we are willing to obey His call can He work through us for the redemption of mankind. Various incidents in the Bible were cited which prove the Sonship of Jesus Christ. "By the grace of God I am what I am." This text was emphasized in an earnest appeal to home-makers. The preservation of the family altar, the exercise of silent prayer; in short, lives of parents filled with the Spirit of the Master, made possible by the "Grace of God," tend to implant in the life of the child strength to resist temptations and lead him to learn for himself the joys of a Christian life.

After lunch the business meeting was held as usual in joint session. The incident of Mary and Martha was quoted. We should not avoid the "much serving," but may we be not "cumbered" with it, for in His service there is perfect freedom.

The reading of the answers to the Queries brought the Meeting under exercise and called forth several helpful messages. The importance of Scripture reading was dwelt upon. No matter how overwhelming our problems may seem, our Father will, as we read, reveal the promises, and we shall come to feel the overflowing of His love. If young people find the Scriptures uninteresting, ask them to pray that the Bible truths may be opened to them.

A desire was expressed that we may not neglect to encourage latent possibilities for service, remembering that if we desire our young or our new members to take part in the affairs of the Church, we should not be unmindful of the force of example and should be willing to do our share. There are about us many who have resisted the upward pull of God's love. If our light be hidden, may we speedily remove the covering and allow God to use us for the spread of His kingdom.

An interesting letter was read from William C. and Elizabeth C. B. Allen, written at Hobart, Tasmania, telling of Gospel services there and in Java and Australia. The Quarterly Meeting entered into sympathy with them.

From Chester Monthly Meeting came the suggestion for a re-writing of the Discipline, in order to correct inaccuracies now existing. After consideration the subject was directed to be forwarded to the Yearly Meeting.

A Friend explained the concern, which had arisen in the Meeting of Ministers and Elders, that the front seats in our Meetings might be occupied. Thus would we be knit more closely together.

The Quarterly Meeting Messenger Committee presented a brief report. Approval of the paper was expressed and the Committee continued.

"A QUAKER IN MAIN STREET."

(Reprinted from The New Republic, Third Month 14, 1923.)

A certain eminent man went to Russia last year at the height of the famine to investigate and report conditions. He went through the country in a Government Special with every comfort and luxury the Soviets could afford. It was cold in Russia, and he did not leave that comfortable car; he made his observations from the windows. In the famine districts Quaker relief workers came to the train and begged him to go with them through their desolate and starving villages, and let them show him the actual situation. He did not care to go. There was after all danger of typhus, danger of cholera. He could see quite enough from the car windows. He came home to America and gave a very cheerful report.

We in America have seen the Russian famine from a very comfortable and much more remote car window. We have seen it from the train de luxe of our own national comfort and prosperity. Shall we get out and risk a personally conducted tour with one of these Quakers? We risk only our mental comfort, after all; there is no danger of typhus at this distance.

Murray S. Kenworthy, until last summer Chief of the Russian Unit of the American Friends' Service Committee, is going about the country with the story of what he saw in Russia. He works hard, hurrying from city to city; speaking as many times a day as he can get a hearing. He may well hurry, for it is time and death he is racing with. He knows that in his province at least the famine is not broken, that conditions are little better than they were last year. And the Quakers have not enough money to keep even the people they are feeding now alive till harvest. Suppose we listen to him as he spoke the other day at a prominent women's club on one of our main streets.

It is the weekly luncheon, and some of the members are a little vague about what they have come to hear. "The Russian Famine, my dear?" one of the ladies flutters. "Isn't that rather gruesome?" I thought it was Russian Folk-songs, this week. And I made such an effort to come! I must have got it mixed up with the Persian Folk-songs in the lecture the other day. Charming, wasn't it? So unusual! . . . Well, well, I suppose there still is a famine over there, but isn't it mostly over? They say the Soviets are exporting grain. . . . But perhaps we ought to hear about it."

Kenworthy begins colorlessly, conventionally enough. His first few sentences might have been spoken by anyone. Perhaps you are a bit disappointed. He is in no way picturesque. He is a tall, weather-beaten man, hard-bitten, very direct and simple, with none of the arts and graces of speech-making, no gifts of personality to help him tell his story; only his stark sincerity, the nakedness of his terrible knowledge.

And then, subtly, you realize that the atmosphere has changed; it has become electric, tense, charged with an unknown voltage. He is speaking about Russia. He is saying what he came to say. Like a knife-edge that message rips through the husks of common manners, the trappings of common speech, cuts that smug atmosphere to the quick of your very soul. It is not a man speaking at all. Something elemental, appalling, speaks through him; it is the cry of Russia's agony you hear in that level voice. He speaks quietly of unspeakable things. He does not comment or color or sentimentalize. He lets the facts speak.

You think, perhaps, you knew something about Russia; you have read things about the famine. Never anything like this. It is a transfer of experience. "I suppose you never heard the cry of a starving child," says the Quaker. You have heard it after Kenworthy speaks; God forgive you if you ever forget it. The man has stepped aside, self-forgetful, forgotten. He bids you look for yourself into the famine districts, into that ghastly inferno of suffering and desolation and heroic fortitude. No art could paint that picture like the naked immediacy of this speech. And you look on in a kind of numbed horror, seeing what he has seen. What is it you see through those haunted eyes of his?

Samara, where whole villages died. A country of barren steppes, timberless, snowbound. A temperature 40 to 55 degrees below zero. No food but grass bread, no fuel but stable dung. Whole villages starving; the dead lying in the streets where they fell, or heaped "like cord-wood" in the churchyard—stripped of their last rag always, "for the dead do not need that which the living must have." Parents tie their famished children when they leave them at home alone, lest they do one another an injury. For in that country cannibalism is no strange thing; children have been known to set upon their playmates; even today there are people driven by hunger who keep alive on human flesh.

In the orphan homes there is no bedding or blankets; the children, dressed most of them only in little shirts, huddle together for warmth on the bare slats or boards. In some they lie on the floor so thick that a visitor entering must step over the little bodies. Homes crowded to suffocation, crowded so that starving and freezing babies must be turned away. Those who bring them unload the sledges, leave the children lying in the snow before the doors and drive off. There is no chance of life for them at home; here someone may still have pity.

In the courtyards are piled the dead children. Sledges drive around, collecting them in the mornings, but often the sledges are overladen and they may be left lying there for days or weeks. There are no living children under three years.

Whom to save and whom to leave to die? With rations but for a fraction of the starving people, that is the terrible decision that the relief missions must face. "What would you do?" he puts the problem to us. "Should we save the strongest, the young people most capable of carrying on the race, of ploughing and sowing, letting the old people and the children die? Should we save the children only—multiplying the already huge problem of an orphan population? If we save the children alone, who is to care for them? Single families? Selected villages?" At last the children are chosen, since without the American food they are most sure to die. Old people are tougher; they must take their chance.

And then the other side, the nameless heroisms! Those peasant fathers and mothers who died before relief could reach them, leaving food enough in the house so that the children might hold out till the Quakers came. Those starving sledge-drivers, scarcely able to stand, who brought the children's food safe to its destination. Those bandits who would not touch the Quaker stores, desperate men as they were, when they understood that America had sent them to the starving Russian children. "Can we ask more of Russia?" Of the steadfast heroism of the relief workers we hear nothing. Only from a casual parenthesis, "That day I caught the typhus," do we gather how lightly men and women hold their lives to whom typhus is, as it was to this man, all in the day's work.

"There are whole regions," he ends, "where no relief has ever penetrated. In one village we knew of, the people last fall, feeling they could not live till spring, went out to the churchyard and dug their own graves, knowing that no friends of theirs would be strong enough when the time came to dig them. We have had recent orders to extend our feeding to that district—but there is not enough food or money to carry those people through till harvest."

Abruptly, without any appeal for money, he sits down. It is over. There is a dead silence; then a woman bursts out, "Tell us the quickest way to help!" She is the lady of the folk-songs, but she does not seem to want them any longer. There are a few other questions, a few announcements. The spell is broken, and we find that we can laugh and chat about other things as we go on about "our business and desire—such as it is." But we have been strangely moved, and when we go home we shall probably send a check to the Quakers—oh, small enough to be quite sure it does not interfere with any plans for our own amusement. Perhaps after all we might not be so careful this time; perhaps it wouldn't hurt us to cut out a few things? After all, those people are dying . . . and in torment. . . . How shall we write that check?

How can a man endure it? This precipice of indifference, preoccupation, apathy? This beating against closed doors, closed souls? Appealing for a situation unthinkable from a plane of experience alien as another planet? And all the time, days passing, death gaining in the race. So the prophets of old must have spoken what the Lord put in their mouth. Is it nothing to you, O ye that pass by? Yet he is not embittered. Out of that frozen hell he has brought, incredibly, sanity and sweetness. What gives him this immortal patience?

"The sun set, but set not his hope."
It is perhaps the grace of God.

FRIENDS' FOREIGN MISSION ASSOCIATION.

There is an urgent need for a woman doctor for our hospital at Itarsi, C. P., India.

Itarsi is a growing town with a population of about 8,000. It is an important railway junction and is surrounded by many villages without medical aid. A small women's hospital was opened in 1914; it has beds for about twelve patients, but others are accommodated on the verandah when necessary. Three separate huts and a rest house just outside the gates are frequently occupied by men who come for treatment. In 1921 some 6,000 out-patients were seen. The European doctor in charge is due to leave for furlough in the early part of 1925 and cannot return.

We need a doctor with all-round experience, including surgery and operative midwifery and one not afraid of work in rather primitive conditions. She should go out within the next year or so. I shall be very happy to give further details to any intending applicants.

uttered will remain as clear in memory as that almost pulsating silence.

In the evening the regular meeting at Twelfth Street was much better attended than sometimes. There were seven Ministers present, but only two took vocal part. We were reminded that the water of life is found deep down, and that if our well runs dry, we must dig it deeper. Prayer was offered for various conditions present, and for the coming Yearly Meeting, that it might be a time when young men should see visions and the old men dream dreams.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.—The School has greatly appreciated the visits from time to time throughout the year of various English Friends who have been in this country. The most recent of these visitors have been A. Neave Brayshaw, who spent several days at the School, and J. Rowntree Gillett, who was here over a week-end. The mingling of these Friends with our student body, and the interchange of opinion on religious, educational and political questions, is most valuable.

The following have been chosen to read essays at Commencement:—Mary E. Harold, Edna E. Wetherald, Mary R. Worth, John E. Parker, William B. Test, Valetorian.

Through the Alumni Committee on Science and Museums, a balopticon has recently been added to the equipment of the science department in Industrial Hall.

The girls' Gymnasium Meet was held on the last Seventh-day of the winter term; the Senior Class won first place in the class contests, and Ruth H. Brinton and Rebecca L. Wills were tied for first honors in the individual competition. Our basketball teams have been unusually successful this year, the girls winning all their games and the boys all but one.

On the practical side of their study of trees this winter, the members of the Botany class have been engaged in the interesting activity of the making of maple syrup. Most of the maple trees on the campus have been tapped, and a good amount of syrup has been made.

Through various activities the boys and girls have raised about two hundred dollars as a contribution toward Russian relief; in addition, a saving of one hundred and twenty dollars has been made through the holding of occasional "Russian meals," the menu for that meal consisting only of soup and brown bread, the saving to the School thus obtained being turned over to the Russian relief fund.

At a recent session of Germantown Monthly Meeting, a letter signed by the Clerks, Thomas Wistar and Marion H. Emlen, addressed to Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State, was issued.

Following the introductory paragraph the letter proceeds:—"We are profoundly concerned regarding the widespread misery, the economic disorder, and the international antagonisms and conflicts in which so many nations are now plunged. Most of all we are disturbed by the menace of future war which these conditions contain. It seems to us intolerable that human beings should be subjected to the yet greater savageries and more terrible destructiveness of another great war, and we urge with all the force at our command that the world must not be allowed to drift to such a catastrophe.

"It seems to us that our country, if it will devote itself to the task, can exert a powerful, perhaps controlling, influence to avert future wars. To do this we must be willing as a nation to join with other nations for the settlement of difficulties by conference. An association of nations for this purpose seems to us to offer a practical alternative to war, and we appeal to you with deep earnestness to do whatever can be done to have the United States adopt a constructive policy in this direction."

A word of appreciation of the fine leadership shown by

Secretary Hughes at the Washington Disarmament Conference last winter, is expressed and the letter concludes as follows:—

"The increased military preparedness which some are urging as the accompaniment of a policy of isolation is, we feel, a step in the wrong direction. We hope that in the approaching Pan-American Conference you will find further opportunity to carry forward resolutely, in faith, the organization of the world for peace.

"Finally, we pray that both wisdom and strength may be given you in these difficult times to express the best that is in our great nation and to advance God's Kingdom on the earth."

WILBUR K. THOMAS, of the Friends' Service Committee, sailed for Europe last week and is now probably in Paris. His schedule includes Austria, Poland and Berlin in the order given. At Berlin he expects to meet Rufus M. Jones, now traveling in Palestine.

W. K. T. hopes to be able to return in the very early summer.

J. ROWNTREE GILLET sailed for England on the 24th. He has been in this country for almost seven months and has visited widely and very acceptably among us. With headquarters in Philadelphia he has traveled into Quaker centres as far south as North Carolina and as far east and north as New England. In the early autumn he attended the Richmond Conference and from there went to Leavenworth, Kansas, to meet with the political prisoners confined there. Later he made the round of Philadelphia Meetings, including almost all of them; the past few weeks he has been within the limits of New York Meetings.

He leaves us now with the feeling of honest regret on our part that his visit could not have been a little lengthened to include quite all the meetings and Friends' neighborhoods, but with the regret is mingled in very large measure the feeling of thankfulness for the help and stimulation he has given us. We wish him a safe return to his home land and family, and should the Master again call him to our country, we can assure him of a hearty welcome.

Is there a Friend in America who has not seen Part I of the New London Discipline? To date 17,500 copies have come from the press. We should all read it carefully.

includes a letter from Robert Barclay, written from Aberdeen prison, 1676, and addressed to four of the daughters of Judge and Margaret Fell, also the original letter written by William Penn in 1690, addressed to Margaret Fell Fox containing an account of the death of George Fox.

GEORGE G. WILLIAMS and wife, formerly of Moorestown, N. J., and more recently from Whittier, California, are now in England, engaged in religious service. The Friend (London) states that they have paid an acceptable visit to the work being carried on at the Garden Village Hall, Hull, by the evangelistic band of the Friends' Prayer League.

A MESSAGE comes from English Friends in Germany that plans are maturing for a General Meeting of German Friends to be held early this summer.

Local conferences are being held in Frankfurt, Stuttgart and Nurnberg. Our informant says: "American Friends are rendering much helpful service, their presence at this time in Germany is especially timely.

In this connection we are informed by a London Friend that the "Membership Committee" recommended the admission of several applicants in Germany and in one Austria.

THE Baptist Times has had a correspondence on the subject of Women Ministers. In the final letter, Mackenzie Bell, a Presbyterian, expressed the opinion that on one point all must agree, "that is, that not even the Bible, not even the Church is the supreme rule of Christian conduct. It is the witness of the Holy Ghost who 'guides into all truth.' For more than two hundred and fifty years the Society of Friends has stood for purity of religion, and have 'turned many to righteousness,' and they have always possessed the ministry of women."

WRITTEN in China in the spring of last year, Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin's book, "The Christian Revolution," has just issued from the Swarthmore Press; it forms the seventeenth volume in the "Christian Revolution Series."

DIED.—Third Month 12, 1923, at his home in Mount Vernon, New York, STEPHEN GOULD CARR, seventy-two years of age; formerly of Jamestown, R. I., a member of the South Kingtown Monthly Meeting of Friends.

TEACHER WANTED—For the school year, 1923-24. The Germantown Friends' School expects to appoint an assistant Primary teacher to help pupils backward in their work, to substitute for other teachers and to generally assist in the Primary department. Some experience required. For information, address STANLEY R. YARNALL, Principal, Germantown, Philadelphia.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING, 1923.

II.

The general Yearly Meeting began on Second-day, Third Month 26th, in joint session, and all sessions were joint this year, except that on Fourth-day morning, when the Queries were read and answered. Many Friends, of varying ages and viewpoints, expressed their hope that the advantages of holding some of the meetings separately would not be lost to sight.

Of the 138 representatives only five were absent at the time of the roll-call. The first item of business was the proposal of the Indian Committee to unite their work for Tunesassa with the more general labors of the Indian Aid Association, of which Edward M. Wistar gave the meeting an enlightening account. This matter was referred to a special committee, with instructions to report to the Yearly Meeting next year. It was interesting to be reminded that Friends' concern for the Indians, apart from the individual efforts of persons like John Woolman, dates from 1795 or earlier.

The report of the Committee on Christian Labor in Foreign Lands, with its specific plan for organization of an official missionary board, with subordinate committees in the Monthly Meetings, was approved. The Yearly Meeting, by this action, takes over the work heretofore zealously but unofficially carried on by the Missionary Association.

It was decided to continue until next year the committee to audit the accounts of the Yearly Meeting Treasurer and to prepare a proposed budget. This will enable the work to be attended to before the week of Yearly Meeting, and will be more practical than the present scheme.

A proposition forwarded from Chester Monthly Meeting, New Jersey, by Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting, to revise and in part rewrite the present Book of Discipline, was referred to a special committee, to be appointed later in the week. Practical difficulties in working under our present rules were pointed out, and the meeting appeared united in attempting the revision, though well aware that sometime we need revising quite as much as the Discipline.

Some twenty-two letters had been received during the year.

William Bishop reported for the Committee to examine such communications, and proposed the reading of ten of them, as follows: Letters from Cheng-tu Yearly Meeting, West China; Australia General Meeting; Brumanna Three Months' Meeting; a Yearly Meeting held at Stuttgart, Germany; Fritchley General Meeting, England; the "covering letter", accompanying the General Epistle from London; and letters from the Conservative Yearly Meetings in New England, Iowa and Ohio, together with an address sent up by a group of members of our own Yearly Meeting (of which more later). The other communications were all reported on verbally, and had all been suitably acknowledged; they were of such a character that it scarcely seemed necessary to read them, nor had most of them been written with that in view. In the letter from China one phrase seemed especially discerning; our age was described as a time "when selfishness is uppermost, and brotherly love ends in words."

At the annual meeting of the First-day School Association, Walter W. Haviland reported on the preparation of a proposed course of study for our First-day and week-day schools, with definite recommendations. A. Neave Brayshaw spoke upon the "Approach to the Study of the Bible," quoting the Bishop of Durham's advice to "Read the Bible the same as you would read any other book, and you will soon discover that it is not the same as any other book." Following this meeting, Federal Commissioner Roy A. Haynes spoke to the Temperance Association very optimistically on the effects of the Eighteenth Amendment.

Third-day, the 27th.—The Representatives reported on the matter of Clerks for this year, proposing the continuance of all six, as follows: Davis H. Forsythe and Anna Rhoads Ladd, Clerks, and John D. Carter, Mary R. Williams, Francis R. Taylor and Sarah Emlen Moore, Assistants.

A letter from a group in our own meeting, concerned for a more earnest spirit of evangelism, brought the meeting under exercise, that we might know what was right for us, and be dedicated enough to carry it through. This brief letter we hope to publish in full later.

A much-appreciated letter, just arrived, from William C. and Elizabeth C. B. Allen, addressed to the Meeting of Ministers and Elders (whose sessions were over for this year), was read, and appreciated. A committee was appointed to consider, with the similar group from the Ministers and Elders' meeting, the best arrangement of our Yearly Meeting sessions next year. They reported later that if Friends would be willing next year to utilize Sixth-day afternoon and Seventh-day, if necessary, they felt that we could plan to convene at the usual time and still avoid the present pressure. The Minutes of the Representative Meeting, arranged typically, were entered upon. A gain of 48 members for the year was noted, making our total membership 4,541.

The proposed revised Fifth and Eighth Queries (dealing with amusements and moderation in business) were seriously considered and adopted. Both at this time, and at a later session, the weighty words of William Penn (in the Preface to Fox's Journal) were revived where he "calls aloud" to those that know the truth, yet are "content only to know truth for yourselves, to go to meetings, and exercise an ordinary charity in the church and an honest behavior in the world, and limit yourselves within those bounds, feeling little or no concern upon your spirits. . . . more than to be glad that others succeed in such service."

Walter H. Hancock reported interestingly upon the vigorous

Friends' Meeting in the great city (now fourth in population) of Detroit. A proposal to send delegates to the World Conference on Faith and Order, to be held in Washington in 1925, was approved. Birthright membership, as appeared from the Minutes of those Quarterly Meetings not reporting last year, has now been sustained by all seven of them.

*Fourth-day, the 25th (separate sessions).—*The fourteen Queries, with their answers, were taken up and summary answers adopted. Especially pertinent comment was made to the Second, in the matter of indiscreet criticism of others in the presence of children, and the temptation to "hit off" the foibles of our acquaintances in ways more "clever" than kind. We were reminded that Tennyson described King Arthur as one who spoke no scandal—no, nor listened to it. There were eighteen more children of school age than a year ago.

In the afternoon (joint session) the report of the Extension Committee was read. Six new Pennsbury Leaflets have been published during the year, bringing the list up to a score, and many thousands of copies have been distributed. A plan is maturing to place brief essays (about two hundred words) in some 4,000 county newspapers, through a syndicate which has offered to accept our material. A departure from the usual procedure occurred when, by request, the Minutes of visiting Friends were read in the general Yearly Meeting. Besides those noted last week, we listened to the Minutes of L. Oscar Moon, of Detroit, and Samuel P. Haworth, and his wife, of High Point, N. C.

Report was made of the important conference held last summer at Bluffton, Ohio, of those Christian bodies definitely opposed to war. Representatives were in attendance from the Brethren, Mennonites, Friends and Schwenkfelders. The delegation, appointed by this meeting last year, was continued, as there is a prospect of further conferences the present year. The fraternal delegates to the Five Years' Meeting reported, and John R. Cary, Clerk, who had come up from Baltimore expressly, supplemented this report. The delegates to the Two Hundred and Fiftieth Anniversary of Baltimore Yearly Meeting likewise made a report at this time, as did the Peace Committee. Stanley R. Yarnall is the newly appointed Chairman of this last committee. In connection with this work and that of the American Friends' Service Committee, Murray S. Kenworthy made an impressive plea for Russia.

*Fifth-day, the 26th.—*Meetings for worship were held at Arch Street and Twelfth Street, and a Children's Meeting in the East Room of the Arch Street house. As usual the largest of these was the first-mentioned. Our Friends Zebedee Haines and Max I. Reich were led out into extensive service early in the meeting, and a sense of God's presence seemed to cover the gathering. It is believed that the occasion was a time of real blessing to many present.

In the afternoon we heard the reports of the various nominating committees appointed earlier in the week. These brought forward lists of names for the following standing committees: American Friends' Service (our representation), Missionary Board, Revision of the Discipline, and the Indian School at Quaker Bridge, N. Y. The Social Order Committee reported, as did the Educational Committee and that charged with the administration of Westtown School. Gratitude was expressed for the faithful work of the Superintendent of our smaller schools, Olive R. Haviland, and for the unselfish decision of George L. and Lydia T. Jones to remain at Westtown one year more. Westtown has had an enrollment the past year of 235, an increase of thirty, with just one more girl than there were boys. Twelve pupils have taken advantage of the provision for admitting those with one parent a member. As a result of the $250,000 campaign in 1919, some $260,000 have been received to date. The orchards yielded 18,000 baskets of apples and peaches.

In the evening a large audience listened attentively to Kirby Page, who spoke on the present world situation and the urgent need for the calling of an economic conference, where generosity and recognition of responsibility shall take the place of insistence on rights and a policy of isolation.

*Sixth-day, the 30th.—*A minute was adopted, to be sent to Harrisburg, re-affirming our disapproval of gambling and protesting against the bill recently introduced into the Legislature for the purpose of legalizing horse-racing and betting.

The Committee to Visit our Subordinate Meetings presented a deeply impressive report. It was hoped that this service might come to be even more practical and helpful in character. Several Friends wished that the practice of family visiting and shepherding the flock might be revived, and the value of that prophetic ministry which speaks to definite conditions and needs was dwelt upon. Letters were next read, prepared by a special committee set apart on Third-day, addressed to Friends in Germany, Cheng-tu, London, Fritchley General Meeting, Ohio and Iowa (Conservative), Australia, New England (at Westerly, R. I.), and Japan, and the Clerks were, in addition, asked to send a letter, "with our warm love" to William C. and Elizabeth C. B. Allen, now in South Africa. Edith F. Sharpless, home on furlough, spoke about Japanese Friends, and Walter L. Moore on Iowa and their school. It was felt that the Epistle to Germany might properly be sent to groups in Austria, Poland and Russia, as well. Joseph H. Haines felt that it would be helpful to add to the letters addressed to Friends on this continent a statement of our attitude, expressed in a minute which it had been previously decided to forward to the President and other high officials at Washington, regarding the desirability of this country's participating in some sort of association or league of nations and especially supporting the World Court at The Hague.

The Committee on Inter-racial Relations made a most stimulating report, supplemented by John T. Emlen and Esther M. Smith. Stanley R. Yarnall introduced in writing a protest to be placed in the hands of the Philadelphia Board of Education and the Superintendent of Schools, against the War Department's scheme for summer camps for the military training of school-boys. Alfred G. Scattergood, Margaret M. Cary and Charles James Rhoads were delegated to present this protest in person. It was decided that a similar delegation should express to Governor Pinchot the satisfaction of this Meeting in the passing of the recent law against saloons in Pennsylvania. The auditors proposed the raising of $26,970 for the use of the Meeting the coming year. The Fiduciary Corporation made its annual statement.

An extended and carefully prepared "Minute of Exercises," reviewing the various concerns which had seemed to take hold of the Yearly Meeting during the week, was read and helped to bring the Meeting once more into an earnest striving to know and to fulfil our Lord's requirements. This Minute we hope to publish next week. It was felt by many that the spiritual tides had risen, at times, unusually high this year, and we felt deeply grateful. The Meeting then concluded.

BEULAH M. RHOADS.

Let us go out on a summer morning and gather a basket of damask roses—then crumble the petals, dry them, add spices and put them in a jar where the fragrance will remain for a century; lift the lid occasionally, that the room may be sweetened thereby with such pot-pourri.

There are lives that resemble this and we wish to preserve them in our memory; such a one was Beulah M. Rhoads.

She could not remember her mother, but her father devoted himself to his three children and when he saw a passionate nature in this daughter he explained to her the consequences and prayed with her, so that at the age of seven she conquered such tendencies, becoming amiable and self-controlled, an illustration of Divine Grace prevailing. She wore the Friends' dress from childhood and loved it.

Moving to Germantown in 1835 to the old house once occupied by Washington, suburban life began; rambles on the Wissahickon, play and school with Jane B. Haines's children, then Westtown, the real country.

Reaching womanhood, she was thrown into close contact with an uncongenial woman and one day Beulah said: "Let us pray together, that we may be more harmonious"—so as time went on this request was granted.

After her father's death in 1859, she spent ten years at Olney with the family of her brother, Samuel Morris, a teacher and guide to the little ones there, enjoying outdoor life; the saddle was better than medicine, for her gouty tendency was counteracted as she would spring off her horse after a fine gallop. The publication of the Life of Mary Capper and other religious booklets also occupied this period.

When she married Charles Rhoads in 1870, she was an inspiration to his four children in her playing games with them, her rambles after wild flowers, her knowledge of birdlore and her devotion to astronomy. Thus she found in nature the relaxation necessary for the well-rounded man and woman.

So active was she in flitting about the house and garden that she would often say "it makes me tired to walk slowly." Gymnastics therefore she practiced enthusiastically—sure that "this exercise is more important the older we grow." It was the continuity of the child-heart that made her so lovable—"the child shall die one hundred years old" was a text that fitted her. Yet a sweet seriousness accompanied her in Hadonfield Meeting where she was a beloved Elder, and her occasional message, spoken in simplicity, found entrance to all hearts.

The secret of the good cheer that animated Beulah M. Rhoads was her abounding trust in the merits of her Saviour, a deep underlying confidence in His deity and "in His power to save to the uttermost."

The Westtown students gave her a welcome as a "Committee Friend" for she would seat herself beside one of the girls at her desk, put her arm around her and have a motherly talk. She had lost her own little daughter aged nine months, and so her heart went out to all young people.

In the ministerial labors of her husband and his varied efforts for the upbuilding of our Church, she entered zealously.

When he was often laid low with ill-health, she would say "he is never so lovely as when he is sick," so her sympathy made her a good nurse.

Her habit was to read hymns to each other while dressing early in the morning, starting the day with praise and ending it with family Bible reading, maintaining an atmosphere of devotion natural to both.

After his death she believed she would not long survive him, yet twenty years more brought her to the extreme old age of ninety-four.

A new test of patience she bore bravely, as the active body was curtailed by lameness, yet she continued to attend meeting—to ride out daily to welcome her relatives and to walk "over the way" to see her sisters-in-law. Her sight and hearing were unimpaired and for this she expressed thankfulness.

No pain or disease came at the last, just a gradual ripening and a breathing fainter and fainter.

About the time of her passing away, I watched the occultation of Venus, which as predicted seemed a small globe of radiance as the planet touched the crescent moon until it was eclipsed, and then the sunrise glow obliterated these lesser lights.

How she would have enjoyed it, had not she herself been on the verge of a transit, a temporary eclipse, and then the glory of eternal day.

Address to the Class of 1922 at Tunesassa.

Charles P. Morlan.

When my dear friend, your Superintendent, invited me to address you on this eventful day, I thought, "How can I talk to Indians? I do not know their ways and their manner of thinking, I have not partaken of their trials and joys, how can I say anything that will interest or help them?"

But, as I thought thus, memory went racing back to a time when I was a student at a boarding school somewhat like this one. One of the boys came to me, his face aglow with interest, and asked me to come into the class-room to see an Indian from Tunesassa who was writing names on cards for some of the boys.

That was my first introduction to a real Indian, but he was not like the Indians I had read about or the pictures I had seen. He was dressed much as I was and could talk good English. His skill with the pen impressed us boys as something wonderful.

This acquaintance left with me a lasting impression of respect, interest and love for Indians, which has grown as the years have passed and which helped to make me glad to come here to-day to mingle with you and to know you more intimately.

So I do not come to you as a stranger, but rather as a brother, believing that you have many of the same kind of problems to solve that we have; that you have your trials as we do; that joy and gladness feel to you as they do to us, and that sorrow presses upon your hearts just as heavily as it does upon ours; therefore I am going to talk to you very much as I would to my own people.

I want to congratulate you who dwell on these Reservations that you have in your midst a school where your children can come to be educated under the care of such excellent men and women as your Superintendent and Matron and teachers. They have made sacrifices to leave their homes and come here to live with and work with you and your children. They do it because they love you and because they believe that the Great Spirit wants us all to live as brothers and to be helpful to one another.

And now my friends, the class of 1922, it certainly is a pleasure to me to be permitted to talk to you at this crowning moment in your school life here. I know something about what this hour means to you, because I have been through a similar experience; I know something of what it has cost you, too. There were many weary days of hard toil and study, of trials and temptations, successes and failures, times when you were discouraged and almost ready to give up, but you did not, you clung to the mast through all the storms, and this hour brings you the victory. You have reached the goal for which you were striving. But this is only a milestone in your lives, it is not the end of the journey. However, it is a good time to pause and measure yourselves. It is a good time to set before you new goals to be won. To push up your ideals a little higher and to buckle on the armor of determination which will win the next victory.

You have finished your school life here, now you go out to other schools, or to the great school of life, that university of which we are all members. And we, who have been trying to learn its lessons these many years welcome you among us, and extend to you the hand of fellowship. We want to be unselfish enough to wish you greater success in becoming worth-while members of its classes than some of us have achieved in the university of life. Time does not pause, but rushes us on through its various scenes like some monster motor car, sometimes bearing us over dusty roads where our eyes are filled with sand and we are stifled by the dust-laden air; then beside rippling streams where we are refreshed by cooling breezes from the sparkling waters. How we long to linger here! But the great motor Time does not stop, but carries us up the steep and rocky hillside, and we cling for dear life to all that is strong and sturdy. On we go into the land of mists and clouds until our vision is befogged and we know not where we are—then the light begins to dawn and we are soon traveling through beautiful fields studded with flowers and sweet with their delicate perfume. Such is life—made up of sunshine and shadow, storm and calm, joy and sorrow, work and rest, disappointment and victory. You have known something of it already; but the years that lie before you will reveal these things in larger measure.

Let us talk of some of the things which will help you to live lives that are full of gladness and service and faith and love. Such lives are worth-while. They are full to overflowing with usefulness and joy, but they do not come to us unbidden, they cost effort and struggle. We never get anything worth having without paying for it. It may not cost money, but it costs something. It may be sacrifice of personal comfort, it may be hard work, it may be the giving up of something we dearly love. So, if we want to possess what is worth having, we must make up our minds to pay the price. Just as the winning of these diplomas has cost you effort and sacrifice, so will your future successes and victories, and the more valuable they are to you the higher will be the price, and likewise the higher the price you pay the greater will be the value you will receive.

Now, whenever you reach a goal or approach an ideal, make it a point to set that goal a little higher, so you will always be making an effort to reach beyond what you have already attained. Remember that as soon as we stop progressing we begin to slip back. There is no standing still in life. The secret is that we must find something new in our daily round of duties. Life is mostly made up of routine. Of drudgery, if we choose to call it that—I do not like the name, because if we are wide awake we shall be learning some new thing about our work every day, and it will cease to be uninteresting. The farmer must go about his duties day after day and week after week and year after year, feeding his stock, milking his cows, sowing his seed, cultivating and harvesting his crops; it sounds monotonous, doesn't it? So the housekeeper has her round of duties. She must cook the food, prepare the meals, wash the dishes, make the garments, sweep the house, wash the clothes, do the mending, day after day, year in and year out. All routine! And if the farmer and the housekeeper just perform the daily duties in the same way, day after day, they have ceased to progress, and like the shaft in a machine which turns round and round in its bearings, they are constantly wearing smaller and smaller. They are making machines of themselves. But if the farmer wants to grow, and wants to make life worth living, he must learn something new about farming every day. The housewife must think as she sews and sweeps. She will study the proper kind of food and how to serve it to best promote the health of her family. She will learn the value of fresh air in her home and will use her knowledge and influence to make her family the healthiest and happiest in the community. Others about her will catch her spirit and the whole neighborhood will live better and more efficient lives for her influence, and she will be glad to share her new discoveries with others, for as she gives of her knowledge to others, she develops her own mind. We grow as much through what we give out as through what we take in. In the same way the farmer grows by thinking while he is at his everyday work. By keeping his eyes open and his mind on the alert, he discovers that his cows thrive best on certain combinations of food. He asks himself why this is true, and in his investigations he discovers the science of the balanced ration. His sharp eye finds a new kind of insect which is destroying his corn. He immediately watches it, learns its habits, and finds a means of destroying it, or preventing its ravages. While cultivating his crops he has plenty of time to think and he invents a better machine for preparing the soil or destroying the weeds. His neighbors soon see by his fine cows and his good crops, that he knows how to farm and they come to him for advice, and he becomes the means of improving the farming of his whole community. He is happy, because he is of service to his fellow-men.

One of the greatest problems in the world is to get people to think. To get them to grow. We cannot make one another grow. Growing is a process which comes from the inside. Each one must do it for himself. I cannot make you grow. You cannot make me grow. Our teachers cannot make us grow. They may inspire us and show us how, but the real growing is the result of our own efforts, yours for you and mine for me. Our minds will grow in proportion to the way we use the talents which we already have. There are wonderful possibilities of growth for everyone of us. Very few are using their faculties to their full capacity. As the ball player, whose arm is weak and inaccurate when he begins to play, gradually gains strength as he practices and is finally able to send the ball whirling right over the home plate, so our minds grow strong in the power to think, to recognize truth, to plan and to execute, in proportion to the way we use them.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

A PAIR OF OXEN—1699.

He had hardly spoken, when the sound of horses' feet was heard in the winding lane which led to the fine old farmhouse of Bonwicks' Place, and to their dismay they recognized the Rector of the Parish, whom all old writers call "Hen Hallywell," with his servant and churchwarden, and evidently in no good humor.

"Hi, there!" he shouted to Josiah, who was driving his favorites into the yard out of sight. "Just bring those bullocks back, young Garton. I want a strong pair to plough the glebe and they will pay for the tithe that your heretic father owes me."

"These young beasts are worth twice as much as the sum the strange law allows thee to take from those who have no wish to hear thy doctrines," said William Garton, quietly.

"'Twould be a pity to separate such a well-matched pair. And you must pay for the right of free speech, which Mistress Garton believes in," said the parson with a sneer.

"I grieve that my sharp tongue led me to speak to thee unbecomingly, yesterday, Hen Hallywell, but thou knows thou set a trap for me to catch me in my words."

The parson ignored the apology, and in a few minutes poor Josiah's cherished pair of oxen were driven away in the direction of Ilfeld parsonage.

"Well! well!" said the good old farmer patiently, "we must use Speed and Ploughman that I meant to fat for the butcher, for one year more. Let us shoe thy team next, Benedict"—and he returned resolutely to the task awaiting them.

Poor Josiah did his part manfully, but within his breast was a burning indignation that such tyranny and real dishonesty should be sanctioned by the laws of England, especially by one who was placed in the parish nominally to teach the Gospel of Christ.

When Benedict's four oxen were shod, he paid the blacksmith, thanked his friends for their willing help, not forgetting Dickie, and yoking his beasts to the empty cart, he took up his long hazel goad and set off on his twelve miles tramp homeward, by narrow lanes and rough tracks through the wild forest region of northern Sussex.

A few years before he had taken a farm at Shipley, and lived in an old Tudor house, with light and pleasant rooms, the large heavily stone-mullioned windows not being then half bricked up as they were in after days to avoid the oppressive and barbarous window-tax. The floors of parlor, kitchens and dairy were all of Petworth marble, full of treacherous little shells, whose sharp edges were disastrous to any mats laid down and to the housewife's shoes.

But it was reckoned a fine house in its day and had the advantage of being within a mile of the "Blue Idol" Meeting House where William Penn worshipped, and the influence of that wonderful personality and devoted life had no small effect on the character of the young Quaker farmer. Benedict Martin was always ready to help the great man in unfamiliar matters, such as the purchase and management of the teams of oxen which ploughed the fertile fields of Warminghurst, and in winter drew the Penn's coach slowly and steadily through the four miles of muddy lanes which lay between their mansion and the little meeting-house, old even at that date, where they never failed to appear on First-days.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

FLORENCE TRUEBLOOD STEERE.

MAUD ROYDEN, minister at City Temple, London, spoke several times in Philadelphia, from Third Month 16th to 19th. Her smile, one of the newspaper reporters said, "survives a thousand greetings and introductions," but to those who looked beyond the marvellous smile, her face was that of one who had borne the burden of ages and come out victoriously radiant with a peace borne of unusual devotion and Christian dedication. She described the condition of Europe as due to a failure to observe spiritual laws. Some of her sentences stand out most vividly:—

"I believe that Christ not only was a great teacher but a great statesman, and His command 'love one another' some day will be the substance of the policy of nations."

"Why call me foolish when I say that all armament will be laid aside some day and war will be out of the question?"

"We have set before us now the old choice, 'I set before you this day joy and life, death and evil.' Therefore choose life that you and yours may live."

"America holds the answer to the question, 'Can we set the world in order?'—America, the country of homes and happiness, where faith has not been shattered and hope poisoned, is able to see clearly. I do not believe that America will shrink from the responsibility to lead the world. For remember that to whomsoever much is given, of him much is required."

It has long been almost an axiom that no country can lead all others in wealth without becoming disliked. It seems to Europe in her poverty-stricken condition that we are overflowing with wealth and trying to gain more by pressing for payment on our war debts.

We look to her like purely a profiteering nation, and as our statesmen continue the policy of aloofness the "jealous dislike" of us grows. It is said that we are taking this opportunity to become master in Latin America. The Paris Revue Universelle, as quoted by the Springfield Republican, quite openly arraigns us, mentioning the millions borrowed in the last two years by Cuba, Haiti, Columbia, Peru, Bolivia, Chile, Uruguay and Brazil.

As Lewis Gannett recently pointed out in Washington at one of the meetings of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, this in some cases is a direct infringement of national sovereignty. Everywhere we are intruding for "great land grants, mineral concessions and contracts for public works." They think that little by little Central America and the West Indies are becoming dependencies of the United States and that the Monroe doctrine is "a cover for Yankee imperialism."

The friendly interest we are showing in Pan-American matters combined with our utter aloofness in Europe can only be interpreted in one way by our international critics. It is a cause for great anxiety unless some broad policy of international helpfulness be adopted by us in the near future.

The four organizations which are undertaking to hold more than two thousand conferences and mass meetings throughout the United States to get American co-operation in organizing the world against future wars, held an all-day meeting in Philadelphia, Third Month 13th. In the evening, Nehemiah Boynton, speaking at Witherspoon Hall, said that the United States has been so busy developing its own interest that we have had little time to develop Internationalism, "which is only another way of saying that we are ignorant of international affairs."

The Ruhr situation seems to grow more acute daily. The United States is the only country that can mediate comfortably between nations. France advances more. Germany is becoming a unit and bitterness is showing. England exhibits, through the Labor Party, great impatience.

The New Statesman says, "The deliberate destruction of German industry is something which Great Britain cannot and will not tolerate. . . . France must abandon her present purpose or we shall be forced definitely to oppose her by every means in our power, short of actual violence."

The Central American Conference in Washington, which ended Second Month 7th, has made a great advance on paper. It remains to be seen whether the following conventions, which were adopted, become effective. We, if we lessen our "extra legal control," may be of the greatest help in realizing these conventions.

1. General treaty of peace and amity.
2. Convention for the establishment of an international Central American tribunal.
3. Convention for the establishment of international commissions of inquiry.
4. Convention for the establishment of free trade.
5. Convention for the unification of protective laws for workmen and laborers.
6. Convention on the practice of the liberal professions.
7. Convention relative to the preparation of projects of electoral legislation.
8. Convention for the establishment of stations for agricultural experiments and animal industries.
9. Convention for reciprocal exchange of Central American students.
10. Extradition convention.
11. Convention for the establishment of permanent Central American commissions.
12. Convention for the limitation of armaments.

DR. JAMES L. BARTON, back from Lausanne, says: "That Turkey has come back may be unpalatable to many of us, but it is a solid fact. Our institutions have got to plan to turn their attention to taking care of an unprecedented number of Turkish students, but they will go on under the new conditions and they will ultimately, I hope, revolutionize the life of Turkey."

Dr. Barton also emphasized the fact that the American delegation had stuck to four main points and had won three of them; the open Straits issue, the retention of the Greek Patriarchate at Constantinople and the indemnification of the Armenians who had left their property behind in Turkey. The fourth point, the Armenians' national home, he declared, was temporarily lost.

The consistory and pastors of the Protestant National Church of Geneva are asking that their recently issued letter be read in all churches on "Easter Sunday." After giving a realistic picture of the terrible conditions in war-devastated as well as neutral countries, it says, "Either the nations, dominated by egoism, will refuse to help one another and will seek the satisfaction of proud dreams of grandeur and of exclusively material prosperity, and will continue to cherish thoughts of vengeance, violence, and hatred, or they will listen to the call of the Saviour and welcome His message of peace, hope and life. Was it not He who said: 'Love one another. Love your enemies. Blessed are the merciful.'" The letter goes on to say that the Churches must immediately, in all parts of the world, insist that the nations adopt the spirit of Christ in all their operations or there is no hope for the world. Many skeptics and mockers are saying today that the message of Christ is a Utopia, a folly, and unless we, the disciples of Christ, believe and know that the world can be saved "by the folly of the cross, by the burning flame of charity, by the power of sacrifice freely rendered," there is no hope.

Glimpses of the Big Jim Band.

Esther B. Ruger.

In the southern part of Cleveland County, in the State of Oklahoma, we find a section of country generally known to people in surrounding neighborhoods as "The Sticks." Here the land is rough, rocky and sandy. The one-trail roads in the back sections are usually in bad condition, due to the large amount of sand and the big "wash-outs" that accompany the spring rains.

It is in this district that the Big Jim Band of the Shawnee tribe of Indians received their allotments of land from the Government and for nearly half a century have been making their homes.

This band of Indians is classed among the most primitive in the United States. This is due to a number of conditions. The fact that their land is poor and has brought little return to the Big Jimers is one of the big causes for their present destitute condition. The type of white neighbors about them is another cause for their backwardness. The majority of the white people are those who are running "moonshine stills" and gambling dens and stand ready to cheat and defraud the Indian at every turn. When I first began my work in Big Jim country, this low type of white people tried to turn the Indian against me in the hope that I would give up the work. They knew the Indian was an easy mark and they did not care to have their prey snatched from them. Later on when these same white people saw that I had no intention of giving up the work with the Big Jim Indians and after I had taken some Federal officers into some of these places to look for moonshine outfits, they undertook to try to scare me from the country. But the needs of the Big Jim people were too great to allow these foolish threats to turn our work aside, and now everyone seems to take my work for granted and my Indian people have learned to like and trust me.

This band of Indians still have their chief who is the head man of the tribe. Chief Little Jim is a son of the former Chief, Big Jim, for whom the band was named. The old men of the tribe have much influence, and several times a month they meet at Chief Little Jim's home and have their council meetings. At these meetings, all the problems and plans of the band are talked over. Women have no place at these meetings.

There are about forty homes among the Big Jim Indians. A very few of these are equal in structure and equipment to the average white home, but the many that remain are miserable little one-room log houses without the bare necessities of life to make them comfortable. Some have only uneven dirt floors; many of them have no windows at all. Some of the houses have beds that are made by driving posts into the dirt floor and nailing boards from this to the wall to make a platform on which to sleep. Few of the Big Jim people remove their day clothes at night, but roll up in their blankets and sleep whenever they can find a place to lie down. Sometimes the house is so crowded in the winter that some of the family must sleep in the cave cellar. I have known of times when six people have slept down in one little cave cellar where air came in only through a two by five-foot door at one end. In the summer the families move out-of-doors. They cook over their open fires, eat under arbors made from elm branches, and sleep on board beds built on posts which have been driven into the ground. The Big Jim Indians have tried to copy after the white man in building their homes, but because of their limited knowledge the result is they have half furnished, poorly lighted, poorly ventilated and unsanitary houses.

The old Indian women are apparently indifferent to dirt. There are some who wear the same clothes for months and who get so dirty that you really wonder if they can remember when they have bathed. It is so hard to make them see the necessity of a clean body and clean clothes. Lizzie Longman, a full-blood old Indian woman, has been seen taking her clothes off, washing them in a pond of water which has drained from surface land, and putting them back on herself to dry. The most pathetic thing to me was to see little babies who did not receive baths for weeks, with their little bodies covered with sores, a thing which would not exist were they bathed often and their clothes put through a proper laundry process. I have gone after this thing hard and the result is that most of the younger mothers are putting forth honest efforts to keep the babies' bodies clean and healthy.

There is very little real home life among the Big Jim Indians. This I believe is largely due to the fact that girls and boys marry young and marry by Indian custom, which is nothing more than two people deciding that they will live together and doing so. There is nothing binding about this, and I have found young women around the age of twenty who have had three and four different husbands. When they get tired of living with one man they just leave him and perhaps in a few days will have a new husband. This is the Indian way and the old people encourage this way of living. This often makes children in one family of many different names and tends to break up the ties of family love and fellowship.

The old custom of the women doing most of the work about the home is still in evidence. The Big Jim woman often does the work to the extent of cutting wood to sell to help support the family. The man is always given first consideration; he eats first; he walks ahead of the woman; he has a voice at the council meetings; he scarcely ever thinks of getting wood or water to use in the houses; and in many little ways one is impressed that the Indian woman is made to feel that she is not equal to the man.

The duties of the Big Jim house-wife are simple. Corn is the main food and is used three times a day and often prepared two or three different ways at one meal. The real Indian bread is made from corn that has been made into flour by the women in large wooden pounding blocks. These blocks are made from a hollowed-out log. The corn is placed in this log and is beaten with great long wooden mallets. When making real Indian bread, they use Indian baking powder. This is the ashes from burnt pea-pods. The ashes and corn flour are mixed together and enough water is added to make them stick together. Sometimes a little wild grape juice is also added. This is dropped then by small lumps into a kettle of boiling water and is cooked for ten or fifteen minutes. This is eaten with the grease from meats and is very hard to digest. The first and only time I ate this I suffered from indigestion for about twenty-four hours. I have seen babies only eight, ten or twelve months of age with a large piece of this bread trying to eat it. The children as a general thing are very much undernourished. Some of the homes never have butter, have little milk and practically no fruit. A child starts on its corn diet as soon as it is able to eat anything at all.

There is much sickness in the tribe. Many of the people have tubercular trouble, and skin diseases are everywhere, even in the best homes. There are many diseases resulting from immoral living. Until recently there has been a regular "Medicine Man" among these Indians. Shawnee Doctor, the old man who held this position, died about three months ago. During the year that I was working among his people and saw him once or several times a week, I was never able to get one word from him. He resented very much the work I was doing. In many cases I have removed mud plasters that he had put on sores, in order to dress and bandage them properly. One of his favorite treatments was "the sweat house." The sick person was put in a small tent and an open fire was built inside. The smoke and heat have caused the death of many people treated this way. The practice is fast dying out in this group of Indians I am glad to say.

The Big Jim Band, like most Indians, are very superstitious. One time when this is very evident is when death occurs. When they believe a person is about to die they carry him from the house and put him in a tent. If he died in the house no one would live in it afterward. After death the body is wrapped in a blanket and laid on boards on the ground in the tent. Food and drink are kept continually beside the body until noon the second day, when it is buried. Before the body is carried to the grave an old man of the tribe kneels beside it and says a prayer to the "Great Spirit." He then sprinkles Indian tobacco over the body and it is carried to the grave. The people follow single file, the men going before the women. The grave is usually near the house and is dug only about two feet deep. In the case of death of babies under the age of three months, the body is put in a hollow stump of a tree and a board nailed over the top. At the grave each person passes around and sprinkles Indian tobacco over the body. This is supposed to sustain the one who is gone on the way to the Happy Hunting Grounds. One woman is appointed to do the weeping and wailing. She usually continues this until sunset. On the third day a beef is killed and a big feast is given for the departed spirit. The ceremonies end the morning of the fourth day when all the men, women and children in the tribe wash their hair.

As can be seen by this, the Big Jim Indians believe in the life after death, but the Great Spirit whom they worship does not compare with the loving God whom we know. They are continually doing things to appease this Great Spirit. The lightning is supposed to be a punishment from him. They do not see how a request made quietly can be heard. Just recently an old man beat his tom-tom (Indian drum) all night. It was his prayer for rain. The Bread Dance in the spring is a prayer to the Great Spirit to send good crops of corn to be used for bread for winter. The War Dance with all its noise and gay colors is a religious ceremony. Years of this pagan worship have built up barriers that at times it seems almost impossible to break through, and yet we see plainly that the younger generation of Indians are wavering and are being drawn toward God. Many of them are taking up peyote worship. This was brought in from Mexico and because it has noise and many outward ceremonies connected with it, has appealed to the Indian people.

Peyote is a bean which grows in Mexico and contains a very powerful drug. It is either boiled in water to make peyote tea to drink or it is made into small peyote pills. They say that it takes them away from this world and they see God and learn how to live good lives. As nearly as I can determine, it acts very much as an intoxicating liquor acts. They imagine they see all sorts of visions and interpret them as sent of God. Just recently John Spoon, a full-blood Indian man, tried it for the first time. He told me he saw a boy with two heads. It made the old man very sick and he was more than ready to promise me that he would not try to use it again. Besides having the power of portraying God, they believe that this peyote can cure any sickness. About four weeks ago I happened in upon one of these meetings, being held for a sick girl. In the teepee they had the girl lying on a bed on the ground. They were giving her nothing but peyote tea. There were only men in the teepee. Women take but little active part in these meetings and are usually kept busy cooking the food for the large group which gathers. I examined the girl and found that she had a very high pulse and temperature. We immediately sent for a doctor, and probably the girl today owes her life to the breaking up of that peyote meeting. It has been my experience that the people who use peyote are usually the lazy, indifferent ones in the tribe. I have seen no evidence of its making their lives better. On the contrary, I have been sure of actual untruths told to me by the people who were the leaders in these meetings. We will welcome the day when our country passes a measure prohibiting the use of peyote as it has prohibited the use of alcoholic drinks and other drugs. Peyote had a hold on the Big Jim people before Orville Batten and his wife, our missionaries for that section, took up work among them and they are finding it a hard thing to work against. I believe though that the fact that the Indian people are taking up this new form of worship shows that they are no longer clinging so tightly to their old pagan worship and that they are seeking for a path to God.

The problems presented by the old people are vastly different from those of the younger generation. I believe our missionaries will have a better chance to work with the young people because of the action taken by the Government in regard to school. Indian boys and girls of school age are now compelled to attend either a government boarding school or a public day school. Many of the Big Jim young people are attending the rural schools in their own districts. This will tend to put them on an equal basis in the community with the white people and will open a new door for the missionary to work through. I believe the day is soon coming when the bell at the little white mission church will ring and we will see Indian families coming in by the wagon loads to worship God.

Many of the Indian people have already lost faith in their old worship and are really Christians at heart. The wife of Little Jim is one of the very fine women of the band. Her home is well kept. She is giving her three growing children a good moral training which few Big Jim children have had in years gone by. When I go into the home of Nellie and Billy Hood at meal time, they always ask me "to talk to the Man" and these two old people bow their heads reverently while I pray.

John French, the fine young man who died last Ninth Month, was a convert of the Friends' missions. When talking with him the day before his death he said he was so glad that the message of Christ had been brought to him and that he hoped the Mission would help his small boy and girl, who would soon be without father or mother, to be Christians.

We are just now seeing results from our work among the Big Jim people, and our missionaries need the prayers and interest of Friends at large to help them in their work. The Home Mission Budget will have to be a large one this year if needs presented in places like the Big Jim country can be met. It will cost much, but can we afford to let a chance slip by to bring to God these people who have been living in darkness for years?

"Lift up your eyes and look on the fields for they are white already to harvest."

The same Master of mankind who gave this challenge to His disciples of old, is sending a challenge to the Friends of America to turn their eyes to the needs of the Indian Mission fields and to make possible the harvest which Friends have earned for Him after all these years of faithful service among the Indian people.

A SIMPLE YOUNG Scotch lassie came to her minister and said, "May I come to the Lord's Supper? I long to do so." The minister replied that he would have to examine her on doctrine; so she had to be examined. She failed so completely that the old minister said, "My young friend, you are not a mature Christian; you may not come to the altar yet. You must wait a bit." And so she had to go; but, as she was leaving the room, she burst into tears and sobbed: "I can't tell much about our Saviour; but I love Him enough to die for Him." Then the old minister rose from his seat and said: "My dear girl, come back. There is no guest worthier than you at the Lord's Supper." When all is said, it is not words or moods, phrases, cults or forms, but the heart given to Christ that counts. "Quit ye like men, be strong, . . . the Lord give thee understanding of all things."

OUR FATHER'S CARE.

Never a sparrow falleth
Down through the frosty air,
But the loving eye of our Father
Marks it with tender care.
Never the weakest birdling
Cries for his daily bread
But the open hand of our Father Shows him a table spread.

But dearer far than sparrows
Are the children of his love;
No weak ones are forgotten
By the Father-heart above.
He knows the bitter hunger,
He sees the souls unfed,
Of millions of his loved ones
Dying for living bread.

And he who fed the thousands
By Galilee's blue sea,
Sends for his fainting children
Portions by you and me.
Then gladly do his errands
Pass on the heaven-sent bread,
The gushing living water,
Till all on earth are fed.

BOOK REVIEW.

"THE QUAKERS: THEIR STORY AND MESSAGE."*

[We rejoice that so many of our subscribers have read or are reading A. Neave Brayshaw's last book (see foot-note). We want that all of them and more shall know of it and shall gain from it the lessons it can give. We do not often repeat, least of all book notices, but we shall make an exception, and this, of course, without any conference with A. N. B. concerning it. In our issue of First Month 12, 1922, appeared a carefully prepared review of the book, and we feel quite justified in giving the same again, because we have the conviction that "The Quakers: Their Story and Message" should be in all our homes.—D. H. F.]

A. Neave Brayshaw's book has more than once been mentioned in these columns, but we feel it could hardly be called too frequently to the attention of our readers.

It is an astonishing little volume. We have all known of houses "so much larger inside than out." This is precisely the impression one gets from this book; when one has completed the reading of its 148 pages one is amazed that so much could ever have been told in so small compass.

Nowhere is there anything suggestive of the "compendium." Nowhere is one conscious of condensation or of matter closely packed in the way common to nearly all books which aim to give much in little. The whole period is covered, from before the birth of George Fox down to the great London Conference of 1920—and after; three centuries in all, yet not once is there the slightest sensation of being hurried along. There is always time for happy anecdote and pithy, leisurely comment, illuminating detail, and shrewd, whimsical observation. Of course, the secret lies in an almost incredible skill in determining just what shall go in and what shall be left out. What does go in is treated amply and with leisure.

The "Rowntree History," in its seven great volumes, is monumental. Yet it is safe to say that there is scarcely a phase developed in those, approximately 3500 pages, which is not somehow touched on in this little work, not one-twentieth so large.

And many, who would gladly own and assimilate the great history, will be able to find neither the money for the first nor the time for the second. For these Neave Brayshaw's book is invaluable, as indeed for all others; for a handbook such as this is of use to even the profoundest scholars.

The Table of Contents, with its analysis of the four chapters, is illuminating:

I. The century preceding George Fox; early life of Fox and rise of the Society of Friends; the early messengers and the bond of fellowship; the central teaching and its bearing on worship, truthfulness and war; persecution; organization.

II. The eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries; quietism and seclusion; training as pioneers; the inner history of the Society; anti-slavery trade and other philanthropic activity; social and family life.

III. The nineteenth and early twentieth centuries; emergence into the wider world; historical sketch of Quaker ministry; effect on Quakerism of the Evangelical and Methodist movement; the Beacon separation; the evangelical period; foreign and home missions; adult and junior Sunday Schools; change of outlook in scientific and religious thought; the Manchester Conference; concern for religious teaching; philanthropic activity and examination of the causes of social evils.

IV. Service during the war of 1914-1918 and after, Friends' Ambulance Unit; War Victims' Relief Committee; Emergency Committee; conscientious objectors to military service; All-Friends' Conference, 1920; the relation of the Peace Testimony to other parts of life; the message of Quakerism.

It will be seen from this that the book is written from a very definitely English point of view; indeed, were an American asked to criticize and suggest, one would ask whether a second edition might not be made even more valuable by being inclusive of Quakerism in America and other parts of the world. This could quite conceivably be accomplished by a deft touch here and there which would probably add less than a score of pages to the book. But while there have been separations in this country that London Yearly Meeting has been able to avoid, the same problems have presented there as here, the same varying types of Friends exist, and it is astonishing how parallel has been the development of Quakerism in England and here, despite the three thousand miles of ocean that separate us. So that the fact that this book was written by an Englishman about English Quakerism makes it really scarcely one whit less important for Americans or Canadians or Australians.

One of the finest passages of the book is to be found in Chapter III, being the ten pages entitled in the Table of Contents "Historical Sketch of Quaker Ministry." Space forbids quoting it in toto, and to quote in part would be to garble it, and might lead to misconstructions of Neave Brayshaw's position. Those who know his "Life that is Life Indeed," first published ten years ago (I shall always be grateful to Thomas Davidson of Fritchley, who first brought it to my attention), will be sure that his views are sane and sound on this subject. He deprecates the "excess of fear," as distinct from a holy sense of responsibility, which has so frequently accompanied a call to the ministry, and the "embarrassment" which is so often felt in mentioning the subject or discussing it.

"In all this [he says] we see the concern of the true minister that his life shall commend his words; but Quakerism has suffered from an over-cautiousness, slipping at times into lethargy and even into excuse for drawing back from service. A genuine desire for correspondence between life and ministry will be more concerned with elevation of the former than with suspicion of the latter. Unworthy the preacher may feel himself to be (in fact, what preacher does not?); grieved at his inconsistency in his falling short of the ideal which, having seen, he sets forth; and strong (and not always unwelcome) is the temptation to withhold his offering under plea of avoidance of hypocrisy. Nevertheless, it is an abuse of language to call 'hypocrite' the preacher, or any other, who, notwithstanding failure, is honestly set in the right way, pressing toward the goal even though he cannot count himself to have attained. Inconsistency is not the same as hypocrisy."

The brief sentence from George Fox, appearing on the title-page, characterizes, I feel, the whole spirit of the book and its author: "Always feel a growing in the power of the Lord God that is universal and everlasting."

IF YOU WERE AUSTRIAN—WHERE WOULD YOU EAT?

Where and how do Austrian students and professional men and women and other people with small incomes eat now-a-days? It is a question which at first sight may well perplex the visitor to Vienna. He wanders from hotel to café and from café to restaurant, confronted everywhere by dizzy prices in kronen, almost high in the thousands, and conscious that the vast majority of people whom he finds in such restaurants are strangers like himself. His pounds or dollars smooth the way for him, reduce the dizzy thousands to a price equivalent to or somewhat lower than that which he would have paid in his own country. But they do not help to answer his question—how and where can the Viennese afford to eat in Vienna?

To a considerable degree the answer is to be found in the communal kitchens, which have been installed in every district of the city, and for which the Friends' Relief Mission buys tickets for distribution to needy cases wherever this seems the most suitable and economical form of help. The tickets cost 4,000 kronen, or $1.74 each. For this sum we are able to provide a very fairly substantial midday meal daily for a month. Whenever it is possible, the recipient pays half or a quarter of these tickets; only when the case is one of extreme poverty are they given entirely without charge.

The kitchens vary considerably in their quality and organization; in one respect all are alike, they are thronged from twelve till three o'clock with hungry crowds seeking their only chance of a relatively cheap yet satisfactory meal. One follows the queue down to the basement in which such kitchens are generally to be found, lies in wait for the first vacant chair, plunges into it, eats quickly and then makes way for the next occupant of the seat. The furnishing of the basement is primitive, but in the course of a week spent in visiting and dining in them, I have found none which is not clean and orderly. The meal inevitably begins with a large plateful of thick vegetable soup, then comes a very little meat and a plentiful helping of potatoes, macaroni, or some such homely vegetable as cabbage or carrots, while the final course consists of a slice of plain cake or equally plain pudding—perhaps not the meal for an epicure, but nourishing and well-cooked, while for its price of six cents, it would surely be hard to find a rival!

One's fellow guests are drawn almost entirely from the better middle class, and thickly scattered between grey-haired professional men, women clerks and dapper officials, sit boys and girls who are obviously students either of the University or of one of the many technical schools of Vienna. In a country where unemployment has attained such terrible proportions as in Austria to-day, where it is difficult for the most proficient to find work, even children have been forced to realize that the hope for both present and future lies in the thorough knowledge and mastery of whatever profession or trade they may have chosen. More and more do we see the tendency on the part of the young people to turn to the practical applied arts and handicrafts, and no sacrifice is considered too great in order to take advantage of the three years' training given by the technical schools in these subjects.

The Relief Mission lends any assistance in its power to enable struggling parents to support such children during the three years' study following on their school days, and a most helpful method is to ensure the fact that these growing boys and girls receive a nourishing midday meal. Through the communal kitchens we have the means of providing this meal at a very low cost. The kitchens, originally instituted by the State during the starvation years following the war, now receive no State support, but are organized either by philanthropic or business societies, and through extreme care and economy in their methods just manage to continue their existence. Without them a large mass of the middle-class would be plunged into even drier straits than at present.

The Relief Mission is most anxious to be able further to extend its help to such young students at technical schools as have been mentioned. An encouraging letter showing the result of such help was lately received. The writer is the former governess of three orphan boys; on their parents' death in 1919 she took the entire responsibility of the little family, and with help in the way of food and clothing, from the Mission, has supported them till now.

A month ago she wrote:—

"I owe you deep thanks for your invitation to a daily free dinner for one of my boys. However, we are making no use of it, not out of superfluity of income, but because we have already received so much and others need it more. Willy has now found work as a clerk abroad, Bruno is eighteen, has finished his agricultural course and is also earning—there is only Hubert at school, and I, who am always teaching and only today find time to thank you for the great cornerstone you have laid as the foundation of the lives of these growing boys of mine."

No day passes without proof of the help which even very little money, when judiciously granted, can render to such struggling young people, and of the grateful and yet self-respecting spirit in which it is received.

HELP THAT INCREASES ITSELF 10,440 TIMES.

The American cent has increased in Poland to 10,440 times its pre-war value. Here are some of the things which, as a result of this gain in value, American contributions can accomplish when transformed into help for the peasants in Poland's devastated areas:—$.05 will buy a spade; $.50 will buy a goose, or sufficient vegetable seeds to plant half an acre; $1.00 will buy a pig; $1.50 will buy a spinning-wheel; $2.50 will buy a plough; $3.50 will buy a sheep; $14.00 will buy a horse, or a cow; $42.00 will build a house.

To provide any of these things for one or more of Poland's refugee families, mark your contribution "for Poland," and send it to the American Friends' Service Committee, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

NOTES FROM THE SERVICE FIELDS.

SINCE 1920, the American Friends' Service Committee has sent to Daniel Oliver for his work in Syria approximately $42,200. In 1920 contributions received by the Service Committee for Daniel Oliver, amounted to $23,886.38; in 1921, $7,106.86; and in 1922, $6,366.71. The 1923 contributions for this purpose from the first of the year to the nineteenth of this present month have been $4,817.50.

A RECENT number of the International Agricultural Review, published in Rome, contains an article entitled: "The Assistance Given to Austrian Agriculture by the Anglo-American Relief Mission of the Society of Friends." This article was written by Dr. Ing. H. Kallbrunner, and was entirely uncolored by the Friends' Mission.

"LAST week," writes Florence M. Barrow, head of the Friends' Mission in Poland, "I visited the village of Hosc, where one of our horse columns was at work hauling the timber. The work in that village was nearly completed, and it was delightful to see the substantial piles of timber ready for each house. We had a deputation from two widows, asking for help in the sawing of the timber which had been already hauled. One told us that she and her husband and five children had returned last year from Russia. She herself had been ill and had been kept in the hospital at Baranowicz till she was well enough to travel. When, after two weeks, this time came, she had arrived to find that her husband had died, and she was left with her five children to face the problem of cultivating eight acres of land, and in providing some kind of shelter, with no money or other resources at their disposal.

"Such a case made us greatly desire to be able to provide the further help towards the building of the houses."

From Haddonfield, N. J., comes the following note:—

"I am enclosing a check for $5, which we would like to have used in helping to feed the children of Russia. My pupils of the First and Second Grades gave a Doll Show, charging a small admission, so that they might do this little bit to help 'cause the crops did not grow in Russia.'"

SHIPMENTS received for week ending Third Month 24, 1923—72 boxes and packages.

Cash contributions received for the same period—$16,264.17.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

ELISHA B. STEER, of Salem, Ohio, writes us Third Month 26th:—

"In No. 36, page 430 of THE FRIEND information was given of James Henderson's and Cyrus Cooper's prospect of Gospel service. It was a mutual exercise, and on account of the serious illness of J. Henderson's aunt at his home, they have not engaged in it yet."

THE subject of "recording ministers" is spasmodically to the fore with English Friends, if one is safe in judging from what appears in The Friend (London). Caroline E. Stephen wrote the following in regard to the subject:—

"I cannot think that we ought ourselves to attach much, if any, importance to the circumstance of being or not being recorded as ministers, though I can see that some such rough classification may have its practical convenience. But it cannot possibly make any difference to the call itself, and I sometimes wonder whether we should not be, in some respects, better without this outward marking off of some amongst the many who are rightly called to speak at times. . . . I feel the value of our plan of eldering . . . but it should be surely used with the utmost caution and gentleness."

C. FRANCIS JENKINS, a graduate of Earlham in 1885, and now widely known as a distinguished inventor, has his home in Washington, D. C. He recently patented an invention which makes possible the transmission of motion pictures by means of radio. The new mechanism, it is said, will make it possible for the people of a thousand towns and cities to view from their own homes a world series or a presidential inauguration.

As a proof of the need for Friends' Mission schools in Mexico, Clyde E. Roberts writes the following facts: "At an educational congress recently held in Monterey, absolute freedom for all pupils was advocated. So warm did the discussion become that revolvers were drawn and the ladies rather unceremoniously left the room." So long as recourse is had to bullets in settling disputes, there will be need for the message of Friends concerning peace and good-will.

YEARLY MEETING PAST.

Possibly no feature of our Society life emphasizes more strongly the democratic basis of its polity than does the freedom granted to the individual member in these annual assemblies.

We gathered, session after session, a company at times of more than a thousand, with the understanding that no individual or group of individuals, had a prior claim on the time of the meeting above any other individual or group.

We listened with the same apparent interest to sentiments that were expressed, whether they came from the most or the least seasoned among us, provided, of course, they were felt to be genuine and pertinent to the topic before us.

We drew alike from the galleries and from the floor of the house those that were to constitute our committees. We recognized that age gave us a ripened judgment, and that youth a freshness and enthusiasm in such proportion that the mingling of the two gave the result a quality that either acting alone could not furnish.

Partly as the result of experience we have learned that there are occasions when age should have precedence, but we have also learned that youth makes very strong claims upon us.

Each generation has to learn for itself that there is something inherent in the very life of the Society of Friends that appeals or should appeal to youth.

They were young men and women, we very well know, who were pioneers in the origin of the Society. The balance between the two has varied greatly from time to time; it, however, requires no very close scrutiny into our history, to answer the query: What are the periods that have been marked as those of greatest growth in religious life?

Referring to the late Yearly Meeting, if we review the various "concerns" that came before us, we shall find that not a few sprang from our younger members, we shall find also that without the spirit of repression being at all manifest, there accompanied these exercises from the youth and the middle-aged, a kindly word of caution and an exhortation to watchfulness on the part of their elders.

The mingling of the spirits of youth and age, manifested as the week passed was one of the most impressive features of the Yearly Meeting.

As a Society we have grown more familiar with this exhibition of mutual confidence than many others have, and it does not draw forth the comment of wonder from us. It is one of the marks of real life in the Society of Friends, when age can defer to youth, and youth can yield to the restraints of age without growing callous and indifferent.

We have attained nothing in which to glory; the moment we make such a claim, the hand on our dial must be turned back to zero, and history will record not our first or our second but simply another failure.

Should any one have left our Yearly Meeting with the I or the we exalted, surely such an one, if one there be, will accept our word of caution and agree with his friends that we fall so far below our standard that our prayer must continue to be a call for help.

Without a man-made standard by which to measure any advancement, without a written or spoken declaration as to where we stand in our belief as to the great fundamentals, and without a priestly tribunal to which our confessions may be poured forth, we have accepted, and accepted with full faith in its all-sufficiency, the doctrine that the life manifesting the power and the wisdom of God in all His offices and purposes for His creatures, is the life and the faith we are to live and to uphold.

If it is rooted in Him, it will find its hope in a faith that recognizes, His Son as our Saviour and Redeemer, and it will feel the quickening power of His Holy Spirit to fulfil the promise: "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." This, we believe, was the crowning service of our late Yearly Meeting.

D. H. F.

FRIENDS OR SERVANTS.

"SERVING THE WHOLE."

"Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."

Are we interested in inheriting the earth, and the use of so, why? "For what there is in it" for us, personally,—the if of its coal and iron, for instance, or to help serve the needs of the whole,—for joy in sharing this service?

If the latter, let us remember that the "meek" in this connection, does not mean weakly subservient,—but the "co-operative,"—for our Lord was boldly defiant of accepted custom at the time and did not bless the two popular types of the hour,—the Pharisee and the Roman soldier, who were inheriting the earth's plaudits and confidence.

On the contrary, he went out of his way to hunt the obscure and apparently disinherited, and make them heirs of the kingdom of earth; for neither priestcraft nor militarism has ever proved permanently to inherit any fraction of the earth, nor ever can do so, each being in its own nature self-destructive.

He promises then the earth, not to those selfishly seeking

CLARENCE COOPER

it, but to those wanting to co-operate with Him and with each other in carrying out His purpose for its use.

What then might inspire us dynamically with this desire to share the earth with others—what but the words of our Lord to His little band of fellow-servants, when about to part from them: "Henceforth I call you not servants, for the servant knoweth not what his Lord doeth; but I have called you friends."

Each one of us has individual ways of wanting things done, and the great problem of setting the world to rights, today, is that of bringing about co-operation between clashing human interests. What joy it might give us, could we always have in the foreground of our purposes the gratification of our Lord's chosen way for having things done!

The friend knoweth what his Lord doeth, and wants to see it done right, from love for Him. Yes, He does make clear to us, His little, intimate interests, that we may reciprocate His love in co-operative service of Him, and thus of "the whole."

Why should we, then, not be called "servants," a term, honored for all time, by His claiming to have come "as one, who serveth," "not to be ministered unto," thus reversing our respective callings. To realize the full significance of this, let us consider for a moment some outstanding faults of typical hirelings.

Do they know what their "Lord doeth," in the sense of entering into the real spirit of his plans, and joyously springing to a share in them, or do they rather "know it all," in the sense of knowing their own way of carrying them out, refusing suggestion, and being rather suspicious of each other and of him? We are all seeking a way to right this old world of ours, but the key to this lock of world's interests can be found in nothing less than the infusion of our Lord's way of loving service of the whole, into the small groups, which are wrapped within the successive larger ones of world interest, the family, the neighborhood, the city, the state, the nation, the family of nations.

Then may we indeed reach the point of being true "co-operators," or friends of our Lord, "serving the whole" or bringing those now serving us, in any sphere, more nearly into the relationship of our friends,—with like passions, needs, pleasures with ourselves,—and by realizing that these are as essential to them as to us and as hard for them to surrender. Then shall we rightly inherit the earth, by inheriting its fellowship and brotherhood, and by being able to answer our Lord ardently, when asked, "Lovest thou Me like a lover?" His superlative, third question of the series: "Ye, Lord, thou knowest that I love Thee, and would be Thy friend, with a single eye to Thy own plans for my helping in Thy work, for which Thou dost fully equip me, convincing me of Thy devoted friendship,—to deserve which I ask to be better fitted."

Catharine Morris Shipley.

(Sixth Month 23, 1832—Twelfth Month 26, 1922.)

RECOLLECTIONS OF A NIECE.*

"I cannot rest from travel, I will drink
Life to the lees; all times I have enjoyed Greatly, have suffered greatly, both with those
That loved me, and alone; . . .
Much have I seen and known; cities of men
And manners, climates, councils, governments, Myself not least, but honored of them all."

Such an adventurous soul was Catharine Morris Shipley, a tireless traveler, drawing from all climes and peoples great gifts of friendship and love, and boundless in her enthusiasm which, though not without its counterpart of inner suffering, enabled her to bring to all classes in all lands something of the great joy she found in life and her overflowing love for our common humanity. She liked to say that she had breathed the spirit of the northwest wind. Therefore custom could not tame her nor life's business make her dull. Her philosophy of life was one which did not acknowledge obstacles, and which held to the faith that one could accomplish whatever was worth doing. Her energy and enthusiasm persisted unimpaired from first youth up to extreme old age. Her childhood friend and self-styled sister, Hannah Whitall Smith, who was born in the same year and with whom she carried on a delightful correspondence, wrote to her when both were nearing eighty: "I love to know all the things thee is doing and to get a whiff of thy wonderful vitality, and thy delightful youngness of spirit. Ah, Kate, beloved, there really is a wonderful woman, and I love thee." Such were the feelings of those who knew her in her prime, and it is the years of her strength that should live in our memory rather than those which so far exceeded the Scriptural threescore and ten.

Her favorite text, often heard in our meetings for worship, was this: "Therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." (Ps. xl. 7, Heb. i. 9) With young and old she emphasized this joy, but especially with the young because her spirit was more akin to theirs. A host of nieces and nephews, whether related to her by ties of blood or only of affection, grew up to think of their Aunt Kate as an Aunt par excellence, a modern counterpart of that amazing and sometimes whimsical, but always kindly, figure in the story books, the fairy godmother. For little girls her many bags and pockets, that were attached to her in strange ways, were full of doll's things, silks, ribbons and best of all, little dishes which she thought it worth while to paint as prettily as she did the plates and tiles that she gave to grown-up people. One of my earliest recollections is of an occasion on which I was suspected of having swallowed a very minute cup and saucer which she had given me. I was treated accordingly. She never forgot Saint Valentine's Day and we never forgot to watch the mail for her lovely hearts and darts and wreaths of forget-me-nots. For boys she had the gifts they liked, tops and marbles and things to eat. She was, in fact, an aunt à large to all young persons and her doings and sayings became proverbial among them. Once upon my return from a wonderful journey in her company one of the nephews said to me, "Well, Anna, what kind of a time did thee have?" and then without pausing for an answer, he added: "I'll bet thee had an Aunt Kate time!"

One of the traits that made her so intensely interesting was her feeling of immediate concern for all sorts of people in all sorts of places. She was very faithful to these "leadings." I remember hearing her give a peace lecture in the following language to a railway official in a British station just as he was about to release a train. As a result the train started late, but the guard was brought face to face with a moral problem. It was in 1908, when trouble was brewing over Northern Africa.

C. M. S. to Guard: "Thee wouldn't like to have a bullet in thy back, would thee?"

Guard: "No, madam."

C. M. S.: "I was once in Mexico and when we were in the open country and my husband had gone on to the nearest village the mule drivers ran away. I was sitting alone amongst the baggage sketching when up came a band of brigands with their brigand chief. They were about to fall upon our belongings. Instantly I opened the supplies and offered them

*It has been impossible within the limits of so brief a personal sketch, devoted mainly to one's own recollections, to do more than hint at Catharine Shipley's multifarious activities.

oranges with a smile because I couldn't speak their language. The brigands ate the oranges and went away."

Her quickness of observation and pungent sayings often produced unexpected episodes. On one occasion she was standing in the drawing-room of a London hotel where the guests were arrayed in evening attire, the women with dresses extremely décolleté. A Hindu entered with two Indian ladies who looked like turtle doves with their soft mauve-colored silks, high-necked and long-sleeved, and their modest veils. Catharine Shipley turned to the Hindu gentleman and said with her accustomed energy, "Isn't thee glad thee's a heathen!" He bowed deeply and replied, "Madame, I could but think the same thing myself."

On her many voyages Catharine Shipley seldom crossed to Europe without arranging a religious meeting on First-day with the steerage passengers. At home she went on First-day afternoons to the Pennsylvania Hospital to read the Bible with patients in the wards. She took a deep interest in the Woman's Exchange Movement, in the Young Women's Christian Association, in temperance reforms, in foreign missions, in the education of the Negro race and in a great variety of efforts both public and private for social improvement. She was a born teacher and her classes among working women and Italian immigrants called forth her ardent interest. Once in a market place in Northern Italy a picturesque peasant girl put down the basket of flowers she was carrying on her head and flew across the piazza to greet her, clasping her in her arms and exclaiming, "Mrs. Shipley! Mrs. Shipley!" to which came the prompt answer, "Why, it's Rosa Crivelli." This girl as a little immigrant had attended one of Aunt Kate's Bible Classes in the slums of Philadelphia, and though she had returned to her Italian home she had not forgotten her lively and sympathetic teacher. It was Catharine Shipley's wonderful freedom from self-consciousness that enabled her to speak a timely word to princes and ecclesiastics, charwomen and beggars, simply on the basis of common humanity. Her interest in people as such and her enjoyment of their foibles and virtues was a most conspicuous trait in her character.

No account of Catharine Shipley, however brief, should omit all mention of her painting, which was a delightful recreation throughout her grown-up years. Innumerable plates and cups and tiles bear witness to her facile brush, while her water-color drawings reflect the charm of lovely places the world over. She was too restless to submit to the discipline of technique in drawing, but she had a good sense of color. She often laughingly reminded us that she knew her shortcomings in draughtsmanship by quoting William T. Richards, who used to say to her when she was sketching at Newport, "Catharine, thee has a fine bit of color on that palette!" But we are not all as critical as William Richards and her landscapes have charmed many eyes.

Infirmities of age came in the course of time, though much later than to most of her contemporaries. In 1905, Hannah Whitall Smith wrote to her: "I always like to think of thee as rejoicing in a young old age free from the usual infirmities and disabilities from which most of us suffer. But after all it is more Scriptural at our age to find the 'keepers of the house trembling' and the 'grasshopper becoming a burden' and we cannot complain if such things are our portion." It was not until more than a decade after this that she was forced to keep to her house in DeLancey Street.

A little forecast or vision from the gifted pen of this same dear friend addressed to "My dear Sister Kate" may fittingly conclude these scanty reminiscences. She writes: "I am not quite sure which one of us wrote last, but happily our friendship is not of the kind that needs to keep count of such things. The tie between us is one that no time or distance can alter, and whenever or however we meet we always find one another the same. Even though we should never meet again on earth I can see thee in my mind's eye tripping up to me in Heaven with some cute story of one of the angels, or some bright revelation of the love of God that has just been opened up to thee. What a joy it will be!"

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

A PAIR OF OXEN—1699.

Benedict's house was but scantily furnished, and kept by an elderly maid-servant, who was clean and faithful, but whose cooking was primitive and her companionship dull. Four years ago Benedict had had visions of a very different mistress in his house, and it was a bitter blow to find he had been too prudent in hesitating to speak, so that elderly John Deane had carried off gentle Susanna Garton.

Now his hopes had again revived. He had seen little of Susanna during the busy days at Bonwicks, but she was uppermost in his thoughts as he plodded beside his oxen, guiding them by mysterious cries when it was needful to turn to right or left.

It was the custom that a pair should have a one and a two-syllabled name, and this team were Lark and Linnet and Hawk and Pheasant. As he walked beside them he noticed that Linnet's neck was being awkwardly rubbed by the yoke from his taller companion. Benedict stopped the willing team, and proceeded by a pad of soft grass tied on with string from his pocket, to remedy the difficulty.

So absorbed was he in the task that he did not notice that Susanna was standing watching him, having come out of a side glade of the wood through which the track passed. She had been with food to a sick child in a woodman's hut, and had lingered to fill her wooden trug basket with blackberries to make the pudding that her little brother loved.

"Easing the yoke for thy poor beast, Benedict?" she said.

"Aye, I cannot bear to see them suffer, and this pair is not well-matched like Josiah's lost twins. Lark is too tall by nearly a hand."

"Every yoke should be as easy as it can be made," said Susanna thoughtfully; "I could not help being amused at the way that London Friend spoke of a yoke at last Quarterly Meeting. She seemed to think it was an instrument of torture, instead of the greatest help to do our Master's work well and easily. No moving of heavy burdens without a yoke! And we are happy to have been called to bear the Lord's yoke in our youth, Benedict, as Josiah and I have often said."

"Susanna," said Benedict earnestly, "Dost thou not think that thou and I could draw with one yoke together? We desire to serve the same Master, we are agreed in the best things, we are young and strong and of just the same age, and both come of plain farmer folk and of parents who have led us to throw in our lot with the Friends of truth?"

Susanna's fair face colored painfully. "We are unlike in one thing, Benedict, dost not thou remember that I am a widow?"

"Yes—but (forgive me, dear one) was not thy marriage a case of an ill-matched pair?"

"Perhaps it was. John Deane was so much older. Yet he was a good man, and I felt it a privilege to minister to him. I cannot regret my year in Horsham, for it taught me much; yet it seems hardly fair to thee, Benedict, when there are maidens who could give thee their first affections."

"I am the best judge of that; I only feel the greater desire to have thee beside me to cherish through life."

"But there is another stop in my mind," went on Susanna. "If often comes to me that some day I may be called to take long journeys in the ministry—not only to visit our Sussex Friends, as Josiah and I do now. It seems strange that the simple farmer's daughter should be called to speak for the truth in great cities, yet I have an ever-present conviction that in years to come this may be laid upon me. I tried to speak of it to John Deane once, and he was quite testy. He said traveling Friends had turned my head, and a wife's place is at home."

"Canst thou doubt, Susanna, that if the call is laid upon thee, I would not spare thee as willingly as my good sister—" in-law at Horley Mill spares Thomas for his journeys in Truth's name? She says her part is to release him by minding the business, cherishing the children, and being much in prayer that he may be given large openings in the blessed work."

This last doubt removed, Susanna happily consented to give her hand to this worthy lover. They sat on a bank talking earnestly, the patient team standing by with closed eyes and slowly moving jaws, until Susa started up:—"It must be past supper-time at Bonwicks—and thou, Benedict, will get benighted in the forest with these slow oxen."

"I feel the night will be as bright day, with such a prospect of a home with thee before me," said Benedict, as he kissed her tenderly and started his team towards Shipley.

Susanna hurried home and cheered her family with her news, highly acceptable to all, especially to Josiah, who always remembered that the day which lost him the best pair of oxen he ever owned, gained for him his much valued friend, Benedictus Martin, as a brother.

MEETING OF THE WOMEN'S PROBLEMS GROUP.

The Third Month meeting of the Women's Problems Group of the Social Order Committee, stirred by the earnest address of J. Rowntree Gillett on Quaker Ideals, proved to be a heart-searching time. Some of the most interesting thoughts were brought out in the discussion that followed the address and the writer of this report will therefore not attempt to distinguish between the two, but will simply give a sketch of the meeting as a whole.

One of the most important Christian ideals that Friends have emphasized is that of the equality, before God, of man and woman. God can reveal Himself through woman as through man. Even in Hebrew times there were women among the prophets; and Paul, in spite of his misunderstanding directions, was thoroughly in accord with Jesus' principles when he said that in God "there is neither male nor female." In the Churches, even yet, there is a surprising lack of opportunity for women; in England especially, where a woman of such power as Maude Royden was denied the use of an empty chair in which to speak, which nobody else wanted. The deep significance of this change in the position of woman is not fully understood as yet, even among Friends.

We should make far more effort than we do, Rowntree Gillett feels, to spread our gospel, especially among young people, and the girl students just emerging from college.

The lack of sacredness accorded the marriage vow and the alarming number of divorces show that the social unit is not healthy; and if the family life of a nation is diseased how can any other part of it be healthy? We can see that the international life is wrong, but we do not so easily see that our own national and industrial life is in danger. It is not easy to see these things, as Rowntree Gillett himself found when he went to Vienna, purposely to observe conditions there; yet even with such a purpose it took him a whole month to discover that the city was starving. And so, too, when we are told that nine-tenths of our own population is living below the "comfort line" we do not see nor realize it. These uncomfortable facts must be faced; and to face them means work. Men and women, both, are needed to rebuild this world of ours. Women, as a rule, are more conscientious than men. Recognition of this is not flattery, but a challenge to every woman. It is observed among many groups of women, whether women students, women doctors or women legislators; witness Jeannette Rankin, who, when the vote in the House was to be taken on our entering the war, cast her vote against it and burst into tears.

When he is asked to explain the Quaker faith, Rowntree Gillett likes to say that it is a society of persons whose aim is to be God-controlled, i. e., to do the will of the Father. It is a congregational form of church government because it believes in the inspired group; but it no less believes in the inspired individual. History shows that the inspired individual precedes the inspired group; that light comes through the individual. Therefore be careful how we treat the individual; do not call him a radical, for he may have more light than the rest of us; do not lock him up, or we may be found to be quenching the Spirit. God in the individual is our Quaker ideal; therefore individual liberty must be preserved.

There are many forms of liberty which we are stressing today; for instance, the liberty to live presumes a living wage. The State should see to this. It should also provide an education for every individual. We have long been striving for political liberty and now we are beginning to think about industrial liberty, too, in the democratizing of industry and other such measures.

Liberty is not license, the two must not be confused. Liberty never calls us to harm our fellows; and in the name of liberty some unscrupulous persons have to be controlled. Liberty, rather, is the power to choose your own bonds. Perfect liberty is a state of bondage to—the laws of God! The only free man is the God-controlled man. (This was said in reply to the objection that we hear so much about liberty; but how are you to maintain law and order?) Many people feel that there is no such thing as liberty. Perhaps there is not as much as we think. For instance, what would we be if we had been brought up in the slums of New York, or working a can-stamping machine all the years of our working life?

If he is asked, "What is going to happen if everyone can say or print what he likes?" Rowntree Gillett would say, "I would rather die with liberty than rest secure with my brother in bondage." He is indeed much afraid of the paternal government that protects us by taking away the liberty of another. There is no morality without freedom; for there is no virtue in being good if you had no freedom to do wrong.

The only hope for our social order lies in a true spiritual awakening. It is only as we see God that we realize that things are wrong.

To Rowntree Gillette the great test of the social order is the attitude of its people to the weakest member in it. This weakest member, up to the present time, among nearly all peoples, is the prostitute. The attitude that Jesus takes toward her is proof of the greatness of His character, and reveals the wonder of His message. It is a searching arraignment of our civilization that such a character is not only taken for granted, but is actually created and demanded. To cope with this most insidious evil, Rowntree Gillette feels that Quaker women should feel a special call. Their whole training and tradition has fitted them for it. They of all women are called to it.

HANNAH C. PYLE.

SUPPORT for causes regarding which Friends have taken up a stand comes from most unexpected quarters.

The old-established paper, Horse and Hound, which describes itself as "the responsible weekly journal for Racing and Hunting Folk," gives the London Quarterly Meeting Minute on Capital Punishment in full, and express their approval. The writer adds: "But I join issue regarding the denial that some persons are past redemption; and that denial appears to be vitiated in the resolution itself where it is asserted that tainted heredity is in some degree responsible. How is it proposed to redeem a person from tainted heredity? Mere prevention is, of course, not redemption."

The criticism is one worth a little consideration. The sporting writer is also a better scholar of Scripture than Lord Morris, ex-Premier of Newfoundland. Lord Morris, writing on Capital Punishment in the Weekly Despatch, said: "Among the Commandments none was more clearly understood than 'Thou shalt not kill.' And the penalty laid down was 'an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth.' We do not find the Founder of Christianity Himself by word or precept departing from this ordinance. Then why should we?"

The writer in Horse and Hound commends Lord Morris' attention to the "But" which follows in Christ's words, "But I say unto you . . ." "It clearly invalidates his appeal to Christ," he rightly concludes.

Address to the Class of 1922 at Tunesassa.

The story is told in "The University of Hard Knocks," of a country girl who went to work as a stenographer in the office of a business concern. She had never had any office experience and was so green that she was the joke of the office. She made many blunders, but she never made the same blunder twice. She learned the lesson from each bump. She never "got done." When she had finished the work she had been put at, she could see something else that ought to be done, and she would go on doing it. She developed that rare faculty the world is bidding for—initiative. The other girls "got done." When they had finished the work they had been put at, they would wait—O, so patiently, they would wait—to be told what to do next. The first night when it came quitting time, she went right on working. They had to stop her, and she was the only one they ever had to stop. All the rest were self-stoppers. In a few months the other girls began to ask her questions, because she had learned more about the business than they, though some of them had been there much longer. The manager says: "And I began to ask her advice. Pretty soon she was handling much of my correspondence, and they said there was a marked improvement in our letters. And before long that girl from the country was telling us all what to do. We just seconded the motion. We had to make her superintendent of the office. She was already Superintendent, and we had to label her to comply with the pure food laws.

"The other girls felt hurt about it. They asked why she made her Superintendent. I told them she made herself Superintendent. They asked why we didn't make Jennie Superintendent, when Jennie had been there so many years. I had to tell them 'it wasn't an endurance contest, but a matter of growing.' There are more great places than small places begging for people big enough to fill them. The world's progress is held back by just one thing—our universal unwillingness to grow. It means struggle and overcoming. None of us have grown to our possibilities."

In the great field of business there are many duplicates of this little story. In each one the details would be different, but the lesson they all teach is the same, the lesson of growth.

Some of you, if you have not already done so, will soon be choosing the occupation you are to follow for a life work, or at least I hope you will. Everyone needs some definite kind of work, into which he can put his heart, as well as his hands. It is a kind of anchor which keeps one from drifting too much with the current. The kind of work one does matters much less than the way he does it. All useful work is honorable. The real man or woman is infinitely more than the occupation he follows. True education never makes a man or woman feel above doing any kind of useful work, however humble it may be considered in the eyes of the world. I like to think of the way George H. Hepworth puts into the mouth of Hiram Golf the words, "There aint no such thing in this wide world as a humble vocation." Hiram, who was a shoemaker, was talking to the new minister who had come to call on him. The minister thought to encourage him by telling him that he was glad to see a man who could use the humblest vocation for the glory of God as he was doing. Hiram continued: "Now you are a minister of the Gospel by the grace of God. Ain't that so? Well, I'm a shoemaker by the grace of God. If I make good shoes I shall get just as much credit in the hereafter as you will for being a faithful pastor. All work is noble and honorable." I wish there were more men and women who could do their work as if it were given to them by God to do.

The keynote, then of the message I would leave with you to-day is this—Grow. And this message is not for the young people alone. It is for everyone of us, older as well as younger.

If we can keep growing we shall not become old in heart. What is more beautiful than to see a man or woman approaching the sunset of life, whose spirit is so full of youth and of joy, that the boys and girls seek them out among the crowds, because they know and understand the heart of youth. And I would have you—I would have us all grow, not only in stature, in health, in the power to think, and the power to accomplish results, but also in the deeper things of the spirit. In faith, that strong, quiet, unquenchable faith in the loving-kindness of God, the wisdom of Providence, the guidance of the Great Spirit, which will enable us to approach calmly and without fear every vicissitude of life, and will make it possible for us to live our lives effectively, grandly, letting go the unworthy things that meet us, such as worry, discontent, hatred.

I want us also to grow in love, that most wonderful of all virtues, that most potent of all spiritual forces, that which is in itself the complete rule of life. For "Love is the fulfilling of the law." "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor." "Love suffereth long, and is kind; love envieth not; love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not its own, is not provoked, taketh not account of evil; rejoiceth in its unrighteousness, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." "He that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God." "For God is love." Few, if any of us, realize fully what it means to live with our hearts filled with love. What joy there is in it! What perfect peace! What power! Even savage breasts have been tamed by it! Then let us grow in love.

And now, in closing, let us recall those beautiful lines of the poet Holmes about the growth of the soul in the latter part of the "Chambered Nautilus." We will start at the third stanza, where he refers to the manner of growth of this little creature of the tropical seas. It lives in a spiral shell beginning with one division. Each year a new chamber larger than the last is formed, the old one being deserted and closed with a shelly partition. These partitions divide the shell into separate chambers, whence it derives its name.

Year after year beheld the silent toil
That spread his lustrous coil;
Still, as the spiral grew,
He left the past year's dwelling for the new,
Stole with soft step its shining archway through,
Built up its idle door,
Stretched in his last-found home, and knew the old no more.

Thanks for the heavenly message brought by thee,
Child of the wandering sea,
Cast from her lap, forlorn!
From thy dead lips a clearer note is born
Than ever Triton blew from wreathed horn!
While on my ear it rings,
Through the deep caves of thought I hear a voice that sings:—

Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaunted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea.

WHEN I have attempted to join myself to others by services, it proved an intellectual trick,—no more. They eat your service like apples, and leave you out. But love them, and they feel you, and delight in you all the time.—EMERSON.

TEMPERANCE.

The material for this issue has been furnished by Benjamin F. Whitson.

We will not quit. We will not accept defeat. We will not compromise nor budge. We will wait on the Lord while the beer and wine madness flows and ebbs. We will fight it out on this line if it takes all this generation. We will not rest till prohibition triumphs in every nation in the civilized world.—H. H. JASTROW, Auburn, N. Y.

SALVAGING MEN is the significant title of a written address by B. E. Soule, a business man, who writes for the Hardware Age in the issue of Second Month 8, 1923. It reads like an advertisement for the Salvation Army, giving all credit to Colonel McIntyre whose recent talk before the Boston Rotary Club is admitted to be background and authority for the facts enumerated. But the Hardware Age seems to have no objection to speaking a word for the "Army" and its "Colonel" quite apart from "the dollar angle of the sawdust trail," nor does THE FRIEND. Business men are apt to express their religious convictions in terms of economics which are sometimes very forceful. Even the Apostle Paul said, "Godliness is profitable."

The address begins with characteristic directness: "Friends, I want you to know Colonel 'Bill' McIntyre. This big chap's business is to salvage men. As a nation we have been fairly busy salvaging material things—forests, desert waste, water-power. Salvage is frequently the difference between profit and loss. 'By-products' is the industrial term for things salvaged. But there is waste humanity—waste manhood, womanhood, girlhood, boyhood. Those above a certain line lift the human race to better conditions, those below it are a drag. Roger Babson says we have 10,000,000 people who are below the mental standard. We know that just before prohibition became a law we had a prison population of 500,000 in the United States. We had in the world 750,000 besotted, hopeless drunkards. We know that 50,000 fallen women died every year. The moral loss was mighty and the cash cost ran into astounding figures.

"In 1898 Colonel McIntyre began intensive efforts to reclaim drunkards, and he installed a cost accounting system that would show the money as well as the moral aspect of the work. He had in Buffalo fifteen men whom he termed the Fifteen Terribles. These men had served jail sentences aggregating fifty-two years. Their arrest, conviction and imprisonment had cost $49,000. The Salvation Army had on their hands at that time, after omitting all except besotted cases, 200,000 drunkards. Assuming that ten per cent. of these were of the type of the Fifteen Terribles, we would have 20,000 terrors at a cost of $3266,000 each, or a total of $65,320,000. This is only the flat cost. To get the true cost we must not omit the lost earning power. Figuring wages at two dollars per day, two hundred and sixty-five days in the year, we see a total of $10,000. Add this to the previous figures and we have a total of $75,920,000. "To take hold of a business with a loss like that and jump it to a profit of $10,000,000 a year is some job! But here is a business operated by divine inspiration that makes most of the big things in business look comparatively small. This group of reformed "boozers" made more money in twelve months than all the churches gave to foreign missions last year.

"A few months ago Colonel McIntyre gave a 'boozers' banquet in New York City. Invitations were issued to those only whom the Salvation Army knew to have been of the so-called 'homeless' variety. (It is well to remember their slogan, 'A man may be down but he is never out.') Three hundred invitations were sent just three days in advance of the date. One hundred and sixty-seven men replied and attended the banquet. They all have been thirty-third degree rum-hounds. These men had lived 7400 years. They had spent 3238 years in drunkenness—44 per cent. of their lives. But they had been reformed, for an average of six years. They all had employment. They are earning nearly $200,000 a year on the two-dollar basis. It is safe to say that the men at that banquet are earning $1,000,000 a year, for most of them are skilled workers. Some salvage! And yet many of us think of the Salvation Army as a soul-saving institution. It's that all right! but it is one of the world's greatest wealth producers as well. In New York State 600 prisoners were paroled to the Salvation Army. These men earned on an average $31.50 a week, or $945,000 with a two-week vacation allowed for. It had cost the State forty-seven cents to keep them in prison. That's $96,930. Add this to the previous figures and we have a total salvage of $1,041,930 in one year. Not a bad record!"

The concluding paragraphs of the article from which we have quoted would seem inappropriate to the purpose of the "temperance page" except for the fact that more than fifty per cent. of all the criminals in the past have attributed their downfall to drink. Remove effectively this one awful curse, and we shall have accomplished the biggest salvaging job ever conceived and effected. The conclusion is a personal appeal to "Do or Dig."

"In every town there are cases of waste manhood. It takes a big influence to turn a man from a mad downhill course to the slow, hard uphill grind of coming back. Most of these starts are made because some other man with a big love in his heart takes the time and the trouble to talk with the down-and-outer, and to follow with a sympathetic interest the effort that sometimes results. With the power of National Prohibition the number of wretched drunkards has been materially reduced. Other sins to which manhood succumbs are, however, plentiful. It we are so built that we cannot work personally to salvage some of the driftwood, we may at least dig down past the small change the next time we see a Salvation Army group at work.

"I have purposely refrained from mentioning the four very prominent hardware men whose names are in the 'reclaimed' files of the S. A. They probably wouldn't object, but I would just forget the past, as they have forgotten it in the big work they are doing. Funny, isn't it, how the 'sawdust trail looks when viewed from the dollar angle!'"

NON-SUPPORT CASES brought to the Municipal Court of Philadelphia in 1919 numbered 4,106. In 1922 the number of such cases was only 1,873.

ALCOHOLIC ADDICTS admitted to hospitals for mental diseases in Pennsylvania have fallen from 130 in 1917 to 50 in 1922. During the same period the number of drug addicts fell from 29 to 8.

ARRESTS FOR DRUNKENNESS and Disorderly Conduct have diminished greatly since 1917 in almost all parts of Pennsylvania, reports to the contrary notwithstanding. Even so large a city as Pittsburgh shows a reduction of 43 per cent., the figures being 28,936 in 1917 to 16,554 in 1922. Other cities showing even greater saving are Easton, Erie, New Castle, Johnstown, Harrisburg, Williamsport and others.

A NEW YORK Friend, located temporarily in South India, has written the following stimulating letter to his friends at home:—

"When I heard about a little settlement of Friends in Matala, only eighteen miles from here, I decided to call on them, and it will interest you to hear about the good work Annie E. Clayton is doing on Joseph Malcomson's estate. The school has forty-two native girls as scholars; all are so happy and attractive. The Friends' Foreign Mission Association supported the school, but contributions having ceased, the school was supposed to be closed. One of the English teachers left, but the other, Annie E. Clayton, decided to see what she could do. J. Malcomson promised her the buildings, and for the little fee the girls pay her, she has been able to cover the running expenses. She has four native teachers, young girls educated in the school. Besides these, she is the only educated woman for many miles around."

THE MINUTE OF EXERCISE.

READ AT THE LAST SESSION OF THE LATE YEARLY MEETING.

Our sessions this year have been marked by a large variety of important religious concerns. But through this variety has run a unity of aim—the upbuilding of all our members in a living faith in Jesus Christ, and a full dedication to His service.

At our first session, the enlarged interest of the Yearly Meeting in the missionary work of our members was a source of great satisfaction. We were reminded that the early Friends were very active in going out into new fields. In this move, therefore, we are taking a step towards the position of early Friends.

In considering the revision of our Discipline we were reminded that oftentimes it is we ourselves who need revision, not only the Discipline. Yet in nearly every subject we are now facing the world, not ourselves. The language of religion may vary; the nature of religion remains the same. As we met on Third-day morning, our hearts were bowed in reverent prayer to our Heavenly Father that the broadening of our interests and outlook should be accompanied by a true deepening of our spiritual experience, so that there should be no shallowness in our lives, but richness and power.

The letter to the meeting on the general subject of Evangelism was a clear call to us all as members of the Church of Christ, that we should be true fishers of men. Whether this call is for service abroad or at home, whether in the ministry of the spoken word or in that of the quiet, spirit-filled daily life, the challenge should find a ready response in all our hearts: "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" Whatever gift we have brings with it a responsibility for its use. As the life-giving faith in Jesus Christ works in our souls, we shall more and more become witnesses to Him in whatever place or in whatever ways He calls us. The subject of Gospel Ministry repeatedly claimed serious attention. At the session Third-day afternoon the revised form of the Eighth Query called forth a stirring appeal. Many of our members are active men and women who in business, in social life, and in home life are devoting their lives to the cause of Christ. But lives must not become so full of good things to be done that no time is left for the work of the Gospel ministry. The call is especially urgent to young men and women to keep to moderation in these things, and to be ready to give way to the secret spiritual exercises in their souls. "Covet earnestly the best gifts" and again, "Desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy." In considering the Queries on Fourth-day morning, the Men's Meeting was forcibly reminded of the inestimable importance of the ministry. Ministry is a "gift," and people are "called" to its exercise, but the gift is one that we should strongly desire, and we should eagerly listen for the call and joyously obey it when it comes. Unless we have a very clear intimation of duty, we should not go to meeting expecting to speak therein, and just as truly we should not go to meeting with our minds definitely made up that we are not going to have a call to speak. "There is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty."

In the Women's Meeting a special concern arose for those meetings which school children attend, that for them we should covet especially the gift of teaching that we may present truths of the Gospel in simple messages. And, indeed, it was asked: "What must the children think of grown people who have never a word to say for Jesus Christ?"

In both meetings our hearts were warmed by the faithfulnes of Friends attending various colleges who gather together in small groups for times of worship after our usual manner. The outreaching love of home meetings should go out richly to these young people, that they may be strengthened by the sense that we are all "members one of another."

In the Women's Meeting the right use of leisure time and the choice of recreations and amusements was dwelt upon. One test in this matter is to consider whether we desire to reach the highest and best of which we are capable, or are content for our lives to be on lower levels. We shall have to forego many things that are only pleasant if we want to hold steadfastly to those which are best.

Throughout our sessions we have had numerous other special messages, many of them leading us into the very fundamentals of our Christian faith. In the providence of God, spiritual power and spiritual messages are conveyed from one to another through personal messengers.

As a religious body we stand or fall by our meetings for worship; and, on the other hand, there is immense value in the human touch, and many an effective sermon is preached out of meeting. We must be at all times spiritually alert, ready for whatever variety of service our Heavenly Father may call for.

The reports of the Peace Committee and of the Social Order Committee brought home to us that these matters are not detached concerns upon the minds of some Friends, but that they are closely connected with each other, and with all else that tends towards the Kingdom of God.

Our enthusiasm for peace should be a religious enthusiasm, not simply an economic or political doctrine; and peace should become a Christian conviction, not simply a Quaker peculiarity. Likewise sensitiveness to the problems of the Social Order is part of our practical Christianity, and of our effort to base our lives upon the Golden Rule, as taught by the Prince of Peace.

As we yield our lives to Him, and mind our calling, we shall find ourselves serviceable vessels, useful to others in this day of opportunity, and in a united fellowship of Christian service we may all together help bring to the world a better day.

A VILLAGE ON THE STEPPES.

We ride into the village at twilight, after a long day's trek over the white splendor of the steppe. It lies at the foot of a low hill, steeped in blue shadow, and the sky just over the hill glows a faint gold.

The road swerves suddenly from its northerly direction and takes us due west along the frozen, thread-like Uran river, dips down over the sagging bridge and disappears. Evidently no one had crossed the bridge since the snow storm of several days ago. The surface of the snow is smooth and unbroken. By the bridge is a clump of shadowy trees, and just beyond, spread out before us, is the village, buried in snow, the thatched roofs looking like the tops of little hillocks of earth, only the meteyel (prayer tower) on a little hill of its own, rising rigidly clear of the drifts. Most of the houses are in ruins.

We have no idea where we are. When we started we only knew that off to the northeast of Buzuluk County the Bashkir Republic begins. We had simply been aiming blindly in the direction of a certain village which we thought was in the south, and whither our drivers said they knew the road. Now all we know is that we are somewhere in the Bashkir Republic.

From the Bashkirs had come many and urgent appeals to the office of the Friends' Mission in Sorochinskoye to save them by starvation. At first the Mission had considered it impossible to extend help into the Bashkir Republic and into Pugachev County from which equally insistent appeals were being received. There was barely enough food in the warehouses to feed the starving in the Friends' own district in Buzuluk County. But we could not let the people over the border die without at least investigating their condition and seeing how much help was actually needed and whether any could be sent. So we have come across the steppes in our sleighs, and have at last reached the first Bashkir village, which we were later to learn was Babishova, some 70 versts north of the point at which we expected to cross the border.

A thin column of smoke is rising from one of the hillocks, and we make for that, down a long narrow street with the snow blown like frozen white waves just ready to break over the huts, only the top of the windows peering over the edge, like the little squinting eye of the Bashkirs themselves. Very few of the houses are inhabited.

We stop at the first house where there is any sign of life. It is the house of the President of the local Soviet. Inside is a low, dark, smoky room. A sick child lies bundled on the floor, three or four other children sit about watching their mother prepare the soup, and an old Babushka (grandmother) groans on the stove. In the corner is a pile of red striped rugs and pillows which shows that this family has not been reduced to its last extremity.

The President offers to put us up for the night. Our hearts sink a little—we suggest that we have baggage with us and will take up a lot of room, and perhaps we would disturb the sick child. He seems to understand and leads us off down the street to another house. The children are bundled off to another hut—about a dozen of them—the mother and father retire to the kitchen, and leave us in possession of a room with a Singer sewing machine in it, a table, two chairs, and an even higher pile of striped rugs and pillows. This family must be very rich, we say to each other, to have all these possessions through the famine.

After the samovar a dozen or so men gather in the little room—the only men left in the village except for a few who are too old and sick to leave their huts. They sit around us cross-legged on the floor, a black-brown, Mongolian featured group. A few old men with grey beards and skull caps, the younger ones with those long drooping slender mustaches the Orientals love, their points meeting a funny little rim of beard that circles their chins.

The secretary is a merry little man. He wears a huge cap lined with fox fur. It has four flaps. One of them is turned up over his forehead, the others are loose at the sides, curving away from his head like two great fuzzy ears. We have asked that he bring his statistics to the meeting, and he steps forward in a business-like way and spreads out his records on the table.

We begin our questionnaire, by which we judge the needs of the various towns. First, "How many died of the famine?" we ask.

"An even half," the secretary answers, with something almost like pride in his voice, as he shows his neat figures in purple ink. In one column 488, in the other 244. Such a nice, clean cut! It made all your calculations so much simpler. In a third column was the figure "4"—the handful of new babies born since the famine.

"And now in the last three months how many have died?"

"Sixteen."

"Of hunger?"

"It is hard to tell. If not of this year's hunger, they may have died of last year's hunger, and the things they ate. Last year we were eating flour made of bones—even now they are grinding bones at the mill. We ate harness, leather straps, anything. And now many people are eating grass again."

They told us that people who had cows could get the lebeda and live, because when washed down with milk it wasn't so bad. But those who could not mix it with milk almost always swelled up and died sooner or later. And there was little hope for those who were eating katon with its sharp little pricklers that puncture the intestines. In the summer time there were still dogs and cats left, and you could catch the soosliks then. And last year they had had their cattle to eat. But now there was not a dog or a cat left, the soosliks were in their holes under the snow, and they did not dare to kill the last of their cattle.

The secretary pointed to some more neat figures in purple ink, telling of the losses in animals. One column was marked 1920, the other 1923, and under these years the figures ran like this: "Horses, 500—18; cows, 328—35; oxen, 3—0; sheep, 500—1." For half as many people one-twenty-eighth as many horses, one-ninth as many cows, and one-five-hundredth as many sheep.

The questioning continues. The little group of men sit there telling us figures that spell their doom, most of them with immediate starvation staring them in the face. They do not complain, they only answer very simply the questions we ask them. Talking in Bashkir among themselves (a language which seems to be achieved by gargling your voice in your throat), in broken Russian to us.

Their total harvests this year was 240 oods, an amount that would nominally count as just enough to keep the whole village going for one month after the harvest.

We held their lives in our hands. But they never fretted and whined about their condition—they never begged us. Only the next morning as we were leaving they quietly handed us the list we had asked for of those who had nothing left in the world, and who would probably die in another month if we could not help them—179 souls.

FRIENDS' SERVICE AND INTERNATIONAL GOODWILL.

In its issue of First Month 15, 1923, Reconstruction, a fortnightly newspaper published in Vienna, contains the following account of an activity of the Friends' Mission in which it sees the seeds of international goodwill:

INTERNATIONALISM IN THE NURSERY.

"A delightful spectacle showing how children can be trained to internationalism was recently offered in Vienna when two successive parties, each of about 500 children, were given a Christmas treat by the Anglo-American Friends' Mission there. All of the children invited had spent nearly a year in England. Since their return every effort has been made by the Friends to foster their knowledge of English, clubs are held in the different districts where nothing but English is spoken, the children responding gladly to what is required of them. The entertainment given by them at the treat provided much for reflection as to the best means of bringing about a true internationalism, thus realizing the dream of the late W. T. Stead by placing this in the hands of the children. They sang both German and English carols, played one-act plays in German and English. It was wonderful with what ease the little ones passed from one tongue to the other. It was equally pleasurable to experience the harmony existing between one and all, the grown-ups, who were both English and Austrian, included. It gives hope of a time when racial and national antagonism will have ceased, when the whole world will have become as one."

SHIPMENTS received for week ending Third Month 31, 1923—71 boxes and packages.

Cash contributions for the same period—$5,781.34.

THE GIFT FUND.

Six years ago this spring, when visions of our needs in the Yearly Meeting Schools seemed altogether out of proportion to our financial resources, there suddenly came to the Committee on Education a wonderful letter. It bore no signature, but gave the information that there was to be placed to our credit the sum of $500. Our anonymous donor further said that the money was not to be hoarded or invested or kept for some specific purpose for future days, but was to be used to improve our schools. The letter ended with the stimulating word that if the Committee on Education set to work at once and spent this gift wisely in developing the schools another gift would follow.

Was this not a magical gift? Needless to say, the Committee with hearts aglow set to work. In the autumn of the same year, while some of us were attending the Five Years' Meeting, the cloudburst came. Another $500 from the same unknown donor. To some of us the events of the Richmond gathering were almost lost sight of in the radiant vision of our little schools. But the great thought which most lifted our spirits was that somebody cared enough for education to endow our schools, and that the donor had confidence in the Committee whose responsibility it was to keep these Yearly Meeting Schools running. We must not fail him, was the thought that spurred our effort.

It now seems proper to render an account of this Fund. Has the money been spent wisely?

In the first place we established as a principle that this fund should be kept entirely separate from our other finances and should be known and used as the Gift Fund. Second, that it should be used primarily for permanent improvements. That local committees should be encouraged to look after their deficits, normal upkeep of property, salaries of teachers, etc., while the larger policies of the upbuilding of the schools should be ours.

To this end we have in expending the Gift Fund made careful survey of the local situation in the schools under our charge. We have asked of each community whether a felt need for a school existed in the neighborhood, whether the meeting stood solidly behind the school to the extent of giving it financial support. The budgets of each local committee were carefully considered. There was no question, with these facts before us, as to where to begin. We could see with our own eyes, other conditions being met, that Media had a little dingy building of an old-time period that could not adequately house the children who wanted to come to school. So Media school has been renewed by enlarging and remodeling the house, with improved heating and sanitary conditions. One thousand dollars of this fund was given to Media School.

Haddonfield School was using only one-half her available space. This fine old house, a source of pride to her local patronage, was being, partly rented out to make added income for the school; at once the way was made clear to include the whole house in our school plant, with such necessary alterations as could best take care of the children. Haddonfield School has thus had a very large slice from the Gift Fund.

Lansdowne School was outgrowing its building and needed more space for serving luncheon to her children. We helped in meeting this need, and also in providing a nature teacher of unusual ability.

Atlantic City, a school rapidly growing, so that now its enrollment is over one hundred pupils, was given over a thousand dollars from this fund for desks and kindergarten equipment.

Downtown came to us with the vision in her soul of starting a Friends' School, and with this fund to draw on we were able to give encouragement in the form of money and so a worthy school was established and built at Downtown.

London Grove Friends had a new and large problem before them in starting a joint Friends' School, and it was a satisfaction to be able to help them in doing this.

Frankford, with our help, renovated and improved her building and Fallsington School modestly took the smallest sum of all.

At a time when living expenses had so increased that teachers' salaries were all unprepared for the advance, we were able to give bonuses both to our teachers and our superintendent. We have furnished two special teachers, one in Art and one in Physical Education, to all of our eight schools. We have been able to finance a little school visiting for our teachers, to some of the superior private schools, such as Park School at Buffalo, and the good effects from this visiting are still to be seen in our group. And when the opportunity came for us to get for our superintendent a woman of rare vision and culture and training, in Gertrude Sherer, we were able to assure her an extra year's study at Columbia University, to more fully prepare her for the task, and to meet her needs for an office suitably equipped and furnished and to grant her such participation in the Retirement Fund as made it worth her while to serve us.

Such, in brief, has been our use of the Gift Fund, for detailed inventory of which we refer you to our Executive Committee and Treasurer.

As we see this wonderful fund fading away, and review the activities of our schools in the past few years, we ask ourselves the difficult question: Have we made progress in these schools? Are we increasing in purpose and in power? Is it worth while to continue our work of development and expansion? We view our losses with dismay. Our failures in many directions dishearten us. Yet we believe that not with blinded eyes do we see that our work as a whole is advancing. For we see a strengthening of earnest purpose with a spirit of fine devotion on the part of our teachers. We see a growth in ability to cooperate on the part of local committees, a deepening loyalty on the part of school patrons, a greater willingness to give of their material resources on the part of our Monthly Meetings. These signs fill us with hope, and hope "can create from its own wreck the thing it contemplates." We appeal to you, men and women of large heart, who have means as well as vision, to help this work go on. It is your sympathy, your interest, your faith, your hope and belief in our little schools that gives wings to those who plod along at the daily task.

OLIVE R. HAVILAND.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

SINCE the following appeared in the Philadelphia Public Ledger on the 3rd, we learn that J. H. S. is soon to return home and that H. L. M. will remain in the Ruhr and keep the work alluded to:

"A delegation of American Quakers, including J. Henry Scattergood and William K. Thomas, of Philadelphia; Prof. Homer L. Morris, of Richmond, Ind., and Clement Biddle, of Mount Vernon, N. Y., was received today by Chancellor Cuno for an hour's discussion of child-feeding and the general political situation.

"The Quakers put a number of questions to the Chancellor to learn whether a settlement insuring payments to France and her security was possible. Herr Cuno, following the line of his earlier declarations, said Germany was willing to pay up to the limit of its ability as fixed by some impartial investigation body. He mentioned his Hamburg proposal of a plebiscite peace pact as offering France the necessary guarantees of security if France were willing to embark on such a plan.

"Wilbur K. Thomas and Clement Biddle are going to Poland and Russia. More than 100,000 Ruhr children, the Ledger states, are on the list of those to be fed by American Quakers."

IN the Guardian (Church of England) for 16th ult., there is an appreciative article entitled "Jordans, a Spiritual Experience," in which the writer described the week-end at the Hostel and the meeting-house. Speaking of the meeting, the writer says: "Worship it had been in spirit and in truth, and one felt again that of all the Protestant family, the Friends are the nearest to the catholic faith, and that they have the greatest offer to bring."

THE career of a doctor, says an English periodical, is attracting many of our Quaker girls. Possibly that of a nurse has less outward attraction and may mean more drudgery, but in it there lies great power for service. It is well worth the cost.

W. FEARON HALLIDAY writes: "The Friends have a unique heritage. It is very difficult to define, but it concerns what is vital, namely, that reconciliation with God involves a certain disposition. You may describe it as having the mind of Christ, or the Christ-like spirit, but however you define it, the thing is unmistakable. It has in it the love that thinketh no evil; the belief that only good can overcome evil; that there is a seed of goodness in the human heart to which we must appeal; and that our only appeal is through a true human-ness which wakes us to an other-worldliness."

ELISE P. SMITH, who has for some years been a resident of Philadelphia, has accepted the appointment of hostess of the John Woolman Memorial at Mt. Holly.

The Trustees have been trying to get the Legislature of New Jersey to make an appropriation to improve the house and grounds, and particularly to purchase the frame work of John Woolman's own house, which for many years has been part of a nearby barn. The New Jersey Legislature as yet has not made the appropriation and cannot do so this year at least. In the meantime, it seemed likely that the barn would be sold. Within the last few weeks the Trustees have arranged to move the old frame work to the grounds of the Memorial, which contains, as most know, a brick house which John Woolman built for his daughter.

It will require about $3,000 to secure the old frame work, as it must be replaced with a barn of equal value, move it to its new location and put it in order for occupancy. Walter F. Price is at work on plans to make the old frame work knit with the brick house already used as a tea house. Last year over 2,000 visitors came to the Woolman Memorial, expressing pleasure at the quaint simplicity of this Quaker shrine. The publication of Amelia Mott Gummere's "John Woolman's Journal" will undoubtedly turn increased attention to his ancient home and its surroundings. The Trustees are now about to raise the funds necessary to complete the improvement. J.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, of the N. Y. Nation, recently addressed the Women's League for Peace at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, Philadelphia. Many Friends were present. He advocated immediate and universal disarmament, followed by another Hague Conference, called by President Harding, as the only means of escaping the threatened collapse of civilization. The Government of Poincaré no more represented the French people, he said, than did that at Washington, America. He suggested the recodification of international law and the establishment of an international court to settle all disputes. "The invasion of the Ruhr," he said, "has been called the greatest crime of the age. It will be a great blessing to mankind if the Germans show that there is some power greater than force. The whole Christian world must be on the side of Germany in this struggle to establish the superiority of moral weapons over physical."

MILEE MERLE, Directress of the Maternity Hospital at Châlons, France, has become almost a household name among us. Alluding to the financial statement of the hospital, she writes the committee has had no trouble in balancing the accounts for the past year. The result has been beyond her utmost hopes, and the success both financial and otherwise was quite unlooked for.

ELLS PAXSON OBERHOLTZER, of the University of Pennsylvania, and of an old Chester County Quaker family, in writing a review of "The Journal and Essays of John Woolman," by Amelia Mott Gummere, says that the author remarks truly that the Journal of John Woolman "has grown into a classic occupying a place unique in literature." He states that "Robert Louis Stevenson, in the vagabondage which the work of keeping life in his frail body imposed upon him, used to say that he carried Woolman's Journal with him for the spiritual good which he found in it as well as for the rare purity of its literary style. Charles Lamb recommended everyone 'to get the writings of John Woolman by heart.' Whittier loved the reading of the Journal so much that he, with many words of praise, attached his name to, and saw through the press, one of the editions."—From the American Friend.

What is the answer? Have Friends the zeal to develop the community life of an unchurching residence section of a large modern American city? This question presses Detroit Friends for an early answer.

The Council of Churches asks them to take this responsibility and gives them, this summer in which to show progress. The Friends feel that they should take this step, but cannot do so without financial aid to secure the building.

DO WE LIVE UP TO OUR IDEALS?

Approximately a century ago Emerson's advice to humanity was "Hitch your wagon to a star," which is but another way of saying, "Select for yourself an ideal, an ideal that is noble and pure, and so high that it will require you to be vigorously active, if you are to approach it, and yet will be always just far enough beyond your best effort to continue to be the lodestone, and draw you on and out." Happy are we if we follow such advice, for our opportunities for leaving this world a better place are unlimited. Our very environment reacts to our existence, and all the lives that we touch form our clientele.

But to many, much of the talk about an ideal is so abstract that it is above their heads. This is a practical age. The popular demand is for the concrete, the tangible. It is a fair one. Others may not be able to see our ideal, but whether or not we have one, or more than one, is quite obvious. When one stops to think about it, our lives are made up of ideals. Among the many we have an ideal for our home, for our occupation, for our reading, for our social intercourse; and above all we have an ideal that should be at the foundation of all the others—that for our religious life.

In our religious life, we, as Friends, are fortunate, almost dangerously fortunate. It was our ancestors, not we, who realized that the true worship of God is in spirit—as taught by our Saviour—and not in the teachings of specified men at stated times, or the outward ceremonies performed by others. It was they, not we, who suffered because they dared to stand apart as reformers—as peculiar in the midst of their contemporaries. In short, it was they who dared stand for and uphold, in an age of frivolity and insincerity, Christ, their ideal—and ours.

What an inheritance! And these same ancestors of ours were wonderfully far-sighted. When they organized the Society of Friends as a group bonded by a common interest in upholding Christianity as Christ taught it, they remembered, no doubt, that when our Lord returned from His agony in Gethsemane, He found His chosen disciples sleeping. They had come into personal contact with Jesus, they had had the inspiration of His example when He lived among men, yet they were human enough to lose sight of their ideal, for a time. To waken us, when we lose sight of some of our ideals, it would seem the "Queries" were written.

The "Queries" are brief, yet very much to the point. Naturally, they presuppose an attempt on our part to live up to the ideals that lie back of them. Their service obviously is two-fold.

They remind us of our ideals. Do we "maintain" love and unity? Do we "show forth," in our "speech, deportment and apparel the sincerity and simplicity which accord with the gospel of Christ?" Are we "concerned" about those for whose spiritual and bodily welfare we are either partially or wholly responsible? Are we "just" in our business relations? In other words, are we so permeated with the love of God and the spirit of Christ that those with whom we associate may recognize the value of a Christian life?

Questions like these are searching. If each of us treats them fairly, and answers a straightforward "yes" or "no," and then strives to convert the negative answer to an affirmative, then the Queries still serve their purpose. If, on the other hand, our answers are evasive and half-hearted, or, what is still worse, mere technicalities of business routine, they are worse than useless.

This year our Yearly Meeting set itself a tremendous task—that of revising the "Discipline." It is a timely task, and at the same time a very serious one. Real problems confront the committee in charge. Truth remains the same, although its expression may change. Whether the new "Discipline" follows the established form—or even retains the name, matters little; but that we have a live group of suggestions that will bring out ideals freshly and powerfully to mind, matters a great deal.

We can never progress spiritually, no matter to what bright star we "hitch our wagon," if we rest on the laurels that our forefathers' faithful concerns and solidity have given us.

R. K.

THE DISCIPLINE AND SOCIAL ORDER.

The Yearly Meeting of 1923 was marked by signs of new life and growth. One clear indication of the recognition of this stirring life is the decision of the Yearly Meeting that there shall be a revision of the Discipline. In the twinkling of an eye a committee is faced with the task of bringing the Discipline up-to-date where it lags behind practice, of writing into that slim, dull-looking book the best of the spirit of the Society of Friends in America today.

As a matter of fact, committees appointed in 1922 have already given a year's work to this task as applied to certain queries. A joint committee of the Social Order Committee and the Representative Meeting, comparing and sifting words and implications, striving to shape the Query to modern demands and to keep the beauty of the earlier spirit and wording, have produced a new Eighth Query and an addition to the advices, which read as follows:

ADVICE (as adopted by the Yearly Meeting, 1923).

Let us remember that as followers of Christ we are called to help in establishing the Kingdom of God upon earth. May our sense of brotherhood with all men be strong, leading us—as workers, as employers, and in all other relations—to make the chief aim of our lives service rather than gain. May it inspire in us a deeper sympathy with those whose development is hindered by meagre income, insufficient education, and too little freedom in directing their own lives. May it lead us not only to minister to those in need but to seek to understand the causes of social and industrial ills and to do our part, as individuals and as a Society, for their removal

EIGHTH QUERY (as revised in 1923).

Are you careful to keep to moderation in your standards of living and your pursuit of business, remembering that spiritual growth, family life, the interests of the church and public welfare call for their due share of our time and thought? Are you punctual to your promises, just in the payment of your debts, and honest in all your dealings among men? Are you endeavoring to carry out the spirit and principles indicated in that paragraph of the Advices encouraging us to do our part in bringing in the Kingdom of God?

A FARM HAND'S IMPRESSION.

[The concentration of action between the Tunesassa Indian Committee and the Indian Aid, made possible by a joint Committee, brings the duty of the Yearly Meeting toward the Indian into a clearer relief. In this connection, we are obliged to a farm-hand for his impressions.—Eds.]

He had been working on the farm and doing odd jobs around the Friends' Indian School at Tunesassa for one summer. When I asked him for his impression of the place, he seemed reluctant. A short summer's work, while he was still of high school age, gave him no authority to air his views, he claimed. But I insisted, and finally succeeded in obtaining a disconnected account of his first experience among real Indians.

It appeared that he, and several other young fellows, had been sent north to help the superintendent of the School in his summer's farm work. They were full of expectations of seeing the "noble and picturesque North American Indian in his native haunts." Not the tepees, feathers and war-paint of their childish conceptions, but the no less picturesque scenes of blanketed red-men, reduced by the relentless advance of civilization to supporting themselves by carving quaint images out of solid bone—predominated in their imaginations, which had been fired by the visit of a lecturer from the New York reservations, shortly before they had left school.

And then they arrived at Tunesassa. The railroad station, water tank, general store and surrounding shacks of the "village," in fact, even the cheese factory made little impression,—these were typical of the average rural community.

The School itself, with its neat three-story building, and its home-like atmosphere, to say nothing of the modern barn and dairy attached, pleased them. They enjoyed fully the excellent farm meals prepared by the Matron, and camping under the apple trees next to the pig-pen was at least an experience. Whether they were pitching hay, wrapping butter, or painting the roof, they enjoyed their work, and the swimming hole a short way up Quaker Run was a constant attraction after hours.

"What about the Indians?" I asked at this point, beginning to wonder if they had really seen any.

Apparently the Indians had made a slower but more lasting impression on their minds. Although no placid bone-carvers had been in evidence, they had seen real Indians. It appeared that their very first introduction to the picturesque red man occurred on the first day after their arrival, when news was received that one who lived nearby had been killed on the railroad the previous evening. After drinking heavily in Salamanca, he had attempted to "hop" a freight back to the reservation.

Three Indian boys, one of whom possessed considerable Negro blood, were kept at the School during the summer to help on the farm. If they had been Eskimos, they could not have adhered more closely to their clothes, which they wore night and day without change. They were innocent of soap or wash-basins, and occasionally had to be thrown into the river, clothes and all, by the assistant superintendent. In the corn field they were little better. A few jobs with the hoe were usually followed by half an hour of bombarding the fence or each other with stones. The youngsters could not be found fault with, for they were endlessly good-natured.

When it came to moving the house of one of the resident Indians, later in the summer, the redskins were more in evidence. It seemed that the owner of the house in question was the only intelligent Indian the fellows met during the summer. He was employed by the School and was at all times sober and dependable. Incidentally, he was a graduate of Hampton Institute. His house was to be moved an eighth of a mile or so down the road to make room for new building operations. A windlass, ropes, rollers and a toothless boss were imported from Salamanca. Indian labor from the vicinity was called in, and the work begun. For a week an emaciated horse plodded slowly around the windlass, while the Indians sat here and there watching. At the end of the week the house was just half-way down the road. Like the three Indian boys in the corn field, the employees of the house mover could not be pushed. Their work seemed to necessitate long periods of relaxation, in which they would sit on a stone and mop their streaming faces with their shirt-sleeves. The influence of another element was all too evident. Whiskey could not be procured on the reservation,—but there were other sources. . . . At the end of the week with the house half-way to its destination, the superintendent turned the job over to the young fellows from the south. They dispensed with the horse, disregarded the cautions of the toothless boss, and had the house in its new position inside of three days.

WHY SHOULD I TEACH?—Teach because teaching is service. More and more the best people are coming to see that the only self-satisfying reward in life is to extend help to others—to serve. Teach because the teacher more than all others molds the social world in which he must live, making of his boys and girls of today his fellow-citizens of tomorrow. Teach because the most interesting thing in life is to watch growth, and of all growth the most inspiring is the development of mind and character under the magic of the teacher's sympathy. Teach because teaching is a dedication of all that is best in you to all that is best in those about you—to fathers and mothers whose fondest hope is in their children, to the little child who trusts the world of grown-ups to guide him toward the light.—From a Leaflet issued by the Board of Education of New York City.

German Responses.

Since the appearance, in our Young Friends' Number, of the letter from the Berlin Meeting, sent in response to our Christmas and New Year's message to young people in Germany, several more replies have been received. As they are mostly rather lengthy, it is impossible to give more than extracts from them in this column.

One comes from Leipzig, from the Academic-Social Society of the University of Leipzig. This is a group of young folks who are endeavoring to set up a settlement in Leipzig on the lines of Hull House and Toynebee Hall, led by a Dr. Martin Leinert, who wrote the letter on their behalf. Some of them are anxious to correspond with Americans, and any Young Friend desiring to take up such a correspondence will gladly be given the address in Leipzig on application to the Young Friends' office at 20 S. Twelfth Street. Their answer to our letter is: "For some time it has become clear to us that in the face of the present situation of the world it is necessary that people of all countries should get to know each other—men and women who are willing to solve the problems between the nations in a truly human spirit and in a just way. The spirit of untruthfulness which now reigns, especially in the press, has put up between the nations huge barriers which it will only be able to overcome by serious people of the different nations getting into personal contact with each other. We think it possible to bring about acquaintance, and we think it will be useful and successful because we believe in a unity of mankind, and that every human being—whether he be German, American or French—has to decide whether he is willing to love God more than 'Mammon.'"

"All these thoughts have been living within us for some time, and we were very glad to receive your greeting because we felt that with this message you were expressing your good-will."

Then there is a letter, written in English, from a girl representing a group of young people in Liegnitz.

"We were very glad to have your fine Christmas letter, and we thank you very much. It is a great joy for us, how you do understand us and the awful situation of our beloved country. We are not at all in despair, because we are allowed to see every day grow the new and wonderful development of the German soul. We are at Liegnitz a circle of about eighty boys and girls who are called 'Crusaders.' You must not understand it in the historical sense, but we are all creatures that seek in modesty to live a life in goodness and pure love for each other like the first Christians. Therefore we feel many relations to the Quakers and we should be happy to hear more of you. All the Crusader boys and girls would like to have some books which tell of your life and your doings (these are being sent—Eds.), but of course we cannot pay them in American money. Should you help us? We shall send you our literature if you want it. How beautiful that you read and know the Bible as we do; that means a strong communication between us, does it not?"

"We send our love to all members of the Young Friends' Society."

A letter from a student of philosophy in Munich tells very strikingly of the hour in which our message reached them, and of the effect it had. Incidentally, it gives us a glimpse of what others think of us, and what a reputation Young Friends have to live up to. He says:

"With immeasurable joy and contentment a large portion of the youth of Germany greets your Christmas wish, and would like to answer it in the same greatness of soul in which it was sent.

"Just when it came, our people had received this new blow of which all the world is talking. The blood of the young people was at boiling-point, the injustice of this world forced rash thoughts into our minds, and we were at the point of returning hatred and bitterness with the same—when your message arrived. Like a thunder stroke it came between our excited thoughts, and once again our ideals lay clear before us. They were difficult hours, but we looked to you and your example. You are those, who do not only give us words, but who can underline each word with the Deed. That we also can do so from now on, will be accomplished by your letter and your example. Receive our greeting in return and be assured that the same love unites us."

This letter also contains a request that individual Young Friends take an interest in individual students by sending them $1 or $2 a month to enable them to continue at college. Here again we should be glad to hear from any interested Young Friends and send them the name of a student to "adopt" in this way.

The next letter is one which we are tempted to give in full. The spirit of it runs all through it, and it would be difficult to find anything to eliminate without detracting from the whole:

"Greetings! A group of German young girls received your message and thank you for it. Much grateful joy prevails already in Germany, especially in the hearts of children, over the hearty good wishes and the faithful help of American philanthropists. We, however, are especially gripped by the thought that over there, young people, just as young and full of sincere striving as we, are at work, and offer us their hand. We clasp it gladly in good-fellowship.

"It is true, before us stands a great need, need of the people as a whole, and need of the individual. For us there is a fight for our daily bread and our holy right, a struggle in which youth is also taking part. We know our task. In numerous communities the German youth has pledged itself to go its way in truth and faith. We shall keep this pledge in spite of economic need and coercive weapon. This struggle has made us all brothers. In need and deprivation, unselfishness and friendship flourish. We are learning to forego, and becoming rich in our poverty. Faithfulness in our small circle shall make us faithful to our people and to mankind. We gladly all save to procure a good book between us, which one of us cannot do alone. Then we have a little room which we have made into a nest for ourselves, where we meet for work and play together; and when we wander out into the open and the fresh air and joyful sunshine, we for a time forget struggles and hardship, and only know that we have a homeland that we can love, however poor and oppressed it now may be. Much can be taken from us, but of our youth and our faith in the ultimate triumph of good, no one can deprive us. We are thankful that we may bear, through the fight, the precious gifts of pure thought and ripening personality. 'God will help us to come triumphant out of all need.' We feel friendship with you, and call across the wide seas our hearty 'Hail.'"

A letter from Essen has a printed verse at the head which seems to be part of the spirit of the letter: "Wood which the axe has struck, breathes out an odor wondrous and strong; have you, when suffering came to you, carried blessing to others?" The purport of the message is that though the strength and thought and loyalty of the young people, especially those of the Ruhr at this time, belong primarily to their fatherland, they are joyously aware of the fact that there is a Kingdom of God's Love in which national boundary lines cease to be hindrances in the way of human fellowship. They say, too:

"We thank you above all that you did not only send pitying words of sympathy, but that you have an understanding for the exalted feeling which, in spite of humiliating experiences, fills us at the thought that we, as the youth of Germany, may take part in the spiritual deepening of our Fatherland. The rule of Christ is the one solution for us and for our work in the service of others. In this we feel ourselves in unity with you, and reciprocate your greeting most heartily."

Last comes a letter from Eisenach, telling of visits received from English and American Friends, Joan Fry, Agnes Tierney and the Garretts, and of the Meeting which has sprung up there as a consequence, and of a great desire to work with us in the building of the invisible temple of Love.

All these letters have been acted upon by the International Committee, and answers and literature sent, for we are anxious to follow up the contacts we have made, and in this way, we hope, unite with the young people of Germany in carrying on the work of establishing the Kingdom in all parts of the earth. We trust that this activity will be taken up by Young Friends generally, for instance, in the ways indicated above, and not allowed to languish for lack of interest on this side of the ocean.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

OFFICERS FOR OUR YOUNG FRIENDS' COMMITTEE, 1923-1924.

Chairman—JAMES F. WALKER.

Vice-Chairman—H. TATNALL BROWN.

Recording Secretary—MARY HEWES BIDDLE.

Treasurer—JOHN BORTON.

It was gratifying that so many of our Young Friends responded to this opportunity of choosing the officers. Some interesting notes came from distant members which make us feel a closer touch.

In making summer plans, we hope that Young Friends will remember the Earlham Conference, held the latter part of Seventh Month. We are very anxious that the holding of a conference at Westtown later in the fall shall not interfere with the attendance at Earlham. We are glad of the opportunity which the Westtown Conference will give many of our members to take advantage of such a conference, but this cannot take the place of Earlham in bringing East and West together. Our hope is that our Monthly Meetings will send delegates as formerly to Earlham. Encourage your Monthly Meeting in this, please. We feel that both the Conference and our own membership will suffer if this is not done.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' EASTERN CONFERENCE.

I. When? Eighth Month 27 to Ninth Month 3, 1923.

II. Why? To deepen and strengthen the spiritual life of Young Friends through fellowship together, and to seek a way of life that shall be practical and Christlike.

III. Where? At Westtown School, Pennsylvania, chosen for its central position for Eastern Friends, and its many recreational facilities.

IV. How? By a Central Committee made up of Young Friends from eight Yearly Meetings in the East. Paul J. Furnas, Chairman, D. Herbert Way, Vice-Chairman, Lindsay H. Noble, Secretary, J. Robert James, Treasurer.

For further information apply to Elizabeth Ann Walter, 154 N. Fifteenth Street, Philadelphia, or Mary J. Moon, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia.

The Ruhr?

E. H. S.

How shall one write an "article" about the Ruhr, when one could write books full of speculative theories upon how the occupation will end; whether the non-co-operative, passive-resistance method will be successful; whether it really is passive resistance, or what it would be if there were anything else with which to resist. What else might Germany have done to avoid the occupation and fulfil her obligations? How is France to get her reparations? Would she withdraw from the Ruhr if she did collect? Why, if she is so hard pressed for money, does she not take her troops from German soil and use the enormous sums of money which Germany pays for the maintenance of such troops, to pay her debts, or for reconstruction work? Why can she loan Poland four hundred million francs? How is France to be gotten out of the Ruhr if not by a superior military force;—probably to return again with increased bitterness and hatred later on. What will happen if she stays in the Ruhr? Where will it lead to economically, for Germany, for France, for Europe, for the world? Why is it that the world looks inactively on at this struggle for—one hardly knows what—is it the settling of a centuries old hatred, is it for the fulfilling of France's policy, since Caesar's time, to extend her territory to the "natural boundary" of the Rhine? Is it to decide a struggle between French iron magnates and German coal magnates? Do the people of France and the people of Germany care whether the Ruhr is under the name of French Republic or German Republic or Rhine Republic, so long as they can live in peace? Is it perhaps a good sign that the rest of the world has not tumbled helter-skelter into fresh wars over this new breach of the peace, as they did in 1914, a sign that the people have really had enough of war? What must be the feelings of patriotic Germans when they see that the workers are still proclaiming their friendship with the workers of France and, in the eyes of nationalists, betraying their country in this hour of bitter need? Why are the workers, in their communistic and Socialist papers, and not the Church and her members, manifesting this attitude? Is it right for the German people to support their Government in its present policy, or should they demand, with the workers, that "capitalism" give of its abundance to save the nation from more sorrow and misery, hunger and deprivation? Should the German Government have followed the example of the Soviet Government and have confiscated, if it could, the fortunes of the wealthy men, who, it is being said, by Americans and Englishmen and Frenchmen and German Socialists and Communists, could enable Germany to pay her "just debts," and who are said also to be responsible for the present policy of the German Government?

These are some phases of the subject which are being discussed today in American and European papers. One's mind is weary with searching such papers for a clearer light on the strange tangle of circumstances. How can one, from all the opinions, on these different issues, which are being expressed inside and outside of the Ruhr, form any conclusion as to what might have been, or what will be? Where shall one find a solution to all these problems? Who can persuade either one side or the other, or both, to accept as right, a solution which some might claim is right? Is not the case hopeless entirely when the men chosen by the different peoples to represent their interests, believed to be the wisest and most experienced diplomats and statesmen and leaders, are either grossly betraying the peoples whose faith and trust they hold, or else helplessly admitting that there is nothing they can do. Matters must take their course!

What can we, as individuals, whether we are German, French, English or American, or any other nationality, think or believe in the face of this thing? I believe, that for those who have seen it in the Divine Light of the Love, which is God, there can be no doubt as to what the solution might and could be, and is. If only it were tried! We know so well that it is the only solution. In this knowledge we can, in a certain sense, calmly see the tide advancing and receding, knowing that until this one method is tried, all others will fail, knowing that those who seek the way in this and that direction are sure to come to the end of a blind alley, and as we, from our point of vantage, look down on this labyrinth of blind ways, with the masses rushing hither and thither, frantic and despairing, or wandering in a lethargy which cares only that death may come soon, and hoping for nothing beyond that change called death, or with the one thought, "eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we die," do we not cry out in our souls, "How long, oh God, how long?" Then comes the only answer that can bring peace to those who believe in the ultimate triumph of Good,—standing apart and looking and pitying is not enough, either for ourselves or for God. We must work that it may be soon. While there is light we must work, when the night cometh no man can work. So long as this one day of our existence lasts let us work for this end, with Him. We are but once on this earth, is there anything greater for us to do while here, than the spreading of His Kingdom? Is there anything at all that is worth while compared to it? Is not this the great and vital thing that this generation, we young people, have to learn? Seek ye first the Kingdom of Heaven, and all these things, among which may be counted all the things which ofttimes seem most necessary and important for our welfare, shall be added unto you; so that, resting sure in the promise of our Lord we have nothing that matters to lose, and Heaven on Earth to gain.

HOME VISITORS.

ONE of those present at our Yearly Meeting this year was Edith F. Sharpless, who has not been able to attend since 1916. In Seventh Month, 1922, she left Japan for her second furlough in the course of twelve years' service as a member of Japan Friends' Mission. Edith F. Sharpless is the daughter of the late Dr. Isaac Sharpless. She graduated from Bryn Mawr College in 1905, took her M. A. at Columbia, and was for four years an instructor in Guilford College. In 1910 she sailed for Japan, where she lived for eighteen months in Tokyo, studying Japanese and teaching in the Friends' School. She then moved to the city of Mito, where she established for herself a home, a field of Christian teaching, and an enviable place in the hearts of the citizens. They are drawn to her by distinguished ability in the Japanese language, and by her self-forgetful willingness to be one of them. Her days in Mito have included Bible stories to little folks, counsel to lonely Christian girls starting on the wide, amazing path of women's new freedom, and the perplexing problems of a Young Friends' meeting. Such things demand sanity and courage. Following her second furlough her house was enlarged to accommodate a few girls from nearby towns living in Mito to attend High School.

Edith F. Sharpless is now living at her home in Haverford, studying at the Wistar Brown Graduate School. She expects to return to her adopted home in Mito this summer. The Yearly Meeting does well to find in Edith F. Sharpless a living epistle whereby it can reach out a hand of fellowship to Friendly souls across the Pacific.

DURING the past Yearly Meeting, a number of visiting Friends have been with us; some of them bringing Minutes to us from their meetings; all of them taking an active interest in the business that we have carried on.

Robert L. Simkin, with the exception of A. Neave Brayshaw, was the only English Friend present. He was a student at the Haverford Graduate School several years ago, and has just returned from work in China, under the English Friends. When the letter to China was read, he spoke, telling a little of conditions there.

While the Meeting was considering the letter to be sent to Japan, the Clerk asked Edith Sharpless, a member of our own meeting, who is home on furlough from Japan, to speak to us about the Japanese Meeting. She reported that a letter had been written to us at their last Yearly Meeting, but it has never been received.

John R. Cary, of Baltimore, attended the one session when the report of the Fraternal Delegates to the Five Years' Meeting was given. John Cary came from Baltimore Meeting to thank us for having sent the delegates. He was Clerk of the Five Years' Meeting and is now Clerk of Baltimore Yearly Meeting.

A representative from the West was Oscar Moon, of Detroit.

Last year he worked under the American Friends' Service Committee in Poland, and it was reported about this time a year ago that he was suffering from typhus.

A number of Ministers were present from the South. Raymond Binford, President of Guilford College, and a brother of Gurney Binford, of our Mission in Japan, came from Guilford, North Carolina.

William Stanley, Mary Smith, and Samuel and Elma Smith, their companions, brought Minutes to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting from Fairhope, Alabama. William Stanley formerly lived in Iowa and is a Minister of Ohio Yearly Meeting.

Samuel and Evelyn Haworth were guests from High Point, North Carolina. Samuel Haworth is Pastor of the High Point Meeting.

STUDENT FEEDING.

(A LETTER.)

MUNICH, Third Month 5, 1923.

I will try to report a little on the Student Feeding in Berlin as I saw it and worked with it from Eleventh Month 18th until First Month 2nd.

When I first arrived in Berlin, the English Quakers were feeding about 450 students of the University of Berlin one meal daily (except First-days) at two different centres. About 400 students received meals at the "Studentenheim," or students' restaurant, in Borsig Strasse. The remainder received their single, daily meal in the former barracks on Friedrich Strasse. These barracks are used now, partly to solve the city's problem of securing homes for the many homeless families in the city, and partly for a general feeding of needy university students undertaken by a purely German committee.

The students fed by Friends are chosen by a "Beirat," or council composed of students. This is an excellent way of selecting the most needy ones, because they know each other much better than we do and are, therefore, the best ones to judge. In the case of the students fed in the Friedrich Strasse centre, each one receives a paper from this council which states that he or she has been recommended to receive meals free of charge at the said centre, and the paper is signed by the Chairman. Once a week students producing such a paper received a strip of six tickets with the date and the day on each one. Upon surrendering one of these tickets daily, the student received a meal. In the case of the students fed in the Borsig Strasse centre, the council decided what percentage of the value of the meal the student was in position to pay. If a student's position was such that he, or she, could not afford to pay anything, the council put him on the "A" or "free" list. If he could afford to pay a little, he was put on the "B" or "20 per cent." list. (That is to say, it was decided that he could afford to pay 20 per cent. of the value of the meal.) If he could afford to pay a little more than 20 per cent. of the value of the meal, he was put on the "C," or "40 per cent.," paying list. If he could pay still more, he was put on the "D" or "60 per cent. paying" list. We, then, issued cards to these students according to the list they were on. If a student was on the "A" list, he received a green card; if he was on the "B" list, he received a red card; if he was on the "C" list, he received a yellow card; if he was on the "D" list, he received a cream-colored card. We kept a record not only of the students fed in the Friedrich Strasse centre, but also of the students fed in the Borsig Strasse centre. The list that each student fed in the Borsig Strasse centre and registration number was on was also recorded, as was also his, or her, course at the university. Each card was good for twenty-four meals, or four weeks' use. The student could eat at the centre every day or just when it suited; it made no difference.

When I first started work in the Borsig Strasse "Studentenheim," a single meal for a student not being aided by Friends, cost 100 marks, or 600 marks for the week. Therefore, a student in class "D" paying 60 per cent., paid 360 marks a week; a student in class "C" paying 40 per cent., paid 240 marks; a student in class "B" paying 20 per cent., paid 120 marks; and the student with a free card paid 6 marks a week for what reason I do not know, except it be for the cost of printing the card! Just before I left Berlin, the price of food went up so that students not holding our cards had to pay 720 marks a week instead of 600 marks. After this rise in price, the "60 per cent. student" paid 432 marks a week instead of 360 marks formerly; the "40 per cent. student" 288 marks instead of 240 marks; the "20 per cent. student" 144 marks instead of 120 marks. The free student paid 6 marks as formerly was the case.

I worked with a young English giant; he was six feet seven inches tall and only a year or two older than myself! The meal in the Borsig Strasse centre was from between twelve o'clock and three o'clock and one of us had to be there between those hours. It was our plan to "spell each other," one working from twelve until one-thirty and the other from one-thirty to three. If one of us had a pressing engagement between those hours, the other would serve the whole time and would then have the next day off. Of course, our work wasn't entirely in the centre where the feeding took place. We had our room, desks, etc., in the office of the British Friends, Behren Strasse 26a, and we had lots of work there to keep us busy, such as figuring what the students on the different lists should pay when the prices went up, etc. Our duties at the feeding centre were as follows: when the student brought his card for the first time, he would pay for a week's meals according to the list he was in and we stamped the word "bezahlt" (paid) in the space which was provided on the card to show whether the payment for the week had been received or not. At the same time we stamped the date in the space provided, to show that a meal had been eaten by the holder on that date. The card was then returned to the owner with a check in addition, without which he could not get his meal even if the date had been stamped on the card. As soon as he surrendered his check he received his meal. The next time the student came for a meal, the date would be stamped in the next space, and so on until he had the six spaces on one line stamped off, showing that he had had six meals on the dates stamped. The student would then pay for six meals again and the process would be repeated. As soon as the card had been entirely stamped off (after 24 meals), a new card was issued. We counted the checks carefully before giving them out and then compared the number we had counted with the number of checks the manager of the restaurant had accumulated by three o'clock. This was done to prevent any unfairness on his part, because it would be easy for him to make checks like ours, put them in with those he had legally collected, and charge the office for more meals than actually had been eaten.

In concluding, I would like to mention the fact that the number of students now being fed has been greatly increased. A centre at Charlottenburg has been established under the same principles as the Friedrich Strasse centre, namely, that it is almost "self-run." One of the workers merely goes there one day a week and issues strips of six tickets with the date and day on each one. And, as in the Friedrich Strasse centre, the student merely surrenders one of these tickets daily and receives his meal. The number fed in this centre now is about 150; the number fed at the Friedrich Strasse centre has increased from about 50 students to about 100; the number fed at the Borsig Strasse centre has increased from about 400 students to 750. Of course, these numbers are only approximate, but the sum total of students now being fed is about 1000, as compared to about 450 when I was there the first of the year. It is to be hoped that this excellent work can be increased in the future and thus establish an even broader and stronger feeling of brotherhood among mankind.

(NOTE—When I was working there, the dollar was about 5,000, not 50,000 as it has been since, nor 23,000 as it has been for a week or two now. Of course with the dollar even at 5,000, the prices those poor students had to pay sound almost laughable to us, but to them it was far from a joke.)

I will with a few words try to picture to thee the Borsig Strasse centre. It is a "Studentenheim," a place where students can eat and students only, but of course others besides the ones we aid eat there also. It is a room about the size of the old Y. M. C. A. room in Founders' Hall, Haverford College, with tables covered with table cloths. Waitresses wait on the tables and it is very agreeable. Each of "our students" received a big roll which, however, was not made of white flour! In addition to this, he or she, had a tasty soup which was nice and hot and a huge plate of potatoes and other vegetables with gravy. Some times a stew was served, or a little meat in other forms, but usually the meal was purely vegetarian, as meat is practically "out of sight" now for Germans.

The manager of the place makes out a bill weekly for the meals eaten by students receiving aid from Friends and sends it to the office. The Council for International Service (a Quaker affair), with headquarters in London, pays the bills. PHILIP C. GARRETT.

END OF THE YOUNG FRIENDS' NUMBER.

John E. Carter.

[In our issue for Third Month 22nd there appeared an interesting sketch of our beloved friend, the late John E. Carter. Since then our attention has been called to a short paper published last Twelfth Month in a magazine issued by the Provident Trust Company of Philadelphia, called Between Ourselves. At the risk of a little repetition, we reprint the paper written by one of the officers of The Provident, primarily on account of two striking incidents contained in it, and with no thought that any will do other than mentally thank us for anything we can bring to their notice touching the character of one, who has made so profound an impression for good upon the life of many who were privileged to know him.—Eos.]

John E. Carter, at the time of his death one of the two remaining "founders" of the Provident (the other one is John B. Garrett), passed away at his home in Germantown on Twelfth Month 1, 1922. It was he who kept the records of that first meeting held in the parlor of Thomas Evans's house, on Arch Street near Eighth, when it was decided to organize the Company, and of subsequent meetings prior to the opening of business by the Company; the first writing in our earliest Minute Book is in his strong, clear hand. For years he had been a familiar figure in our office, for he had been a depositor since 1870, and in recent years had handed over to the Trust Department the care of his securities; in fact, when the transfer of accounts began, his was the very first "Trust Account" transferred from the old company to the new. This was typical of his method and promptness in all his acts.

Who does not remember his tall, erect figure, as, in spite of his eighty-four years, he walked briskly up the aisle, with always a kindly, cheery, but not obtrusive, greeting to any of his acquaintances? How careful he was not to impose on busy people's time, and yet never seeming hurried—simply having all his business prepared beforehand. He would state what was on his mind in simple, direct terms, using, it seemed, always the words exactly suited to convey his meaning.

It is impossible to think or speak of John Carter without loving appreciation. To pass by his beautiful lawn on Knox Street on a summer First-day morning after "Meeting," and to have him come down the steps of his porch and walk out to his gate, hold it open while inviting one in for a chat, was an experience not soon forgotten. Such innate, courtly grace of manner, such gentleness, combined with the most engaging vivacity, are vouchsafed to only a few; and then his conversation, full of anecdote, always broad and tolerant, encyclopedic in its scope and accurate knowledge, mellow with kindly, loving interest in all that concerned his visitor, and with sparkling humor through all, no wonder the hour sped by before one realized it.

In this brief review there is not space at all adequately to refer to his wide services in philanthropic and business affairs; in fact, it is possible only to touch the very fringe of the life and character of this remarkable man. It is interesting to note, however, that he retired from many philanthropic activities and responsibilities, after having given long and valuable service, at an age when many men accept such appointments. In this he was true to his convictions, and firmness in executing them, that, first, twenty years was about as long as one man could serve a cause to its advantage, and, second, that it was wise to retire from an activity before, rather than after, such a step occurred to others as desirable. There are many in his wide circle of friends who never ceased to regret the loss caused to these activities by his self-enforced early retirement from them.

John Carter had a long and successful career in business. He succeeded his father in a business established in 1828, for the manufacture from shoe findings, etc., of yellow prussiate of potash. For many years, until the business was closed out with his retirement in 1908, the entire output of this single product of the business was sold to one and the same customer. In this undertaking, as in other things in life, his transactions were moderate in every way, excepting in generosity, as is evidenced by the following anecdote: His partner in the business was the son of his father's former partner (the two fathers had been the founders of the business); they had grown up together as boys, being about of an age; had been together in the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy; had been apprentices together at Charles Ellis's, the wholesale drug house, and then for many years had been partners until this life-long friend felt it right to retire from the business. During all those fifty-odd years of close association, "G——" and I had only one serious difference. That was over the amount of money that he should withdraw as his share when he retired. He thought it should be less, and I thought it should be more. We were both very firm about it. "Well," I asked, "how did it end?" "Oh," said John Carter, with a twinkle in his eye, "I had my way." #### AGAIN FROM GERMANY.

[That the letter which we reprint in this issue seems to our readers belated is due to the delay it necessarily suffered awaiting the date of the Monthly Meeting.—Eds.]

STUTTGART, Germany,
Second Month 16, 1923.

To Germantown Monthly Meeting of Friends:—

OUR DEAR FRIENDS:—

Your letter of Twelfth Month 28th was forwarded from Berlin to Frankfort, where we received it on First Month 28th. We are very glad of this renewed assurance of your confidence and sympathy.

You have doubtless heard of the series of conferences which have been arranged for us in the different centers of Quaker interest in Germany. In these meetings with people who are suffering not only extreme physical deprivation but agony of mind and torture of spirit because of Germany's humiliation and the indifference of other nations to her plight, we feel acutely our own poverty of spirit and lack of power to speak the right word. The foundations of our House of Life have never been shaken and shattered as this people's have been, and we often find in them a depth of spirited endurance and patience which makes us cry out: "Could we in America show under like circumstances such heroism of spirit?"

We feel here with a keenness impossible at home the tragedy of the Peace Treaty. A people who had thrown off the yoke of imperialism and militarism looked with trust to America to make the peace on the terms she had offered. It is hard for Germany to believe that she was not deliberately betrayed.

But there is a quality in the hearts of many whom we meet, and we hear of its existence in groups of Catholics, Protestants and Jews, which may mean a re-birth of the mystical soul of Germany and a leadership of the world in the things of the spirit. That mystical heritage from Tauler and Eckhart and the author of Theologia Germanica, which was so nearly extinguished in Germany, first, by the crushing of the Peasants' Revolt, and secondly, by the growth of Prussian militarism in the 10th Century, seems now in various quarters to be springing to life again.

This spiritual revival will not take shape in set forms or formula, but the Germans themselves say that it must be made practical and find its expression in terms of life. It is in helping them to find this way of life, the secret of which the friends of the Friends believe the early Quakers knew, that Friends may find their place here.

But we must first be sure that we have found the way for ourselves. That one who comes to them lives without labor seems to hinder the message in the minds of many, and the majority of those we meet, like the peasants of the 16th Century, are looking for a new social order as the fruit of the spirit.

In Frankfort, which is daily expecting the French Army of Occupation (and not until one comes here can he really understand what that means), there is a school where the children pray every morning that the evil may be taken out of the hearts of the French so that they can love them.

One of our heavy burdens is the constantly reiterated question: "Why does America not help? Is it nothing to her that we perish?" The nation that can and will help will win for itself an undying loyalty. Would that it might be our own land.

Sincerely your friends,

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

HOUSES WITH FLAT ROOFS.—Once some men tried to take a friend to Jesus to be made well. He was ill in bed . . . so they carried the bed. Jesus was in a house and they could not get in, for the crowds of people who were before them, so they went up on to the roof and let him down, on his bed, through the tiles, into the midst, in front of Jesus, and Jesus healed him. We could not expect men here to carry a bed up on to a roof, and if they did and broke the roof, they would only get into a bed-room. There are many stories about houses in the Bible and some of them are puzzling till we know about the kind of house that people have in Palestine. Let us try to make pictures for ourselves of those houses.

They are still of the same kind as when Jesus was a boy, built on both sides of the narrow main street, of white stone, small, square-shaped, like huge bricks, with little door and windows grown over with creeping vines to keep out the sun, and broad flat roofs." In his stories Jesus speaks of life in small houses, and we suppose he lived in a house with only one room where he watched his mother grind the corn and bake and cook and mend and patch and sweep (Luke xi: 11 and 12.) He knew how one lamp would "light the whole house" (Matt. v. 15) and a smell would penetrate every part of it (John xii: 3.) He knew, too, how careful washing up was done (Luke xi: 39) and how lost things were hunted (Luke xiv: 18.) The boys would not have pegs by the door to hang up their hats when they came in. They would take off their sandals and leave them in a row, and there was not much furniture in the room. When bedtime came you did not undress and have a bath and put on night clothes, but simply took your mattress (called your "bed") and spread it on the floor, and lay down in all your clothes, and covered yourself head and all with your quilt. In a very nice house we read the mistress prepared for her visitor a room with "a bed and a table, a stool and a candlestick" (2 Kings iv: 10).

But perhaps we should notice most the roofs of the houses. They were flat and people walked on them or sat there, or spread their clothes and fruits to dry in the hot sun (Joshua ii: 6.) To keep people from accidents a little wall was built round the flat roof (Deut. xxii: 8), sometimes made of tiles piled together, easy to move if required (Luke v: 19). There was an outside stair to go up by, so it would be quite easy to go up to the roof from outside the house, and move the tiles and let down a mattress into the centre open court of a house. If the houses had more than one room, they were built with a space or "court" between them and a covered passage connecting the rooms.

In summer people put tents or "arbors" of leaves and branches as sleeping places on the roofs; sometimes they built special rooms in place of these, for quietness. These are called "upper rooms." (Mark xiv: 15, Acts i: 13).

A VISIT TO ZAJACZOWKA.

I have just returned to Warsaw from a visit to the Powursk district where the Quaker mission timber-hauling columns are at work in a forest close to the Stochod River. There was a hard freeze and the roads that a few months ago were heavy sand tracks through the marshes are now roads of iron through a waste of ice and snow. The Stochod is a flat plain of snow, and there is nothing about it to indicate that it is a river, or the sinister part that it played in the war. The swamps in the forest have not frozen as hard as the wind-swept marshes or the Stochod, so that timber-hauling is rendered difficult.

We drove briskly, the feet of the horses throwing up powdered snow into our faces and an occasional hard snow-ball from their hoofs into the sledge. The sleigh bells jingled merrily as we sped along through the labyrinth of trenches and barred wire and under the trees that the great guns had left standing.

As we approached the heart of the forest, we beheld the hauling columns at work dragging logs out of the swamp. It was the work of giants. The ice was not strong enough to hold and the peasants were soon wading knee deep through icy water beside their straining teams. Great blocks of ice impeded their progress and their hands were blue with cold as they handled the timber lying in the water.

I fixed my attention on the thirteenth team. The horses were as clever as cats on their feet and threw themselves vigorously into their collars as they strove to get foothold on a block of ice. One horse slipped backwards pawing at the ice as it fell. The loud report of the ice giving way, the horse struggling in the water, the frenzied shouts of the driver and the downward heave of the great log before the horses regained their feet will be a lasting memory. I watched the thirteenth team struggle triumphant from the swamp. It was the first team out with its log and I followed it, leaving the others still floundering in difficulties.

We made our way through the forest and across the Stochod to the village of Zajaczowka. The Stochod groaned and cracked ominously as we passed over it. The villagers turned out to watch our arrival, shivering under the rags that they huddled round them. Zajaczowka is a village of dugouts and shelters made of trench material thickly covered with sods of earth to make them wind-proof; rain-proof they can never be as the floors are lower than the surface of the ground and the rain and thaw from the snow runs down into them. Half a dozen pale-faced children watched us through a patchwork window made of odds and ends of broken glass.

Our tree came to a standstill beside a line of trenches. A new house was springing into being like a mushroom growing in the night. Only two weeks ago the first log was hauled for this house and now it is nearly finished. The peasant who owns it was working hard on it while his wife and son went to the forest for the last load of timber. When we arrived in the village he was busily trimming a log into shape with a hatchet. He paused when we hailed him across the trench, but only for a moment, to answer our greeting, the next he was trimming the log again. We watched the mother and son roll the log off the furmanka and up the round slope leading to the house until it finally rested beside its fellows. In every direction were small piles of logs and new houses in different stages and from all sides came the sound of axe and saw. As we watched several other teams lumbered into the village and began unloading.

The peasant's wife was talkative and was disposed to tell us her story. She told us how they had returned from Siberia in the early spring and how the Mission had ploughed their land for them and supplied them with seed. They were still eating the vegetables grown from the seeds, it was all that they had. As she talked she led us to the dugout where she was living with her husband and three children. There were fourteen people living in the dugout, remnants of various families who sheltered there.

Last winter the dugout had been used as a soup kitchen by one of the Relief Missions and an American flag was still painted on a sign over the door. It is a tiny dugout measuring four by five yards. The peasant woman opened the door with her bony, worn hand, with the other she held a fragment of garment that she had had before the war round her throat. On the door a crooked white cross was chalked to show that typhus had claimed a victim here. We crowded inside after her. A wasted baby swung from the ceiling in a flat rush basket with a hollow-eyed woman bending over it. The baby was wailing incessantly. Two other children crouched on the top of a stove for warmth, we could see their thin, flabby bodies through the rents in the garments that covered them. Two bigger children, very far gone with consumption, sat listlessly on a wooden bench, the only furniture that the dugout boasted of.

The woman showed me the spinning she had done in return for wages paid by the Friends' Mission. The woman with the baby had been spinning too, and she left the swinging basket for a moment to get her work. They were full of hope in spite of their misery. The new house would soon be ready, and under the snow a young crop of rye is springing into being for them so that next autumn if all goes well they will have a bread crop. A house and a bread crop! The basis of a future has been laid for them.

"OUR UMBARS WILL BE FULL AGAIN."

It was in Dergunovka.

Dergunovka is the poorest of all the towns in the thirteen volosts of Pugachov Ooyezd (Russia), where the Quakers have just started to send food. Last year more than half of the inhabitants died. There were so many cannibals that everyone was afraid of his neighbors.

Harry Stephens and Dorice White of the English Mission were making a tour of inspection to determine just how many people were in need of food.

A kind-looking old peasant with rusty hair and lovely blue eyes was showing them around. He was the President of the Ispolcom. They had taken a row of houses down the village street and gone into them at random, one after another.

They had seen widows prostrate on their stoves, living only on what scraps their children could pick up going from house to house, and begging of others as poor as themselves.

They had seen whole families staring at their last pound of flour, afraid to eat it because of what would come after, and chewing on dried pumpkin stalks to keep them alive.

They had seen families who had sold everything they had, and eaten everything they had.

From the sights they had seen they knew the situation was very grave. Some of the people would die before food could be got to them. They asked the blue-eyed peasant if he did not think at least three-fourths of the people must have help at once.

"Yes," he answered, "You know our umbars (barns) will be full again this spring if you don't help us."

Umbars are for grain, and it does not grow in winter. They knew what he meant, but they asked him to make sure.

"Last spring so many died we couldn't bury them all. And we had to put them into our granaries, and they gradually filled up. Yes—our granaries were very full last winter."

And in other towns, too, Harry Stevens and Dorice White found peasants looking for a gruesome spring harvest, and they heard the phrase repeated—"Our umbars will be full again."

But now the Quaker food has gone to Dergunovka, and so their umbars will be empty until harvest, when, if the peasants read the white mist that hung over the snow on New Year's day aright, there will be a rich harvest of bread to fill them.

There are still empty umbars in other famished sections of Pugachov where the Quaker stores are too slim to reach,—but there is still time to see that they are kept empty until harvest. Will you help?

LETTER TO AND FROM GOVERNOR PINCHOT.

At one of the sessions of the late Yearly Meeting in Philadelphia, a letter was directed to be drafted and duly signed and forwarded to Governor Pinchot at Harrisburg.

FOURTH MONTH 2, 1923.

TO GOVERNOR GIFFORD PINCHOT, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania:—

Dear Friend:—Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends last week held its annual sessions at Fourth and Arch Streets. These have been held every year continuously since the founding of our Commonwealth by William Penn. Many matters claim our attention which are specially of interest to our own denomination, but from time to time we take action respecting great issues which affect the whole community. At our closing session, held on Sixth-day, Third Month 30th, the following Minute was adopted with great unanimity and represents the sentiment of Friends generally in Pennsylvania:

"The attention of the Meeting was called to the fact that during the time we have been in session the Legislature of Pennsylvania has passed, and the Governor has signed, the Bill for the enforcement of the anti-liquor legislation of the United States, and that for the first time in a long period of years there can be in this State no saloon legally licensed for the sale of alcoholic liquors. This result has been brought about largely through the endeavors of Governor Pinchot. The Meeting expressed its great satisfaction that this epoch-making legislation has been enacted, and appointed George Vaux, Jr., James G. Biddle, Francis Goodhue, Jr., Lucy B. Roberts and Margaret Jenkins as a Committee to prepare a letter to be signed by the Clerks, conveying to Governor Pinchot a suitable message on our behalf expressing our thankfulness at the outcome of his endeavors in bringing about this most important forward step."

It is with much satisfaction that we thus officially transmit to thee this action, and assure thee of our sympathy with all efforts to maintain the highest standards of citizenship in the State which we all so dearly love.

With high esteem, we are,

THY FRIENDS.

The message brought the following response:—

GOVERNOR'S OFFICE, Harrisburg,

April 6, 1923.

Heartiest thanks for your message. The first fight is won, and I am taking this earliest opportunity to express my genuine appreciation to you and other devoted friends of law enforcement who helped bring it about.

No victory would have been possible without this fine and effective support, which I need just as much in the days ahead as I have until now.

Sincerely yours,

(Signed) GIFFORD PINCHOT.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

FRIENDS who know of the Maternity Hospital at Châlons, France, and this must include all of us, will be interested to know of the marriage in New York City recently of Melvin A. Cawl, who, as architect, drew the plans for the new Châlons hospital and faithfully supervised its construction. The marriage represents another hopeful venture in international fellowship, the bride, Phyllis Stewart Blandford, being an English girl who had served as an aide at Châlons.

The Friends' Fellowship Papers started its career anew with the beginning of the year. We welcome it as a valuable publication full of worth-while material. It would have been a great loss to the cause it serves had the publication, through lack of financial support, been forced to discontinue publication. We hope American Friends may do their part as paying subscribers. The initial number contains two papers from this side of the Atlantic.

The Locomotive Engineers' Journal for First Month contains a two-and-a-half page article by Wilbur K. Thomas, with illustrations, entitled, "Food and Friendship for the Russian People." No appeal is made for funds on the part of W. K. T., but the Editor says: "That the Quakers have carried on a work of relief and reconstruction during and since the world war that is without equal in the annals of civilized nations. They have gone where other relief organizations have feared to go, either for political or religious reasons. They have talked little and done much, leaving life happier and more wholesome wherever their helping hand has reached."

The Friends' Service Committee has organized its first Junior Home Unit, and Baltimore claims the first child. The Unit will consist of young people from fifteen to twenty-one years of age. The Unit is limited to ten members; it holds a charter signed by two or more appointed officers. Each member is required to give a number of hours per week in training or in practical work under the local leader. This year the training will consist of learning all the ins and outs of playground work, and the practical end will be in assisting at one of the Public Playgrounds in Baltimore.

THE DEMAND OF THE MIND.—"The great need of the Society of Friends today is for clear thinking. In the intensity of their philanthropic enthusiasm and deeply felt concern for practical service Friends have not in the past given, and do not yet give, enough care and thought to making their standpoint clear to themselves or to others. What the basis of their religious position is and how it may be presented so as to come as an answer to the questioning and bewildered spirit of today,—so as to make an appeal to the mind as well as to the heart—these are enquiries which have been too much neglected. Do not Friends sometimes rely too much upon sentiment, and esteem too lightly the need for thinking out and thinking home their convictions? Have they done enough to show reason for the faith that is in them, and is it not true that, with certain notable exceptions, its reasonableness and essential truth has been at least as effectively presented by isolated thinkers and teachers in other denominations as by members of the body to which this unique religious tradition belongs as of right?"

Something after this fashion sounds the admonition. It comes from a very friendly and sympathetic source, and whether or no it is wholly justified, it ought to be frankly faced and candidly considered.

JOHN HARVEY.

THERE has been a spirited controversy among writers as to whether Benjamin West, the famous painter, was a Friend. His chief biographer makes that claim for him. Isaac Sharpless claims the same, basing his conclusion on the testimony of the West family Bible. Charles Henry Hart was of opinion that inasmuch as John West himself, the father of Benjamin, was not in good standing among Friends, Benjamin could not have been a Friend.

In 1638 a Swedish expedition began a Swedish settlement near the present city of Wilmington, Delaware, and succeeded the Dutch settlement.

But what about the district now the State of Pennsylvania? From Sweden in 1642, Colonel Johan Printz was sent out as governor of "New Sweden," the bounds of which he was at liberty to decide as he thought best. He was not satisfied with the district already peopled, but he sailed further up the Delaware River and "decided that the lower end of Great Tene-Kongh or Tinicum Island was the place to establish the site of the capital and government of New Sweden." "This was the first permanent white colony settled within the area of the State of Pennsylvania and Johan Printz became the first executive in the line of governors now represented by the Governor of Pennsylvania."

Wherefore I cannot but cry and call aloud to you, that have been long professors of the Truth, and know the Truth in the convincing power of it, and have had a sober conversation among men, yet content yourselves only to know Truth for yourselves, to go to meetings, and exercise an ordinary charity in the Church and an honest behavior in the world, and limit yourselves within these bounds, feeling little or no concern upon your spirits for the glory of the Lord in the prosperity of His Truth in the earth, more than to be glad that others succeed in such service; arise ye in the name and power of the Lord Jesus!—William Penn, in his Preface to the Journal of George Fox.

OUR NAME.

"What's in a name? That which we call a rose
By any other name would smell as sweet," is so often quoted as to be almost a commonplace. But do we accept it as true?

A cherished possession of the writer is a picture of "Grandmother," and her little namesake, at the age of three. The child, on tip-toe, with eagerness thrusts a rose up to "Grandmother's" face, and the face responds to the sweetness of the bud and the little maid's love-offering. Yet she puts out a warning hand, which means, "Not quite so hard—gently."

It is many years now since "Grandmother" left us for that land, "where everlasting spring abides," and the little namesake girl is a college junior, but I am sure that a rose to her means "Grandmother's" garden and "Grandmother's" love and sympathy; and smells more sweet than any other flower.

There is much in our associations with a name,—there is sometimes much in the name itself.

Thinking of this, there came to mind the name of our modest periodical—how it was chosen for us long ago—how many associations—to some of its readers—cluster about the name—how much significance there is in it.

THE FRIEND—simplicity itself! Some journals are intended for only a part of the family—The Youth's Companion, The Ladies' Home Journal. Ours is for all; though we have our Young Friends' Number (which is said to be most read by older Friends!) and our "Children's Corner," and we are increasingly mindful of varied tastes in reading.

Some magazines appeal to those interested in a certain line of work or of recreation. We are simply THE FRIEND to all, and it is in this character that we wish to enter the homes of our readers.

What about the visits of our chosen friends who come to us in the flesh? They are not "duty visits." We plan for them, we await them with keen interest and pleasure. How much of stimulus they bring with them! Yet it is not all on one side. We give as well as receive.

Are we welcoming our paper FRIEND in just that spirit? One dear "Philadelphia Friend" of a past generation confessed that though she "tried not to read THE FRIEND until First-day," she often had to glance over it when it came, it was so interesting. In how many homes does it receive such a welcome now? How many of us give to its pages an attention that receives all that is there? To how many of us has it become what its name implies? The name may have another significance also. It represents the Religious Society of Friends—its testimonies and practices—its interests and activities—at least partially so. And these take a wider range as years go by. We are known of those who knew us not a few years ago.

Stepping into a little store, in my own town the other day, attracted by a window display of "toys made by the starving Russian children," carved from wood, and beautifully colored, I said, "I am interested in these things from Russia. I am a Quaker." The face of the saleswoman lit up—"Ah, I know the Quakers," she said, "They have helped Russia! They came to us when no others would."

So may we not feel the name of our paper to be an honest and honorable one? And having a care to keep it so, welcome it, aid it, and feel, every one of us, that we have our part in its usefulness.

F. T. R.

LOVE.

Beloved: Let us love one another.

For love is of God; and every one who loveth is born of God, And knoweth God; he that loveth not, Knoweth not God; for God is Love.

Beloved: If God so loved us,

We ought also to love one another.

If we love one another,
God dwelleth in us, and His love is Perfected in us; for God is Love.

Beloved: By this we know that

We love the children of God,
When we love God, and keep His commandments;
For he who loveth God, loveth
His brother also; for God is Love.

The Spiritual Warfare.

Wm. H. Richie.

The World War has been considered as over for four years now, and in this country we have had at least a fair degree of peace. Though there have been several thousand strikes scattered over the world and although numerous small wars are still in progress, we think of the world as having settled down to an era of peace and we also earnestly hope of goodwill. If we are to keep the peace, however, and really establish the spirit of good-will among men, there is still a conquest of ideas and ideals to be waged most persistently.

It has been suggested that there is "a moral equivalent for war;" that, at least for the Christian, there is a life-enlistment in a struggle in which one aims to "overcome evil with good" and make the spiritual realities of God's presence and power so well known that as prophesied by Isaiah (ii:9) "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the seas." We have further assurance of victory in our warfare in the prophecy of Revelation ii: 15: "The Kingdoms of this world are become the Kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ; and He shall reign forever and ever." A definite hope and expectation! But how is it to be obtained? What is our share in its accomplishment? In such a stupendous undertaking can the individual do anything?

The reign of God in men's hearts and ultimately throughout the whole earth is the very kernel of our prayer: "Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven." We want to see the evil in men's hearts cast out and the good raised up. Any man, however deep in sin, may be turned about and brought into true sonship with God, and become a loyal citizen of His Kingdom. It is the chief desire of our Father in Heaven that this should be brought about. Likewise to hinder and thwart that Kingdom is the chief aim of Satan and the powers of darkness. This makes it a great spiritual warfare; because to bring about the rule and lordship of Christ in men's hearts is a spiritual process, it is wrought solely by the work of God's Holy Spirit. For as the Scripture has said: "No man can say that Jesus is Lord; but by the Holy Spirit." His purpose in the world is to testify of Christ and make Him a reality to men.

Paul has given us a clear revelation of this situation in the sixth chapter of his letter to the Ephesians. Weymouth's translation says: "For ours is not a conflict with mere flesh and blood, but with the despotisms; the empires; the forces that control and govern this dark world—the spiritual hosts of evil arrayed against us in the heavenly warfare."

It is quite obvious to the observer of recent political and economic movements that "The Prince of this World," as Jesus called Satan on three occasions, has had more to do with "the forces that control and govern this dark world," than has the Spirit of God. The insincerity, the duplicity, the intrigue, the fear and mistrust of others, the selfishness of men today, must indeed grieve the Father in Heaven. The lawlessness and lack of respect for authority, the mad rush for excitement and frivolous pleasure, the lack of devotion to God and His Kingdom, all show that Satan rules in more hearts than does Jesus Christ. Not that people mean to be disloyal always; but because they are careless and indifferent it means that Christ is not really Lord and King in the life, and those lives are not really part of His Kingdom where there is divided allegiance. "No man can serve God and Mammon."

Is the situation hopeless? By no means! But what can an individual do in this spiritual warfare?

First of all, we must get clearly in mind the fundamental principle of the Kingdom; that God deals with the individual, not the group or mass. This is what Daniel Webster said was the sublimest thought of which the human intellect was possible, that as an individual, "I am personally accountable to Almighty God." Paul put it this way (Rom. xiv: 12): "So then every one of us shall give an account of himself to God." We cannot give account for one another, nor judge one another. No use! For "all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do." God judges motives in daily living; He sees what is the inward devotion of the life. As God said to the prophet Samuel: "Man looketh upon the outward appearance, but God looketh upon the heart."

This principle is of practical importance, because by it we can now see wherein the individual can render a service in this spiritual warfare between the two Kingdoms. By the normal daily contacts one individual readily influences the lives of others. It will be either for uplift and towards the spiritual realities, or else it will be towards materialism and the things of this world.

This leads us to the second underlying principle regarding this Kingdom of God:—it is advanced by spiritual forces rather than intellectual or physical: "Not by might (or force), nor by power (of argument), but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts!" This means that our positive share in this warfare depends upon our possession of the Spirit of God, whereby we may understand God's will and obey His leading. Historically we learn that the Holy Spirit is given to those only "who repent and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ for the remission of sins." (Acts ii: 38; xi: 15-17.)

Right here is the great battle-ground with Satan. He prevents if possible this kind of personal faith in Jesus Christ as Saviour and Lord. He objects but little to "creatively activity" by professing Christians, but he prevents if possible the child-like faith of the "soldier of the cross" who is thus born again into the Kingdom and who by the Spirit, has the power of God behind him. This is not easily understood by the average person. It requires God-given insight to appreciate this fact. As Paul said: "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."

So the real conflict even in these days of peace, is between those who are in the Kingdom of God and who obey His Kingdom and those who have not yet surrendered to His Will; but are taken captive by Satan according to his will (1 Timothy ii: 26). It is a spiritual warfare requiring special equipment.

We must therefore have upon us "the whole armor of God." The first requirement of protective covering is to be "girt about with the truth." We may ask with Pilate, "What is truth?" Jesus Christ said: "I am the Truth." He is the truth of God in living expression just as God's message is the truth in spoken or written language, as when Jesus said in His High Priestly prayer to the Father: "Sanctify them (all disciples) through thy truth; thy word is truth." The Living Word and the Written Word are so closely allied in all Scripture that we must have an accurate knowledge of "the truth as it is in Christ Jesus."

Next we must have "the breastplate of righteousness." But "man's righteousness is as filthy rags" in the eyes of a pure and holy God, so our only hope is to "put on Christ."

Our feet are to be "shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace." Here again we depend upon Christ, for there is no peace apart from Him. "Friendship with the world is enmity with God;" thus men are at war with one another because they are at war with God. This is why there is such wholesale spiritual murder these days, for "whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer" (1 John ii:15). This is our "Good News of Peace,"—that "Christ is our peace." We who were afar off are now made nigh by the blood of Christ, we are reconciled to God and through Christ we have access by one Spirit unto the Father. (See Eph. ii: 13-14.)

"Above all," says the Apostle, "taking the shield of faith wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked one." Faith is of the utmost necessity to preserve the spiritual life; because Satan not only "goeth about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour" (in immorality), but "himself is transformed into an angel of light," seeking to deceive by doubts and unbelief even the elect. We must take Paul's words: "the life that I now live, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself for me." (Gal. ii. 20.)

(To be concluded.)

Rufus P. King.

1843-1923.

Perhaps of no one of recent years within the limits of North Carolina Yearly Meeting can it be more truly said, "After he had in his own generation served the counsel of God he fell asleep," than of our beloved friend, Rufus P. King.

For several years previous to his death his health had been gradually declining and the infirmities of old age settling upon him. This condition so far from inducing the general lassitude of physical ills, generated in him, if possible, a keener desire to be pressing the battle to the gate and forwarding that counsel of God to which his life had been dedicated. For two years, however, he had been closely confined at home, and most of this time to his bed. At first partial and at last total blindness deprived him of what had been a great solace in his declining years, reading his Bible, Friends' periodicals, and other literature which interested him.

During this period he greatly enjoyed visits from his friends, and manifested much of his old time keenness of perception and fondness for amusing anecdote. Letters, too, were very welcome and his friends far and near were often in his mind and in his conversation, with no diminution of interest in the many religious and philanthropic movements in which he had taken vigorous part.

During the whole of his Christian life it had been his most earnest desire and determination to follow the counsel of God as revealed to his own spirit. He wished never to go beyond the leading of the spirit of truth in any way, and was careful to curb his naturally quick and keen sense of the ridiculous, lest he might become hilarious.

His appreciation of fun and his entertaining relation of anecdotes gave him ready access to groups of young people, especially college students, who delighted to crowd around him for his original wit and quick sympathy. All this advantage he could readily turn to use in the inculcation and promotion of religion and sound morality.

From his sense of Divine leading in his heart, it was useless to attempt to remove him. If any of us in troublous days felt that his power and influence should be thrown this way or that and sought to set up an argument with him that some other course than the one he was pursuing would be better, the effort was of little avail. He never, so far as I know, alienated any of us. The path he saw he followed, and he was so kind and loving to all that he held a place of vantage in our midst. Simple, sincere, direct, doubtless often painted by misunderstanding; but never resentful, always humble, and more concerned that he should follow closely his guide than as to what others might think of his course,—the steadfastness of his purpose could always be seen and felt.

His heart was always open to the sorrows and sufferings of others, and he had ability to bring these feelings of his heart to the more preoccupied minds of his friends and associates.

Orphans, widows, lonely elderly people, destitute persons of both races, schools for Negroes—all such rested heavily upon his heart and were made to rejoice many times because of his care.

His knowledge of the Bible reminded us of what we have read was George Fox's knowledge of the Bible. He had committed to memory large portions of the Scriptures and was noted for ability to express a religious concern or enforce an argument in Biblical language. He had a keen and discriminating sense of human character, and a clear perception of the harmony of truth and life.

Rufus King, while in the vigor of life, traveled extensively in the ministry both in this country and abroad. He knew the pillar Friends, as we sometimes call them, in all of the American Yearly Meetings, and also in London and Dublin. He knew the Meetings and the general attitude of the members on varying subjects of belief and polity.

His wide acquaintance with distinguished Friends in all parts of the world gave breadth to his view of Quaker doctrine, and would have gone far in preventing him from provincialism, even if he had had a tendency to narrowness in thought or limitation in speech. But a good degree of self-reliance and the Quaker method of individuality of thought and of worship never, in his case, opened the door to narrowness of beliefs or to dogmatic utterances.

The subject of peace as opposed to war was always on Rufus King's heart; and frequently in his discourses he dwelt upon the horrors and iniquity of all war. His speeches upon this and on the more distinctively evangelistic topics were clothed in simplicity and directness, and by their largely sympathetic character took instant hold upon his hearers. His prayers were often marvels of exquisite petition and Christian submission. His whole life was one of the finest examples in modern times of the direct influence of the spirit of God upon a human life, and strongly resembles what we read of as the experiences of those early "publishers of truth" who, as young men, went forth in the power of God.

Rufus P. King was born in Orange County, North Carolina, near the site of the State University at Chapel Hill, and knew nothing of Friends until he was grown. He was a thoughtful and observant boy, and early felt the power of conscience. In 1862, at the age of nineteen, he was drafted into the Confederate Army and attached to the Eleventh North Carolina Regiment, stationed at Wilmington.

The captain of his company was taken violently ill and chose Rufus as his nurse. This illness proved to be a case of yellow fever, from which the captain died, and all the arrangements for transporting the body and the preparation for burial were left to Rufus, as every one was afraid of contracting the terrible disease. All was faithfully accomplished with no untoward results to Rufus himself. He was deeply affected by the tragic experiences through which he had passed, and his own preservation under such circumstances seemed to be a manifestation of Divine providence.

From this sad experience Rufus King went to his home, and found a Methodist protracted meeting was in progress in the neighborhood. During its sessions he sought and found forgiveness for his past sins and united with the church.

Being again sent for to join the army, he clearly saw that the plain teaching of Christ as recorded in the New Testament was opposed to the spirit of both war and slavery, and his distress over the possibility of his taking the life of another caused deep anguish of soul, and his prayer was continued that he might be preserved from such a dreadful act.

In the battle of Gettysburg, he was detailed to care for the wounded, and thus it came about that he ministered to the dying lieutenant who had befriended him. This man said, "O Rufus, pray for me," and with bullets flying all around, for the second time in his life in the hearing of others, he lifted up his soul in petition to God for this loved friend.

His subsequent experiences as prisoner of war, then of an exchanged prisoner, and then a few weeks at home, then back again into war, are matters of interest, but must not be dwelt upon here.

Finally, sickened by both the spirit and atrocities of war, he escaped "beyond the lines," and found his way to Indianapolis; thence he traveled to Mill Creek, Indiana, and there found a home, and for the first time became acquainted with Friends.

His past experiences and convictions coincided with the teaching and principles professed by these people, and he soon united himself with them.

He then attended school for the first time in his life. He very soon began speaking in the meetings and was recorded as a minister.

Later he returned to North Carolina and attended New Garden Boarding School, making good progress in such studies as seemed adapted to his use.

In 1880 he was married to Alice Carr, who with the three children survive him.

BOOK REVIEWS.

"THE NEW STATE."*

Personal enthusiasm aside (and it were difficult to believe that a thoughtful person could read this volume of 350 pages without enthusiasm) this is, from several points of view, a notable production. It is a work in political philosophy, by a university trained American woman—Mary Parker Follett. Professor Bosanquet, a very eminent authority, says it is "the most sane and brilliant of recent works on political theory." Why he did not say political practice is not quite clear. Certainly practice, in the author's treatment, is made the doorway to theory. Viscount Haldane, quite as eminent as Bosanquet, and certainly more widely known, was so attracted by the treatise when it appeared, that he asked the liberty to write a foreword to a new edition should such be demanded. So here we have a third printing with the Haldane introduction. Our American blood tingles with a measure of pride that the "equal suffrage" movement should so promptly have found such a justification. The defence of democracy is made along constructive lines. The failures and perversions in our government are admitted, but the way out is shown to be open in many directions, and an increasing number of our good citizens are discovered "in the way." Truly it is a notable performance!

In a more limited field, one other notable point remains to be mentioned. The saving principle of democracy, as elucidated by our author, is none other than that upon which George Fox settled the conduct of affairs in the Society of Friends.

Dr. Thomas Hodgkin has pointed out that this was Fox's unique contribution. His message was common to many seventeenth century seekers, he almost alone among mystics founded a church organization that has survived through three centuries. Had Friends been the good stewards of this heritage and realized how widely serviceable the principle is in human society the chapters of this book could not have been put together without a single reference to Fox's contribution! So to members of the Society of Friends it is truly notable that here is a treatise from a non-Friend—written with a political motive (albeit she shows the necessity of a spiritual background for proper political functioning), but illuminating to a degree even to the best informed in the Society. What the "sense of the meeting" is, how it is obtained, how it subordinates mere human leadership, and "integrates" (that is the scientific term for it) a will and a way larger than that of any of the contributing units is all made fascinatingly clear, although "sense of the meeting" is never mentioned.

So the claim of the book is two-fold upon us. It shows us how actually to be worthy members of a democracy; it shows us (surely better than some of us know) how to be worthy members of our business meetings. We go to them not to force our own way, but to make our contribution with the expectation that it will be fused into a decision that will appear to us as larger than our personal view. This is not always an easy process. Our author says: "It takes more spiritual energy to express the group spirit than the particularist spirit."

The barest outline of the treatment pursued by the author, would be a trespass upon space accorded a review. A few key sentences may have an inviting flavor. The book demands study. It is not written for recreation. Nor does worthy citizenship in the State or in the City of God come by an easy process.

A brief appendix is for teachers. In twelve pages they get a very meaty kernel.

EXTRACTS FROM "THE NEW STATE."

"We are not given rights, we create rights."

"Just so far as people think that the basis of working together is compromise or concession, just so far they do not understand the first principles of working together."

"... compromise is still on the same plane as fighting."

"... the individual is not for a moment to yield his right to judge for himself; he can judge better for himself if he joins with others in evolving a synthesized judgment."

"... the object of every one associating with others, of every conversation with friends, in fact, should be to try to bring out a bigger thought than any one alone should contribute. How different our dinner parties would be if we could do this!"

"I believe that the realization of oneness which will come to us with a fuller sense of democracy, with a deeper sense of our common life, is going to be the substitute for what men get in war."

"Genuine discussion is truth seeking."

"The aim of each of us should be to live in the lives of all."

ALTHOUGH the late Wilfred Scawen Blunt, the famous traveler, poet, diplomatist and idealist revolutionary, made several curious legacies, none I think is more noteworthy than the £200 he left for the upkeep of the Friends' Burial Ground at Thakeham, Sussex, in token of his sympathy with Friends in their faithful opposition to military service during the late war. This is one of the most secluded and delightful of "God's Acres," for it surrounds the old Quaker Meeting-house known as "The Blue Idol," which stands at the end of a blind lane about three miles from Billingshurst and about ten from Horsham in the heart of Sussex, not far from Wilfred Blunt's own home. The meeting-house structurally is almost identical with that built in 1690 for the group of Friends of whom William Penn was the chief, when the latter lived at Worminghurst at the other end of Thakeham Parish.

Here on one occasion a big company gathered to hear Penn speak, the congregation having been summoned by his messengers earlier in the day. So full was Penn of his message that after waiting impatiently in the orchard while the farmer folk gathered, he began the delivery of his sermon as he entered the door and strode up the tiled floor to the tiny "ministers' gallery," as it is called, at the head of the Meeting. Under the shade of the apple trees, it is said, one of Penn's sons lies in one of the graves there, all alike unnamed and unmarked.

Its recently the interior plaster of the meeting-house and its fine beams were disfigured with the blue wash put on by Philistine brushes of several generations ago, and it is said that the fact that the place was both "blue" and "idle" for many years gave rise to its quaint name. Another suggestion, however, is that the figure-head of the ship in which Penn sailed from America was preserved here after he had landed at Worthing, and that this became known locally as the "idol."

Wilfred Blunt's attention was particularly drawn to the spot at a time its sacrilegious blue-wash was being scraped off by a party of Quaker ex-prisoners and others in the summer of 1919,—when the meeting-house entered upon a new era of usefulness. The party which visited the spot to complete their work in 1920, ceased from their hard labor to pay W. B.

a visit. They took with them Edward Woolven, the old caretaker of 84 who was born in the cottage portion of the meeting-house, and still tends the surrounding orchard and little farm. The world-wide traveler and the old countryman who had never been to London, immediately became firm friends, and this fact still further riveted Blunt's interest in the little spot for the upkeep of which he has left the legacy.

The Religious Society of Friends.

(A brief description of its present organization and work.)

The Religious Society of Friends has a membership at present (1922) throughout the world of about one hundred and fifty thousand. The local congregations of the Society are subordinate to autonomous annual assemblies in the different States or countries, known as "Yearly Meetings." To these Yearly Meetings representatives are sent from more local "Quarterly Meetings," in addition to the general attendance of individual members at the annual meeting.

London Yearly Meeting, with a membership of about twenty thousand, comprises all Friends in Great Britain except a small conservative group at Fritchley in Derbyshire. Dublin Yearly Meeting covers Ireland. Much smaller annual or semi-annual General Meetings are held in South Africa, New Zealand, Australia, Japan, China, Denmark, Germany and Norway, besides mission congregations in other countries connected with English or American Yearly Meetings.

In America there are several distinct groups of Friends. Thirteen Yearly Meetings—New England, New York, Baltimore, North Carolina, Canada, Wilmington (covering parts of Tennessee and Ohio), Indiana (parts of Ohio and Michigan), Western (Illinois and Indiana), Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Oregon and California, are associated in a Five Years' Meeting with headquarters at Richmond, Indiana. These thirteen Yearly Meetings use uniform Rules of Discipline and have a total membership of about eighty-five thousand. At the Richmond office, permanent Boards are maintained on Foreign Missions controlling missions in Africa, Cuba, Jamaica, Mexico, Palestine, and West China; a Board of Home Missions caring for evangelistic extension in the home field, several Indian missions in Oklahoma and a large colored school in Arkansas; a Peace Board; a Board of Education; a Board of Young Friends' Activities; a Publication Board; a Board on Prohibition and a Board on Religious Education, which supervises a large Bible School Work. Doctrinally the views of this group are described as "evangelical."

Seven "Liberal" ("Hicksite") Yearly Meetings, Philadelphia, comprising about half the total membership of twenty thousand, Baltimore, New York, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Genesee (eastern Ontario and western New York) are associated in a biennial Conference which maintains permanent offices in Philadelphia. Since the separation in the Society in America in 1827, this branch has emphasized great freedom of individual belief.

Eight quite small conservative Yearly Meetings which cooperate are located in New England, Canada, North Carolina, Western (Ind.), Iowa, Ohio, Kansas and at Fritchley, England. The membership of this group is about four thousand.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting (Orthodox), not directly connected with any other group, with headquarters at Fourth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia, has a membership of forty-five hundred. A third Yearly Meeting in Ohio with a membership of about eighty-five hundred holds its annual sessions at Damascus, Ohio. Both of these are evangelical in belief, although in methods of worship Philadelphia is conservative, while Ohio follows more or less closely the customs of other evangelical sects.

The foundation principle of the Society of Friends since its appearance in England in the second half of the seventeenth century has been the conviction that God speaks directly in every human heart. George Fox, the first leader of the Society, also taught that the same Divine Spirit which inspired the writing of the Bible interprets it to the reader; that true worship is a feeling after the fellowship and leading of Christ in the heart; that qualification for Christian ministry comes from God and is independent of any Church authority or of special education; and that the spirit of Christ always leads the individual Christian to put Divine principles of life into practice, usually in a very direct and simple way.

Meetings for Divine Worship in the older groups are held on a basis of silence without program. The Guidance of Christ's Holy Spirit is depended upon to lead any individuals into vocal prayer, testimony, teaching or song. Worship in silence often proves to be very impressive. In many American meetings the more conventional forms of Protestant service are used.

As spiritual experiences are believed to be inward, a matter of the heart's right relationship to God, Friends interpret all Christian ordinances and sacraments as to be observed spiritually rather than by any outward ceremony.

Friends from the founding of the Society have believed there is a way of life in which love and helpful sympathy replace all hatred or injury to others, a way of life taught by Christ, which eliminates all occasion for war and which for them makes all participation in war impossible. The Society in all countries has officially opposed all wars and has pleaded for brotherhood among nations as well as individuals. Although some members have accepted military service, some also because of their objection to conscription laws have suffered severe penal sentences, a few with fatal results.

Repeatedly during war-time, Friends have organized notable relief work. During the Great War, 1914-1918, an American Friends' Service Committee, representing all American groups of Friends, worked in close association with similar agencies of English Friends in reconstruction work in the devastated areas of France and in general relief work and post-war child feeding in Germany, Austria, Poland, Serbia and Russia. It was the aim of the Society in all of this work to carry by example and in other ways to friend and enemy alike a message of Christian brotherhood and good-will which in future may have some influence in healing international antagonisms.

Friends in both England and America have been among the leaders in work for the protection of the Indian, the abolition of slavery and the advancement of the colored races, penal reform, the care of the insane and other dependent classes, temperance and in the establishment of many charitable institutions.

The Society always has supported freedom of press and speech.

Education has been emphasized. The Rules of all branches of the Society provide that the children of members shall be given "sufficient education to fit them for the duties of life." Colleges are managed by Friends at Haverford and Swarthmore, Penna., Earlham, Ind., Guilford, N. C., Wilmington, Ohio, Oskaloosa, Ia., (Penn College), Central City, Neb., (Nebraska Central College), Wichita, Kans., (Friends' University), Newburg, Ore., (Pacific College), and Whittier, Calif., Bryn Mawr College, and Brown, Cornell and Johns-Hopkins Universities were founded by members of the Society of Friends.

The Society maintains many secondary boarding and day schools and nearly all of these colleges and schools are open to the public. Standards of education are equal or superior to public institutions of the same grades, and the private establishment is justified by the need for definite religious influence in education and the advantages of freedom from political influence.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING STATISTICS.

WATSON W. DEWEES.

In 1909 and earlier there was manifested in the Representative Meeting considerable uneasiness as to the condition of the records of membership in some of the Monthly Meetings. This led to the appointment of a standing committee on “Records and Changes in Membership.” In the Discipline of 1910 there appeared some additional requirements including an Annual Query, the answering of which stimulated closer scrutiny into the work of Recorders. In furtherance of this concern, a questionnaire was sent out to the Recorders in 1910, and for the first time in the history of the Yearly Meeting something approaching accurate statistics were compiled and reported to the Yearly Meeting in 1911.

The writer may now confess that he had some hesitation in offering these statistics, and was prepared to encounter objections. But no objections were heard, and a year later the statistics were tabulated in such manner as to show the weakness or strength of subordinate meetings, and to reveal the sources and the nature of all changes of membership. Even this did not bring forth any opposition. Only the late Isaac Sharpless and one or two others advocated a continuance of the tabulated statistics, and somewhat to the writer's surprise, this became an established custom and possibly these figures are looked forward to with a degree of interest, and have contributed something to a rational understanding of our real condition.

This is a good place to pause and inquire as to the origin of the hesitation on the part of Friends to the process of being “numbered.” There are still some bodies of Friends in America who do not know, and refuse to know, just how numerous they are. One would like to know the origin of the feeling against statistics. Is there, or is there not, a deep-seated, traditional fear fostered by the reading of 1 Chronicles, chapter xxi? We will all agree with the late John H. Dillingham, who used to say that the net amount of Quakerism in the world was not dependent upon the number of those who bore the name of Quakers. Even so, but a series of annual reports furnishes evidence of the tendency to or from the city, to or from the country, to or from certain occupations, and serves as a check to excessive discouragement or unprofitable elation. Without wishing to place undue emphasis on mere numbers, it may be claimed that statistics do serve a useful purpose, and are some index to the rapidity and source of growth or decay.

What then can we discover from a slight examination of these annual reports? Here is a summary of them, for the thirteen years ending Twelfth Month 1, 1922.

The possible gains were:—

Births .....	529
Certificates received .....	898
Convincements and requests .....	699
	<hr/>
	2126

Losses reported:—

Deaths .....	1074
Certificates granted .....	740
Resignations .....	132
Disowned or dropped .....	60

This shows an apparent net gain of 120 for the period in question. Let some one with an instinct for accuracy should question the work of the Committee on Records, I hasten to explain that Recorders have not made reports which permitted of ledger-like accuracy. Apparently the membership lists have been undergoing revision which has led to additions and subtractions. Time after time reports have stated that “our last year's total was wrong and ought to have been” thus and so. In one case a whole Monthly Meeting was laid down by Quarterly Meeting action and the membership attached elsewhere, but their age, sex, etc., did not reach the Committee for a year or two. The membership reported in 1910 was 4380. The foregoing figures show an increase of 120, which would bring the total up to 4500, and the remaining 41 is the net result, to date, of “revision of lists,” showing the latest total of 4541.

Let the reader examine again the sources of “gain” and “loss.” One item is highly suggestive, not to say discouraging; 529 births, as against 1074 deaths. A member of the Representative Meeting (now one in the latter enumeration) used to point to these figures and say, if there were no other sources of increase, it was an easy problem in arithmetic to determine how long the Society would last. Note also the discrepancy between the Certificates of Removal granted, 740, and those received, 898. There can be but one explanation for this difference. There has been a little stream of accessions from other Yearly Meetings. The 158 received in this way almost equals our net increase. Worth noting also is the total of 132 resignations. It used to be a rare thing for any one to exercise his inherent right to resign. Now it is much more common. As might be expected, the resignations were most frequent during and immediately following the great war.

It may interest some to note that Abington, Concord, Caln and Haddonfield-Salem Quarterly Meetings show an increase, in the last thirteen years, while Philadelphia, Western and Burlington-Bucks show a loss. In a general way, there is a manifest tendency with the membership to concentrate in the suburbs of Philadelphia.

Turning now to the tabulated statement about to appear in the “Extracts,” it will be observed that the rather phenomenal increase in Germantown and Moorestown Monthly Meetings corroborates the statement in the last paragraph. It is pleasant to note the increase of 18 in the number of minors, which argues well for the future. The excess of 293 adult females over the males is a notable fact, and a glance at the tabulated statement shows that the preponderance of women exists in some degree in the city meetings, but is most marked in the Monthly Meetings which include Media and West Chester, Pa., and Moorestown, N. J. Just why Frankford and Coatesville should continue for years to show a marked excess of adult males is not so easily explained.

NEVER give out while there is hope, but hope not beyond reason; for that shows more desire than judgment. It is profitable wisdom to know when we have done enough: much time and pains are spared in not flattering ourselves against improbabilities.—WM. PENN.

FROM RAS-EL-METN, SYRIA.

[We gladly share this personal letter, addressed to one of our friends, with our subscribers.—Eds.]

THIRD MONTH 7, 1923.

DEAR FRIEND:—

Thy letter of First Month 17, 1923, came to hand a few days ago and brought with it encouragement and I am grateful to thee for it, and for all thy help and interest. Enclosed thou wilt find a financial statement prepared by Wm. B. Evans, after auditing all our accounts. It is to the end of Twelfth Month. We are intending to send out such a statement of accounts every six months, so that Friends will know exactly how we stand. That is as soon after the end of Sixth Month and Twelfth Month as it is practicable to get the audit completed.

Armenians.—The worst cases at the moment are the men arriving in streams from the North. In rags, shoeless, worn-out and haggard, they are arriving in Beyrout all the time. Every one seems to have a story more sad than the other. We are taking up here some of the very worst cases. There is a small examining committee of two American lady missionaries and the Armenian pastor in Beyrout who very carefully examines each case before sending it on to us.

Since writing the foregoing three more men have arrived from Beyrout. They look ill and worn out. They are having a good meal, at the moment, and they need it. They are in rags and covered with vermin. How could it be otherwise? Next they must have a hot bath and get clean—but I do not know what we are going to do for clean clothes for them. Our stock of clothes is finished. We are urgently in need of underclothes for men and boys, shirts, drawers, stockings, trousers, jackets, boots, blankets, quilts, anything that can be called clothing. I have gone through all my own clothes again and again and everything that I can possibly give away has gone—but I must go again. The clothes question is a desperate one. We have no more quilts and it is bitterly cold, and has been a cold, wet winter all through.

One of the men just arrived is from Constantinople, another from Angora, and the third from Kharput. They look extremely sad. Even "Jack," my fox-terrier, who does not take kindly to strangers, did not bark at the sight of these poor, broken fellows—even "Jack" seemed to feel the tragedy of their lives. Well, God helping us, we'll try and get some sunshine into their lives.

In Beyrout there are now over 20,000 refugees—homeless, having lost everything—without hope and prospects. In Aleppo there are 80,000 refugees, and many, many thousands in Tripoli, Alexandretta, and Mersine. At the latter place typhus has broken out. How can poor Syria support or absorb such vast numbers. They can never go back to their land and homes in Asia Minor. It is impossible for Turks and Armenians ever to live together. I must write a letter for THE FRIEND some day if I can get a little leisure on the pros and cons of the Turks and Armenians. It is a sad, sad question. Both races lived happily and at peace for over five hundred years.

But at present we are and must be occupied with the healing and helping work. The catastrophe has taken place. For the moment we can leave the causes alone.

Please, please continue to help us so that we may be able to help these poor, poor people.

Thine very sincerely,

DANIEL OLIVER.

P. S.—Enclosed is the pamphlet translated in Arabic which we are circulating far and wide. It is the message on peace issued by the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and signed by the Clerks. Also by Roger Clark, London Yearly Meeting. It was translated by our Three Months' Meeting. It is a beautiful message, and I believe has a work to do in the East. Thou wilt also be interested to know that at last the translation of "Barclay's Apology" is an accomplished fact. It contains 117,000 words in Arabic. It has been a heavy task for Tanius Cortas, the Clerk of our Three Months' Meeting—but at last it is finished. He came to me one day and wondered what he was going to do with the chapter on "Salutations and Recreations"—where it speaks about dress, etc., as Friends do not now-a-days act according to it. Well, I replied, we cannot tone Barclay down, we must translate it as it is, and perhaps Friends will some day again try and live up to its standard of simplicity.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THIRTEEN MOTHERS.

MARGARET T. APPLGARTH.

Adapted from Everlyland.

Finis had thirteen mothers. And that is enough to give anybody a sober face, especially as twelve-and-a-half of those mothers were boys, and the other half was really a boy, too, only it belonged to Ignacy, which meant that from the nose downward his mouth and chin and jaws were "boy," but from the nose up . . . oh, from the nose up, Ignacy's eyes, Ignacy's ears and Ignacy's brain were all—"mother." He had not known about that half of himself until Finis came along.

Said Neighbor Lapczynska next door: "Sooner I hears how Maria Marchlewicz has got a daughter, I makes me a remark on my husband as how the surprise of it could to kill her mit joy. Und sooner I makes that remark, sooner Maria Marchlewicz she up and dies, poor woman! So over I goes und I makes me a remark on them sons: 'You poor kids ain't got no mudder no more. Und you ain't got no grammudder. Und you ain't got no aunties. But you got me!' So sooner you thirteen kids steps along to the sink, I puts me right arm into scrubbing you up real clean for the funeral, see? So step along lively now!"

"Twelve-and-a-half of the boys began to "step along lively" toward the sink to be scrubbed and soaped and scoured within an inch of their lives, but it was then that the top half of Ignacy woke into maternal consciousness.

"Mudder learned us how to scrub our own selves," he said with gentle dignity—and instantly the other twelve boys nodded their heads and echoed him in a chorus: "Yah! Mudder learned us how to scrub our own selves."

So in spite of her willing right arm and her friendly intentions, Neighbor Lapczynska was forced to walk home wagging her head and announcing to the neighborhood: "You should see what you should see! Thirteen boys at their mudder's funeral mit dirty faces—yah!"

But they were not dirty. Terrible things had happened to them at the hands of Ignacy; but at least they had happened in the secrecy of the Marchlewicz kitchen, and at least no alien hands had soaped those faces until they shone like polished apples at a fruit stall.

"Sooner we lets one neighbor-womens into this kitchen, sooner we lets the whole binch of neighbor-womens into this kitchen, see?" Ignacy would say fiercely at intervals all during the tedious scrubbing, when the boys were crying, half from grief because Mudder was gone and half from pain at the scouring. But the neighborhood had to admit that thirteen boys with sober shining faces were an ornament to the funeral. Everybody cried to see them sitting there, so awed and solemn and forlorn. So awkward and clumsy and wretched.

"Those poor kids!" sobbed the neighbor-women afterwards. "Who's going to know them apart now their mudder is gone?" "Yah!" said Neighbor Lapczynska. "Who's going to know them apart?"

"Und who's going to cook them their meals?"

"Who's going to wash them their clothes?"

"Und who's going to patch them their holes?"

"Who's going to sweep them their houses?"

"Who's going to clean them their dishes?"

Oh, it was something to talk about over back fences—this Marchlewicz family. But the most anxious question of all was about the little new baby: what would become of that motherless infant?

"It will up und die!" said Neighbor Lapczynska. "Sure, up und die!" everybody agreed, so that it really was all settled in their own minds in no time at all. But they were reckoning without Ignacy, he who had suddenly become a mother in the twinkling of an eye.

Ignacy had no least intention of letting the baby up and die. He knew more about babies than you might suppose, for he was number five in the Marchlewicz family and had seen plenty of small brothers suck placidly on milk bottles until in due time they grew big enough to roll around on the kitchen floor. Well, what he had seen brothers do, surely one sister could also do! So he never wasted a moment of worry over baths or bottles or blankets or draughts; he merely grew a trifle anxious over a suitable name.

"I tink we should get us a real American name," said he, for in a family bristling with a Sigismund, a Henryk, a Josef, a Ursin, a Jan, etc., he felt that the old country was well enough represented. The little sister should be American through and through if they had their way about it, as evidently they would, for now is the time to tell you that Papa Marchlewicz spent most of his life down underneath America in a great black coal mine. When he was hoisted up to the surface at the end of a day's work, he went straight to the house of an old crony who kept strong drink in bottles: he loved those bottles so devotedly that it meant little to Papa Marchlewicz whether there were brand new babies at his house.

A CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS FOR A SERVICE OF LOVE IN PEACE TIME.

In time of war young Friends are often compelled to choose between military service and imprisonment. Many hesitate to refuse the former, not because they fear the latter, but because they dislike to refuse service to their country in time of need. They rightly feel that they were not born to live safe and selfish lives, but to give themselves for the sake of others. Having made no special sacrifice for their fellow-men in time of peace, they find it especially difficult to refuse their country's call in time of war.

The Home Service work of the American Friends' Service Committee offers to young men and women in the normal days of peace the opportunity to help humanity and through it their country. The Committee urges that they give voluntarily at least a year of constructive service to their fellow-men. Numerous organizations are co-operating with the Committee in its efforts to place in the field of their social interests all those who volunteer for this work. Expenses of accepted workers will be met when no remuneration is attached to the service undertaken.

There are at present more calls than there are volunteers. The opportunities are:

INTER-RACIAL.

Negro—Teaching and community service work in Negro schools in the South. Two especially interesting and strategic openings in a school in the North. These are mostly remunerative, although there is a need for volunteers as well.

Indian—One man and one woman wanted in two of the Friends' Indian Missions. Openings in other missions as well. Teaching in the government schools. These positions are under civil service.

INTERNATIONAL.

Settlements—There are numerous openings for both men and women to live in settlement houses in various large cities and do club and recreational work. Community visiting is frequently part of the program. One of the Philadelphia settlements has agreed to take a unit of five volunteers. None of the settlement work is remunerative.

Porto Rico—Teaching under civil service.

Philippines—Teaching under civil service. Two year contract necessary.

Mexico—One man wanted to work with boys in shelter for waifs in Mexico City, also to assist in publicity work under the direction of Douglas L. Parker, A. F. S. C. representative in Mexico. Must be able or learn to typewrite.

Consular Service—This work is really a life career with great possibilities for bettering international understanding. Considerable preparation is necessary to take the civil service examinations.

INTER-CLASS.

Efforts will be made to direct young men and women who desire to give a year to the study of the industrial question by working in some industry.

Industrial Summer Groups under the direction of the Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. These are for a six weeks' period.

PENAL REFORM.

Prison Work—A six weeks' training course at Columbia University followed by a year as worker in a state prison.

Reform School—Numerous openings for both men and women in boys' and girls' reform schools throughout the country. Some of these are remunerative, others volunteer.

SUMMER OPENINGS.

Y. M. C. A. Industrial Groups—In Denver, Omaha, Indianapolis, Portland (Oregon), Minneapolis and New York. These are for a six weeks' period.

Y. W. C. A. Industrial Groups—In Chicago, Kansas City and in Roanoke or Lynchburg, Va. These are for a six weeks' period.

Ellis Island—One man for recreational work with children. Indians—There are a couple of openings for summer work amongst the Indians.

Reform Schools—Several openings for recreational workers or supply cottage helpers in boys' and girls' reform schools.

Settlements—Two men and one woman wanted to supervise playground work and work of boys on settlement farm. Small salary connected with these positions.

Mountain Whites—Opening for man to coach backward boys in mountain school in Kentucky.

Peace—Opening for one man and one woman in Washington as publicity worker and clerical worker respectively in a national organization working for peace.

All those who are interested in undertaking any of these lines of service are urged to communicate immediately with Anna B. Griscom, Secretary, Home Service Department of the American Friends' Service Committee, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

AN INVITATION THAT IS POPULAR IN VIENNA.

"The Friends' Relief Mission invites you to come on ———, at ——— o'clock to the Society's Office, Sensengasse 5, Door No. 10, bringing this card, a bag, some money and your application card."

Every week sixty postal cards bearing this invitation are sent out by the Friends' Mission in Vienna. Every week, from each of the families notified, at least one member appears. The invitation is never disregarded.

Sensengasse 5 is the address of the "Verein gegen Verarmung." To this organization has been turned over for distribution a large part of the clothing supplies belonging to the Friends' Mission. Sixty Mission cases pass through its doors each week, each one carefully investigated, and recommended by one of the Mission departments.

At nine o'clock each morning the distribution starts. One may safely assume that the first woman at the door has been waiting for at least an hour. She is a widow who ekes out a precarious living by giving music lessons. Her four small children, she says, have been wild with excitement ever since the postal card arrived three days ago, and the previous night they scarcely slept at all for wondering "what mother will bring home to-morrow."

In return for her card of authorization from the Mission she receives a huge parcel. There are warm stockings and jumpers for the entire family, stout shoes for two of the children, material for dress for a little girl and a new suit for a small boy. For herself she receives a warm cloak and, most welcome of all, material for underwear.

The sum which she pays for the entire lot is very small. Mission clothing cases are divided into four classes, paying according to their ability one-fourth, one-eighth, one-sixteenth or one thirty-second of shop prices. As a widow with small children she pays the lowest price.

Going out, she opens the door to a pale-faced, tired-looking woman whose card reads "a blanket, sheets, rubber sheeting, warm underwear." We learn that she has an eighteen-year old daughter lying helpless in bed at home. The bed linen will be a godsend; her own is in rags.

Next comes an elderly woman, very shabbily dressed, but with an appearance of quiet distinction. With the mysterious Austrian instinct she recognizes immediately the nationality of the Mission visitor sitting in the corner and produces a worn booklet labeled "Shopping List." It was given her by an English friend in Rome where she has spent many winters. Now she accepts gladly her second-hand garments and a man's flannelette nightshirt, since there are no similar women's garments in her size. "And why not," she replies to our apologies. "One is grateful for anything warm."

So the day goes on. There is a mother whose two small children must be outfitted for a tuberculosis home. There is an eighteen-year old boy who is leaving the next day for a position in the country and who receives a corduroy suit provisionally left behind by a former Mission member. A girl student is given material for a dress, a nurse a pair of shoes, an old lady a packet of wool that she may knit her husband some mittens.

We dare to congratulate ourselves. A part of Vienna at least is going about more warmly clothed because of our work. Then comes a week of belated winter weather when the streets seem filled with thinly clad, shivering figures. We sigh for more overcoats, more warm dresses, more shoes, more mittens, anything with which we may clothe even a small proportion of those who flock to us. Last First Month 26th, bales and cases of clothing came to us from America, England and Australia, and clothed 192 families. We were thankful beyond words, but we are greedy for these things—we want more!

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

JAPAN NOTES.

The Yearly Meeting of Friends in West China heard that the school in Tokyo belonging to Friends' Mission and closely bound up with the Japan Yearly Meeting, was endeavoring to raise money for a gymnasium. They promptly sent twenty dollars for the fund. This evidence of solidarity of feeling among widely separated bodies of Friends in the Orient is very gratifying.

The Japan Mission suffered a serious loss on Third Month 15th, when the residence of Gilbert and Minnie Bowles, on the Mission compound, was partly destroyed by fire. Pending the completion of their new house on the "dormitory lot," Daimachi, Mita, Thomas and Esther Jones and their two little boys were living with the Bowles. Esther Jones discovered the fire at about seven in the morning, in connection with the pipe leading from the dining-room stove. This pipe passed through the floor to the room above to a "drum," then through the wall of weather boards and plaster. The pipe had been well insulated, but it is supposed that the tile had been broken by an earthquake a short time before, thus permitting the hot pipe to set fire to the partition. When the first alarm was given, the attic was already ablaze, the flames having crept up through the hollow wall.

Firemen soon came, and their efforts extinguished the blaze before all the second floor rooms were gutted. Minnie Bowles' study was not burned. Damage on the first floor was mostly by water. The furniture, etc., from this floor was all carried out by the many willing hands that were quickly available. The one-story Japanese room was not damaged at all.

Losses include practically all summer clothing of both Bowles and Jones families, all of the Bowles linen, most of the Jones china, many books, nearly all of Esther Jones' clothing and that of the two children. There was insurance on the house and furniture, and on the personal property of the Bowles family.

Gilbert Bowles was hurt by chemicals from a fire extinguisher, but not seriously.

Friends, both Japanese and foreign, have been extremely kind and helpful. Gifts of money and goods began to come in before the day was over, and the whole amount received was considerable. The Bowleses are domiciled in the teachers' residence, and the Jones family have moved to the new house.

Since the above was put in type, the subjoined message has been received:—

The many friends of Gilbert and Minnie P. Bowles will be deeply interested and sympathetic on hearing of the disastrous fire which, early in the morning of Third Month 15th, destroyed the second and third floors of their home in the Missionary Residence at the Friends' Mission in Tokyo.

This involved a serious personal loss of clothing, household goods and furniture, both to them and to Thomas E. and Esther B. Jones, who were living with them until the new house on the Dormitory lot should be ready for their reception.

The many Japanese and other friends of Gilbert and Minnie P. Bowles in Tokyo showed their practical sympathy by presenting them with gifts of 1000 yen ($500.00), which has helped to repair some of their personal losses.

There was fortunately an insurance on the house of $6750, but it is estimated that the cost of rebuilding will amount to one thousand dollars more, in addition to which another one thousand dollars is needed for some very desirable improvements.

Gilbert and Minnie P. Bowles expect to sail for this country in the Sixth Month, for a specially granted furlough, and it is hoped that the rebuilding of their home can be nearly completed before they leave.

We feel confident that the interest of their friends here will supply this need; and many kind friends are considering what they can give in the way of linen, blankets, and other articles, to furnish an outfit for them when they return to Japan.

Thomas E. and Esther B. Jones have removed to their new home on the Dormitory lot, although it was hardly ready for them, and they, too, have had losses which their friends hope will be repaired.

Contributions should be sent to Lydia W. Rhoads, Treasurer, 152 W. School Lane, Germantown.

We notice the Pennsbury Leaflet No. 17—"Family Bible Reading" in the last issue of the Canadian Friend. It is not unusual to find these in our Exchanges.

THE Journal of the Friends' Historical Society [London] is issuing, in serial, a list of Quaker inventors, each with a brief sketch of the inventor and his work. The list numbers 63, and is to be continued. No. 55 is as follows:—

Cyrus Chambers, Jr., of Philadelphia, invented various sorts of book-folding machines; the first successful machine was one that folded Comly's "Spelling Book," a sheet of 32 pages, and the last and greatest invention was a machine made expressly to fold the Ladies' Home Journal. He also produced a machine to make bricks.

NOTICES.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING will be held on Third-day, Fifth Month 8th, at 10.30. The Meeting of Ministers and Elders the afternoon previous at 2.30.

ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING will be held at Germantown, Fifth-day, Fifth Month 10th, at 3.30 P. M., the Meeting of Ministers and Elders the day previous at ten o'clock.

A RUMMAGE SALE will be held at Benezet House, 918 Locust Street, on Fourth Month 30th and Fifth Month 1st. Packages can be left at Friends' Institute, 20 S. Twelfth Street, and also at Friends' Arch Street Centre, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

The First-day School Association, Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, will hold a Conference at the Friends' Institute, on Fifth Month 11th, at 4.30 P. M.

It is believed that the Conference will be especially interesting to teachers, and to those actively connected with our First-day Schools. All are cordially invited.

In the afternoon, courses of study will be discussed under the leadership of Walter W. Haviland, for adults and for children of different ages, by Walter W. Haviland, Mary J. Warner, Janet Payne Whitney, Sarah H. Cheynev and others.

Supper will be served and immediately after, John T. Emlen will tell of the plans for the First-day School Association, and Richard Cadbury Brown will speak on the work of superintendents. Stanley R. Yarnall will give the main talk of the evening on "The Importance of First-day Schools in the Society of Friends."

All those wishing supper will please notify Mary J. Moon, 20 S. Twelfth Street, not later than Fifth Month 9, 1923.

EDUCATIONAL MEETING.—Friends and others interested in education are invited to attend a conference of the Friends' Educational Association, to be held at Friends' Select School, The Parkway and Seventeenth Street, Seventh-day, Fifth Month 5th.

The afternoon session will open at 3.30 o'clock and the evening session at 7.30, with supper between at a cost of fifty cents.

In the afternoon there will be two conferences. The first will be led by Dr. Thatcher Clark of Columbia University and will be of great interest to all interested in the teaching of foreign languages. The subject will be "A Way to Teach More and Better French in Less Time." The other conference will be on "The Social Studies—History, Geography, and Citizenship—in Our Schools—Their Teaching and Correlation." It is expected that this conference will be led by Roy W. Hatch of the Social Science Department of the Horace Mann School, New York City. Edgar C. Bye of Coatesville and other teachers will take part in the discussion. A speaker for the Committee on the Social Order is also expected.

At the evening session, Eugene Randolph Smith, Headmaster of the Beaver Country Day School, Brookline, Mass., former Headmaster of the Park School, Baltimore, Md., will speak on "Some Things New and Old for Which the Private Schools of To-day Ought to Stand."

DEED.—Fourth Month 15, 1923, at her home in Media, Pa., MARY S. WALTON, wife of the late Joseph J. Walton, aged seventy-seven years; a Minister and member of Chester Monthly Meeting, Penna.

FROM THOMAS STORY'S JOURNAL.

[After composing this piece, which he called a "Song of Praise to the Saints in Zion," he was ready to destroy it, observing in it things written in the first person, which did not belong to his own spiritual state. But, since the matter had been set down as it came, and with undoubted evidence of the Divine presence, he preserved it, concluding it given by dictation from the Mind of Truth. It was true in itself, and might answer the states of many, and be his own experience in time, if he was faithful. The piece was written early in 1690, before he came into touch with Friends.]

I was silent before the Lord, as a child not yet weaned;
He put words in my mouth;
And I sang forth His praise with an audible voice.

I called unto my God out of the great deep;
He put on bowels of mercy, and had compassion on me;
Because His love was infinite,
And His power without measure.

He called for my life, and I offered it at His footstool;
But He gave it to me as a prey,
With unspeakable addition.

He called for my will, and I resigned it at His call;
But He returned me His own,
In token of His love.

He called for the world, and I laid it at His feet,
With the crowns thereof;
I withheld them not at the beckoning of His hand.

But mark the benefit of exchange:
For He gave me, instead of earth, a Kingdom of eternal peace,
And, in lieu of the crowns of vanity,
A crown of glory.

.....
He gave me joy, which no tongue can express,
And peace which passeth understanding. . . .

I begged Himself, and He gave me all.

He gave me power to do wonders also,
To keep His commandments, through His Holy Spirit,
And to walk in the paths of righteousness with joyful songs.

IS THE PILOT ABOARD?

We had been almost one month on the ship between Sydney, Australia, and Durban, South Africa. There had been a few stormy days—most of them had been clear and sunny. The waters had never been altogether still. The huge rollers out of the south swung our big vessel from side to side as they marched on their long, long course from the Antarctic towards India. There had been gaiety on board—mirth, song and sports. There had been sorrow in our midst—anxieties, illnesses, fears. A poor, despairing fireman had jumped overboard the night before we called at Durban. I think all were glad because our destination would be reached on the morrow.

The following morning land was sighted. Those of the keenest vision saw it first—the misty headlands slowly taking form out of the restless sea. Then the engines ceased their rhythmic pounding and silence almost reigned whilst the pilot climbed the shaky ladder and walked up to the bridge, where he took command. We knew that he would guide the Ulysses through the dangerous channel into the still waters of the harbor, now so close to view. Soon our ship gathered headway and resumed her course.

The entrance to the harbor of Durban is an unusually difficult one. Two long breakwaters extend out into the ocean and the distance between the outside ends is not much more than a good-sized ship's length. The immense swells—peculiar to the vast southern ocean—crash with imperious violence against the rocks placed by the hands of men to halt their progress. The breakers, the morning I speak of, must have been twenty feet high—the glistening white spray was flung a hundred feet or more into the air. Our ship, like a great cork, rose and sank in the tumultuous sea. We made directly for the narrow opening. At times it seemed as if we would be tossed upon the cruel rocks of the breakwaters, but no! The pilot was in command, he was acquainted with every danger, he knew the ground and sea to the very inch. At each critical moment we were guided into the deeper water and in a few minutes were in the quiet harbor where no storm could harm us and perfect safety was secured.

As I leaned on the rail and watched the ship rise and fall whilst adventuring the narrow channel my mind reverted to the analogy between men finding perfect refuge from the ever-changing sea and the triumphant termination of the Christian life. How similar they are. The follower of Jesus, like all men, has a mixed experience as, day by day, he journeys toward the celestial port—the acme of his religious idealism, the ultimate achievement of his spiritual hope and joy. His life is made of sunny days and cloudy days, there are periods of distress and storm, there is mingled gaiety and tragedy, but he voyages on until his destination—the better country—is attained. The hour that death shall overtake us is generally in the plenitude of Divine mercy hidden from our eyes. Sometimes the shores of eternity are seen a long distance before we reach them, and the beautiful haven is only approached through the agonies and tossings of suffering and tears. Sometimes the thick mists that surround us, in our everyday human experiences, shield us from realizing that suddenly—as lightning from a stormy sky—we shall be called into the unsullied presence of God.

STATS COOPER

Be all this as it may, the paramount question must be answered by each of us—are we ready? Is the pilot aboard? Have we taken Jesus into our confidence? Do we permit Him to steer our little vessels according to His complete knowledge of our material and spiritual needs and of the seen and unseen dangers that encompass us? If so, all shall be well. With Him controlling the wheel of our destiny no hidden rock can wreck us, no seas of misfortune can engulf us. Soon, at the longest, we shall look back upon the fierce waters that have beaten upon us and rejoice in the ineffable glory of the heavenly harbor—we shall be glad in the infinite expansion of eternal service and love!

AFRICA, 1923.

A Brief History of the Shelter.

Elizabeth S. Pennell.

[We have had the following on our table many weeks and we are not surprised that several have complained that its publication has been delayed. The delay has resulted through no choice of ours, but because as the weeks have passed other papers have crowded it out. We have felt, however, that with the postponement there will be freshness again in its reading on the part of those who heard it the day of the celebration last mid-autumn. The occasion alluded to was the anniversary of the founding of the Shelter, made very clear in the essay we print. We felt at the time, and the impression still lingers, that the exercises of the program that afternoon were of a very high order and nothing was missed, though the Managers who had prepared for an out-of-doors celebration, were driven in from the campus by a rain storm and the large audience had to accommodate itself in the assembly hall.—Eds.]

It was a big-hearted woman who first conceived the idea of a Shelter for colored orphans; the time was 1814, long before the proclamation of freedom to the slaves, and uphill work she found it; prejudice was strong even in the North, and lack of sympathy met her on all sides. Her name was Ann Yarnall, and little more we know of her. "A pious woman of the Religious Society of Friends," our first report, published in 1822, denotes her. She died before she had put her plan for a Shelter into execution, bequeathing for the purpose the sum of $50 and several pieces of old-fashioned furniture, our joy and pride to-day; more important still, she let fall her mantle upon one, Beulah Sansom; this Quaker lady, a close friend of Ann Yarnall, was possessed of both tact and executive ability; she immediately called upon nineteen of her women friends in various parts of Philadelphia and laid the proposal to establish a Shelter for colored orphans before them, requesting that each ponder it well and meet at her home on Fourth Street, a few days later. This meeting was held, and here, in 1822, the association was formed and the work seriously undertaken.

At first the Shelter was housed in the home of a worthy colored family, the house was made in readiness and its owner engaged as caretaker. All was prepared,—but behold, no orphan came forward to be sheltered. The colored people had little confidence in this endeavor of the white race to assist them; years of harsh treatment had made them suspicious. Gradually, however, their confidence was gained and after a few months of waiting, the first orphan, George Morgan, was admitted. Years later, we find as many as eighty-four comprising the Shelter family; larger quarters had of course been necessitated, but the growth was gradual, and for many years private homes proved sufficient.

It is interesting to note that from the first the Shelter was conducted on a frugal and strictly economical basis. A copy of the first bill of fare is before me:—

"Breakfast, First and Second-days—boiled milk and bread; Third and Fourth-days—domestic coffee (whatever that may have been—not a very fine brand, I fancy), cleared with molasses; Fifth, Sixth and Seventh-days—boiled milk and mush. Dinner—meat, soup, pie, or rice pudding. Supper—First-day—bread and molasses; other days—bread and water. One biscuit to be given to each child daily at 11 o'clock. At the end of every meal, let the broken bread that is unavoidably made, be carefully gathered up and reserved to be eaten with the soup or milk."

Rules were made out with elaborate care. All children in health were to rise with the sun throughout the year. The age of admission was at that time from eighteen months to eight years—babies were numerous; it is perhaps because of this that a great deal of sickness prevailed—but even sickness was turned to good account.

About 1865 beheld the purchase of the spacious lot at Forty-fourth and Wallace Streets, in West Philadelphia, and the erection of the large building which until 1914 accommodated the Shelter family. That is the Shelter most familiar to many of us. Here, with white officers, mostly elderly, a Matron, school teachers, seamstress, cook, nurse-maid, etc., our little girls, clad in serviceable dark grey-blue gingham dresses, surmounted by serviceable dark grey-blue gingham aprons, all exactly alike, and our boys in dark blue-grey gingham shirts and trousers all of a piece, grew to a suitable age to be indentured or later to be placed at service.

I can close my eyes and see the high respectable brick walls at Forty-fourth and Wallace,—the Shelter as I first saw it as a manager, nearly fifteen years ago, with its fine, big infirmary (added after several years of contagious diseases had quarantined us and kept the family in bed for months); its narrow little front grass plot and its fenced-off playground in the rear, all paved with brick and enclosed in a high iron fence; a summer house stood in the middle, called in Shelter parlance, "the pavilion;" here groups of little girls sat and looked listlessly around, or walked in subdued fashion up and down the bricks. It was a few years before this that we had exchanged our boys for the girls of a similar Home in West Philadelphia; the consensus of enlightened opinion being that the two can best be cared for in separate institutions. Within I can see the basement play-room where the babies and very little children were kept by an elderly caretaker; the dark halls and the big, dingy dining-room, its long oil-cloth covered tables set with much nicked, white enamel plates and cups. The walls were plain and dark; wooden benches without backs were used at the tables; grace was sung before meals, but for many years conversation was forbidden.

Upstairs a beautiful wide hall, adorned with our stately furniture, led past the school-rooms on the right to a large, airy managers'-room in the rear; on this floor also was the beautifully appointed dining-room where the faculty had their meals and where the managers lunched on board days.

On the floor above were the dormitories with their rows of white beds, always immaculate and beautifully made by the children.

They had little real recreation and slight contact with the outside world. There is a report of the matron under date of 1899 that "21 children went with three teachers to spend the day in the country. Sixteen had never been on the train and none had seen real country." Later an effort was made to improve this situation by weekly trips to the Zoo, the Park, or even to sit by the brookside in some quiet country field.

A Christmas tree invaded the home one year, a solemn little group gathered around its unheard of wonders, one doll had been sent by a fond relative; when this was given to the overjoyed recipient, a wail arose immediately from all the rest—a wail which even the orange and bag of candy apiece could not allay nor yet the Christmas dinner of chicken, sweet potato and pie. The next Christmas saw a doll, a really truly doll for each little mother and happiness reigned. Edward Strawbridge had contributed the wreckage of his doll counter, kind friends had sent in pieces of silk, ribbons, etc., and loving caretakers had done the rest.

The Shelter has always been rich in friends—from Lydia H. Sigourney, who in 1836 sent $5 to be used for slates or books, to Eliza Cope Collins of Germantown who for over fifty years sent the children at Christmas time, ginger-cake men—for each child one with a stick of candy and a Scripture text. This kind friend has left it in her will that the savory custom be continued, as is done by her descendants even to this day.

As recent thought has developed and the care of dependent children has received the intelligent study it has always deserved, the Shelter management has endeavored to keep pace with its advancement.

In 1914, we moved our family of girls out into the country, where in houses small enough to be real homes, with colored matrons who are real mothers, and with a school taught by the best colored teachers we can secure, we are giving them what you see here to-day—a course in home-making and in the things which make life worth-while. We are co-operating with the Cheyney Training School for Teachers, receiving much of inspiration and of educational value from them; their Principal is our Superintendent and keeps the work of both schools closely allied. It is our hope that our girls may continue, as three of them are doing this year, to pursue their studies at Cheyney,—that wherever they go, they may, by their loyalty and devotion to the high ideals taught them here, in God's beautiful fresh air and sunshine, make the future history of the Shelter of larger interest than the past.

The Friends' Fellowship Papers give us the following picture of a Friends' First-day Meeting in Moscow. A group of Russians under the guidance of V. Tchertkoff meet every First-day morning for an hour very much after the manner of Friends. Some of the group have issued the following as a pronouncement and addressed it to newcomers:—

"At the premises of the Moscow Vegetarian Society we meet for mutual intercourse for the purpose of attaining the greatest extent of inner union we are able to reach. These meetings stand for an effort of mutual communion on the basis of that which is deepest, most of the Spirit in man. Seeing that this object demands the greatest possible introspection, it is important that each one of us should above all endeavor to the utmost of his power to concentrate his attention on his inner consciousness and to scrutinize that which is taking place there. There in the depths of one's soul such an attitude is created which is free from all hurry either in one's thoughts or desires, and which enables one the better to listen to what another is saying, and to transport oneself into one's soul, and to understand in its most favorable light that which he is endeavoring to express. Therefore, if those who meet here are silent for a long time, this silence is in no way ritual for them, but is simply the outcome of a need they consciously feel of inner concentration. We do not wish to speak only for the sake of saying something, nor to be silent merely in order to hold our tongue. We endeavor to speak only when we experience an irresistible inner need of sharing with others that which we are thinking or feeling, maybe in the deepest and even unrevealed workings of our spiritual consciousness. We would desire that at these meetings each one of us should keep silent as long as he does not feel a distinct demand to express himself. But when such a demand does make itself felt to him, it is not desirable that he should restrain it merely in order not to break the silence."

It calls for no unusual imagination to ascribe this to a certain seventeenth century Friend and writer whose name is very familiar.

DETROIT MEETING.

A number of Philadelphia Friends have been privileged, during the past two years, to attend the newly established Friends' Meeting at Detroit, and still more heard, during Yearly Meeting week, the accounts of its splendid progress from Oscar Moon and Walter Heacock who had come to us with recent greetings from Detroit Friends. Its establishment is a matter of interest and importance to Friends everywhere.

Detroit is typical of those vast American cities of the Middle West that have developed their greatness almost overnight. They attract a heterogeneous, undigested mass of human beings, of all kinds and descriptions, varying from the most illiterate emigrant to the restless, adventurous spirits that have broken old ties and set out for conquests in new fields. They lack the elements of antiquity and conservatism that the older centres possess.

The Society of Friends, of all denominations, has cherished the value of old associations, as, in fact, every group that so stresses the family life, and its consequent intimate culture, is bound to do. Unfortunately this feature, which is a source of strength in old sections, has proved a weakness in pioneering. After the first half century of wonderful expansion, having acquired a history, we settled down in our old centres to intensify and consolidate the meetings established. Later, in America, came the westward emigration and once more the Quakers were pioneering. They abandoned many of the outward features of Friends and perforce adapted themselves to frontier conditions.

And now has come the third stage. Great metropolitan cities present a challenge to Quakerism different from anything the East has ever known. Detroit is accepting that challenge. In full harmony with the Federated Church ideal, it has sought and has been accorded a great, unchurched territory in the newest and fastest growing section of the sprawling Motor City. No other Protestant Church will enter that territory. The full responsibility belongs to Friends. And, more significant yet, it belongs to all Friends. The group that is now meeting in a private house, but will soon have a new meeting-house, is as cosmopolitan as is the city itself. The meeting is conducted much after the mid-west method, but there is an eastern atmosphere about it, too, that makes it representative of Philadelphia, Baltimore and New York as well. The proposed building has no ecclesiastical architecture about it, resembling more nearly the quiet dignity of a library building. If present plans are matured, it will have all the facilities of a modern religious centre, in a developing neighborhood.

Detroit Friends are rightly looking for financial assistance outside their limits. All the meetings of the Five Year Group are active in the enterprise. Philadelphia, lacking this affiliation, has at the same time a sentimental interest in the work due to the fact that our own William Savery, in 1793, held, in the sail-loft of the King's ship-builder, what he thought was "doubtless the first meeting of our Society at Detroit."

He was then on great adventure, in the service of his Master. The fort and trading post of that time is now the fourth city of the country. Some of us who have seen it believe it needs the Quaker message. If there are others among us that care to contribute toward the new meeting-house, the undersigned will be glad to receive and forward contributions of any size.

We can assure Philadelphia Friends that their gifts will be appreciated by Detroit Monthly Meeting.

A Far-flung Corner of the British Empire.

William C. Allen.

In the distant seas, close by the Antarctic, south of Australia, lies the island of Tasmania. It has the form of a shield. The southern end of it projects, a rocky wedge, out into the tossing waters of the Southern Ocean. Its coasts are stern and rock-bound. Against them beat the thundering rollers with the momentum acquired from a long journey out of the southwest. Tasmania is nearly half the size of Pennsylvania. Its population is about 210,000.

The voyage from Melbourne, Australia, to Launceston, Tasmania, is an uncertain, often disagreeable trip. At its commencement there sat upon the deck close beside us a calm-faced old lady busily knitting. For the second time in her life she had been away from her native land visiting her children in Australia. She loved them much, but Tasmania more. She said, "They want me to go to Australia to live, but I tell them I like Tassie—Tassie is cooler!" In truth "Tassie" is cool all times of the fickle year. I did not enjoy its ever-changing weather. Yet it is a delightful country, where simplicity and quietude reign. It is far removed from the hub-bub and thrills of a sadly upset world. It hardly understands its own self-contained poise, its material felicity.

Hobart is the capital of Tasmania. It boasts about 50,000 people. It nestles close by the beautiful Derwent River, out into which extend docks alongside of which are sixty feet of water at low tide. Just behind the city towers Wellington Mountain, over 4,000 feet above the sea. In its environs are small and pretty homes, embedded in the gayest shrubbery and bloom. Hedges, walls, flowers remind us of the sea-girt mother-land on the other side of the globe. The streets are of the sort found in cities of the same size in the British Empire. The House of Parliament—for this little, far-away country has its own very weighty legislature—is close by the water front. The Town Hall is a pleasing sample of municipal architecture. There is a museum and art gallery, a botanic garden and a big park. The post office boasts a chime—you shut your eyes, and listen, and imagine yourself in England!

The City Railway Service is excellent, considering the small constituency it serves. Some of the tram-cars are double-deckers, à la ancient London Town. You pay from one penny up, according to the distance you ride. You are given a ticket as receipt for the money you pay to the conductor. The reverse of the ticket has printed upon it instructions so that unsophisticated visitors from larger cities will know how to behave when visiting the Tasmanian metropolis. These instructions read:—

PLEASE

Have correct fare ready, it saves time.
Tell the Conductor where you want to get off.
Move along and make room for others.
Do not stand on top of stairway.
Wait till the car stops before alighting.
Do not leave your ticket on the car, but tear it up as you get off.

Convicts from England were sent to this remote corner of the world as late as the year 1853. The treatment they received was bad and calculated to harden them. Many escaped and fled to the bush and their atrocious deeds of revenge constitute a bitter story. In a museum are relics of those early days, heavy irons and chains, instruments of woe. The original offences were often very light in proportion to the cruel punishment. Among other papers on exhibition is the "Transportation Order" of James Townsend, dated "January 3, 1840." It recites that he was transported for stealing "Four yards of printed cotton of the value of two shillings of the goods and chattels of one John Burke," and was sent across the seas "for the term of seven years."

The streets of a little city that has bravely platted herself at the end of things are not thronged. Hobart's street traffic does not demand dodging of vehicles. But the methods of much larger communities are carefully observed. There are at least two traffic policemen in Hobart. It is an inspiring spectacle to see one of these guardians of the public standing at the middle of the intersection of Elizabeth and Liverpool Streets—the business centre—solemnly attending to his duties. His eagle eye will detect a boy on a bicycle coming his way and with impressive gesture the youngster is signalled that all is well and ventures towards the corner. Again there will appear a horse and cart, ploughing their heavy way in another direction and, although the likelihood of a collision is remarkably remote, the driver is invited forward with all the dignity and crooked fingers of a Bobby in the crowded streets of London. But when a motor-car quietly meanders down the highway—ah, then the Hobart traffic officer gets very, very busy!

The people of Tasmania are rightly proud of their beautiful little country. The Island has two lovely rivers, the Tamar in the north and the Derwent in the south, both richly endowed with pretty bays and tree-edged waters with back-grounds of verdant hillsides and misty mountains. During the height of the summer season, near the first of the year, tourists come over from Australia, provided strikes do not interfere with their anticipated vacations.

Strikes are the proper thing in Tasmania, the Labor Unions are very strong. It would seem as if labor is so fully unionized that ordinary people, who constitute the vast majority, have small rights to be respected. Thus in the hotels the hours for meals are so adjusted that there is little elasticity of time afforded to the guests. This is often exceedingly inconvenient. "Eat within the hours or go without your food," seem to be the terms laid down by Unionism, to those who cannot always accommodate their activities to Union hours. In Tasmania we were upon one occasion, with many gestures and agonized countenances and voices, "shooed" out of the dining-room of the hotel by the proprietor and his porter because we had ventured into it three minutes before the hour for dinner. No doubt labor trouble was invited by our indiscretion and we were compelled—as often was the case—to be satisfied with a hurried nibble and run to our engagement, whereas if the Union hours had permitted us to commence even fifteen minutes earlier we could have secured the semblance of a meal.

The toy railway system of Tasmania is very interesting. It comprises 650 miles. It is narrow gauged and wriggles and twists round the rugged countryside from one level to another. The miniature engines, when starting or plunging into tunnels, squeal and squeak as do their mightier cousins in England. The carriages did not seem comfortable with their straight-up seats and chilly, draughty compartments. When wedged between portly citizens and jammed among interminable masses of hand-bags and boxes you can only patiently abide the ordeal until reaching your destination. The railways are State-owned. The officials are well remunerated. The employees, according to the official report, are paid per day as follows:—engine drivers, 16 to 19 shillings; guards, 15 to 17 shillings and 6 pence; firemen, 14 shillings and 6 pence to 16 shillings; carpenters, 16 to 17 shillings, mostly the former; repairs, 13 shillings and 6 pence; clerks, 14 to 16 shillings. From the above it will be seen that wages are generally less than in America, whilst in America the cost of living is lower than in Tasmania.

Kind Friends—the Mays—invited us to spend four days on their farm, a few miles out of Hobart. There three brothers farm 700 acres of broad fields and fruitful orchards, mingled with woodland, rocks and beach, close by the salty sea. Their homes are set in the midst of many flowers and strange trees. It cannot be claimed that in all respects they and their families are typical of farm life. One brother specializes in the fauna and flora of distant lands, he is an artist and has won a prize for work in oil, his walls have been lovingly decorated and hung with the delightful work of his gifted hands. Not only is a regulation greenhouse attached to the dwelling, but a larger one is not far away. It is filled with greenery of many kinds, including fine tree-ferns 12 to 15 feet high. The other brother is equally gifted. One of his fads is shells. He is reputed to be the second authority in conchology in his part of the world and his large collection includes over 1,000 selections of Tasmanian shells. These brothers keep up the detail of their farming in a thoroughly business-like fashion. Their families were a joy. Daily a period of simple family devotion is practiced in the good old way that has helped to develop the material progress and spiritual achievement in the countries where Christ is named and honored.

Tasmania is a small community, remote from the rest of the world. It is made up of a generous-hearted people who know little regarding the actual facts associated with the outside world. Yet there are two good newspapers in Hobart. The last week I was in the city I was able to perform a little service on behalf of internationalism. In connection there with a meeting with preachers was held, there was a good attendance, much interest and sympathy were manifested and it was decided to send a message of fraternal greeting to the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America. An organization of leading business men, the Commonwealth Club, invited me to luncheon with the object of addressing them. The leading local newspaper, The Mercury, was so good as to materially assist. So in this little corner of the English-speaking world there was opportunity—as there ever is—to speak for humanity and Christ.

A WORD OF CHEER.

"He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the Churches."

A correct spiritual attitude toward the outreaching mercies of the Author of all good has ever been the way of blessing open to all the followers of the Lord Jesus—our Holy Head. Thus the "Language of the Spirit" came to those of the infant Churches "that had ears." The first recorded lesson of the crucified and risen Saviour was given to two of His disciples, who in all their love and allegiance to Him and in reading the Scriptures had failed to see in the Messiah before them more than an outward deliverer from their cruel enemies.

Their saddened hearts were burning within them as He walked and talked with them and opened unto them the written word—"Oh! fools and slow of heart to believe all that the Prophets have spoken, ought not Christ to have suffered and to have entered into His glory, and beginning at Moses and all the Prophets He expounded in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself," thus making plain the startling fact that there is an attitude of mind, a condition of heart, which makes possible a failure to see in the Christ who walked among men the fulfilling of the Divine Plan, as expressed in the Scriptures.

Do we not find in the out-reaching love of our Glorified Head, as revealed to the Seven Churches, a gracious purpose to reach those who have ears, and even in our own day do we not recognize a spiritual message coming to us in various ways and appealing to those who have ears?

There is dawning upon the militant church new light, and love, and a new day is approaching. Our own little part of this great body of Christian believers must profoundly acknowledge our failure to measure up to the high standard given us to bear, and in confusion of face and in all unworthiness must wait for the further revelations, which will come as we are able to bear them.

These messages have come in various ways. A message of this nature has reached us from the war and famine-stricken zones of far away lands, we see the smiling faces of dear ones offering themselves, their little all, and receiving within themselves the smile of approving love from Him whom they are endeavoring to serve. We have heard the voice of prayer and praise from the quickened and awakened hearts of our children, and rejoice with them; again there comes at this time the sweet memory of the language of our Book of Discipline which has taken such strong hold of our hearts of recent times as the language of the Spirit to us—"Do you uphold and cherish a waiting spiritual worship and a Gospel ministry exercised at the call and appointment of the Holy Spirit?"

We recognize these few words as embracing a far-reaching fundamental way of life which many under our name and other names are finding precious to themselves. A word of confidence and hope comes from the Conference for All Friends held in London, and living epistles have crossed and re-crossed the great waters, leaving behind them a feeling of growing oneness, and an increase of that love that many waters may not quench.

May we hope and trust that this voice is the language of the Spirit to the churches, and may it find us with ears that are not dull of hearing, and with hearts burning with a new revelation which will bring forth much fruit to the praise of our Heavenly Father. Yet we need to be reminded that the messages of ancient days to the Churches were coupled with warnings, and while we of our day are so much rejoiced in the "Open Doors" and the "Lengthening of Chords," let us not forget the "Strengthening of our Stakes."

What has come to us from the past remains as our heritage, a priceless treasure fresh from the Living Fountain, and He who in His wisdom consecrated us "a garden enclosed" will one day call for a reckoning as to the use we have made of the talents committed to our care. While we are thus musing, let us ask for a more real loyalty to the spiritual messages that have come from the past and let us not contravene the Light and the Life as they come from the same Living Fountain.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THIRTEEN MOTHERS.

MARGARET T. APPLEGARTH.

So in the course of time they named her "Finis." Henryk was the family scholar, and he said that at the end of all really important books you found the word "Finis." It was dreadfully American!

"But what does it mean?" asked Ignacy anxiously. For it was all very well for Henryk, to spring a scholarly name on the baby, but Henryk was the least motherly of all the thirteen mothers: he would think that anything out of a book would fine for a baby—just anything would not be fine! "Appendix," for instance. That was in all important books, too, but when Henryk suggested it, Ignacy made a few inquiries and discovered that it might be all right in books, but the minute it got into a person you had to rush them to the hospital in ambulances to have it cut out! So if Finis was going to be any such dangerous name as that—

It was not. It was entirely safe and appropriate. "It just means 'That's-all-for-now' or 'No more to this book' or 'This is the end,'" explained Henryk, "and she's the end of our family, ain't she?"

"Yah, I think that will be one very nice name for our bebee," said Ignacy, rocking our bebee in his arms contentedly, while Ursin cooked stew in a pot for supper.

So "Finis" the baby became, although since her thirteen mothers all pronounced it Fine-ice, you will probably prefer to call her that yourself.

It was a curious life that Finis led. There would be long and lonely hours at a stretch when not a single mother would be losing on hand—that was because Henryk was in school, Sigismund was apprenticed to the grocer, Jan was down in the coal mine leading the old blind donkey which drew the little coal cars, Josef was picking over coal in the "yards," Ursin was in a silk factory, Ignacy was doing odd jobs about town, for every Marchlewicz worked in one way or another. Then there would be other hours when Finis would have almost too much attention—mothers to right of her, mothers to left of her volleyed and thundered!

"Anybody seen the milk bottle of the bebee Fine-ice?"

Nobody had! But there would be a grand scramble of mothers looking under the bed, under the table, under the chairs, until after a breathless Hide-the-Thimble search, the bottle would be discovered under the stove, rolled way back out of sight.

"Just you make a good wash of it!" ordered Ignacy sternly.

But the twelve other mothers looked at him in disgust: "Aw Ignacy! Make a good wash on it—not. Ain't it been full mit milk?"

"Yah, und ain't it going to be full mit more milk?"

"Und ain't milk water? It don't need no more washes on it, Ignacy!"

"It's a awful nice bottles now, Ignacy, a real nice clean bottles!"

But Ignacy knew. His big eyes grew dreamy: "Mudder, she always made a special big clean washings of bottles for beebes. You got to handle gentle mit beebes—they ain't so tough. They could to die awful easy! They could to get appendices in their stummicks! They could to yell all night, mit a whole bunch of neighbor-womens walking into the house und bossing us mit big voices! You like? No? Vell, that's why you should to make that clean wash—see?"

Oh yes, it was suddenly as plain as day—those officious neighbor-womens mustn't get their noses inside that door! Every mother dashed instantly to the sink, Sigismund screaming: "Me first! Lemme make that wash!"

And all this time Finis lay on her back while her poor face looked bleak and hungry and puzzled: What was going on? These roaring voices!

COMMUNITY MEETINGS AT MIDDLETOWN.

About two years ago there was an opportunity given for the beginning of a series of Meetings for Divine Worship in the Township of Middletown, Delaware County, Penna.

Since that time meetings are held about once a month in the various places of worship of our scattered country community. For the present the Methodist Church at Lima, the Presbyterian Church at Elwyn, the Methodist Church at Gradyville and the Meeting House of the Orthodox Friends at Middletown share in extending their hospitality to each other. Sometimes we also go to the Meeting House of our Friends affiliated with Fifteenth and Race Streets.

When our friends of the Churches come to our place of worship we hold meetings after the manner of Friends, although usually some one reads a short Psalm as an opening. Silence and strong spiritual exercise have been granted us and our guests as impressive means of teaching on such occasions.

When we go to the Churches to join hands with their efforts to establish the Kingdom of God in our community we feel free to join in their joy of singing, and in the exercise of gifts laid upon us when opportunity is given in the well adapted program.

During the two years of this pleasant comradeship we have been all learning to love each other better, to understand and appreciate our neighbors, to share their joys and cares, and to draw near to everyone in the community as a friend.

Some of us have classes at the Methodist Bible School, some of our children attend this as well as our own First-day School afterwards, and some of us went to help dig the foundation for the new parsonage at Lima. Yet such is only the beginning of a life of better fellowship and Christian harmony which will we hope grow better as the months pass.

Some reader may remark with anxiety that our meeting is losing its identity, that we are doing all the giving of effort. "Come and see" if we are. "Give and it shall be given unto you, good measure, pressed down and running over, shall men give unto your bosom."

The personal touch, the opportunity to help, the chances of leavening and passing along the Gospel of Jesus Christ among us, all difficult before, are now being done easily, and received and responded to with a broadening of view, and a sympathy which binds up the whole community more and more into that of a Christian neighborhood. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, has come to live with us.

I apologize for signing my personal name to this, but the editor requires it. The experience belongs to all of us and I serve merely as reporter.

JOHN PIM CARTER.

THE SPIRITUAL WARFARE.

"The helmet of Salvation" is the final piece of this protective armor. Without a clear assurance of salvation the soldier is poorly equipped for battle. Again the dependence is upon Christ, "for there is no other name, . . . whereby we can be saved."

Finally, we need one offensive weapon—"the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." We are back again to the Truth, "to the Law and to the testimony," for there can be no attacking of the spiritual hosts of wickedness, the routing of sin and doubt, without using the revealed facts and promises of God as contained in the Holy Scriptures. We do well to profit by the experience of our Lord Himself who met the temptations of Satan with an accurate quotation of "It is written." To meet the hatred in men's hearts, the mistrust, the doubt, the bitterness, sorrow and despair, we are to be equipped with the "exceeding great and precious promises" which God's Holy Spirit can use to bring peace and joy. "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest;" and "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out," are invitations to any man who is yet outside the Kingdom.

This winning of others one by one, is what Christ told His disciples he expected them to do. "Henceforth," He said, "ye shall catch men."

And how is it done? "Very simply, just by testimony and prayer. Be willing to "tell what great things the Lord hath done for thee." Personal testimony about Jesus Christ, the Risen Saviour of the world, is what shook the Roman Empire in the first century. This is the way individuals are brought to respond to the upward pull of God's love. A personal recommendation of Jesus Christ is the most potent influence towards bringing others into His Kingdom. Religious, that is, Christian education will help, but not unless it is more than ethical, it must be made personal. It must be related to our accountability to God and concerning our loyalty to the Person of Christ. Philosophy teaches truly, "there is no power apart from personality." So testimony just to spiritual forces alone bears no fruit for the Kingdom, unless with the unction and leading of the Holy Spirit and His revealing of the things of Christ. (See John xvi: 13-15.) If we truly believe in Him, we shall not be ashamed to confess Him openly before men.

Secondly, definite, persistent, faithful prayer for ourselves and for others will bear fruit for the Kingdom. Much of our wrestling in this warfare must be done in secret prayer. To get back of the causes of strife and war we must get men's ideas about God changed and their ideals among men changed. Often prayer is the only thing that can change men's minds,—the releasing of God's power to this end. This is what Christ called "bearing fruit,"—that is reproducing according to kind. This is the Christian's chief responsibility,—to multiply in terms of living, loving and active faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. This is His test of true discipleship. This is His commission for a Spiritual Warfare in days of peace. For, said He, "If ye abide in Me and My words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will and it shall be done unto you. Herein is My Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit, so shall ye be My disciples."

We believe this outreach must be towards all men of all nations. "God is no respecter of persons." He has given to all men a seed, a God consciousness, within him, which may spring into life and saving faith. When they have "put on the new man," "there is neither Greek nor Jew, . . . bond or free; but Christ is all, and in all." (See Col. iii:10-11). "For He is our peace who hath broken down the middle wall of partition." (Eph. ii:14.) All barriers between men are obliterated when the love of Christ enters into their relationships.

This warfare of aggressive love is not only towards all men, but it is a duty for all men who consciously belong to Christ, and have enlisted under His banner. There are differing gifts which we recognize, but the aim and purpose of their exercise must be the same. Those who are "out of Christ,"—outside His Kingdom, must be brought in. Just to educate men, or make them more moral, may fall far short of bringing them into "the body of Christ," into vital abiding life in Him. Welfare work for men is good, but "the good is often the enemy of the best." Paul was given this truth long ago when he said, concerning Christ, and His purpose in using men, "And He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, unto the work of ministering, unto the building up of the body of Christ: till we all attain unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God." (Ephesians iv: 11-13a, A. R. V.)

What more glorious or more abiding work can one engage in, than this spiritual warfare;—this building for eternity. "To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin," and "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them."

FRIENDS IN THE RUHR.

The occupation of the Ruhr by the French army brought on an international crisis in which it was natural that the Friends, having worked in both France and Germany, should feel the deepest concern.

When the Friends' Mission withdrew from Germany last summer, the child-feeding work was turned over to the Deutscher Zentralausschuss, a national organization for welfare work in Germany. This organization during recent months has been feeding about 600,000 children in all of Germany.

With the coming of the French army, both the Central Committee and the Deutscher Zentralausschuss, fearing an interruption of the feeding program, appealed to Friends to again take supervision of the child-feeding work, at least in the Ruhr Valley. They felt the need of a disinterested neutral agency which would have the good-will of both Germany and France, and which could seek to serve both in a spirit of reconciliation.

As a result of this appeal, the American Friends' Service Committee appointed J. Henry Scattergood, of Philadelphia, Pa., formerly a member of the Mission in France, and Homer L. Morris, of Earlham College, Indiana, a former member of the Missions in Germany and Russia, as commissioners to investigate the situation in the Ruhr with a view to determine whether Friends should undertake supervision of the child-feeding there. These two Friends have visited the Ruhr and have now reported their conclusions to the Service Committee. J. H. S. under date of Third Month 30th has written:—

"We are delighted to find that in the Ruhr district, the committee and organization left by the Friends when the work was turned over last summer have been functioning splendidly. Also that so far the French have not interfered with any food supplies for children or adults. It seems clear, therefore, that we should not at present undertake direct charge of the feeding as a Quaker organization.

"We want it most strongly realized that this conclusion is not because Germany does not need help, for we certainly believe that she does under the present economic conditions. But it is because we find the German organization amply able to continue the child-feeding task in the Ruhr without any change unless the French policy as to not interfering or taxing food supplies should be changed. And this we do not think at all likely. We think Homer Morris should stand by for two months to be ready for any emergency. We hope you will take pains to inform personally the Central Committee, urging them to press their appeal for the foreign aid which Germany so much still needs, and all the more now because of the Ruhr, for both the Ruhr and the rest of Germany."

"English Friends are helping to visit and alleviate the difficulties of the German officials who have been imprisoned by the French. There have been about 1,000 such cases to date, besides banishments from their homes (several hundred police). At first this banishment also included families, but through Edith Pye's plea for three mothers with new-born babies, this order was modified. At Düsseldorf T. Edmund Harvey was allowed to visit the 133 families (mostly high officials) and take them books to read. He also got them classed as political prisoners instead of criminals and this brought permission for more exercise, food from outside and their families to know where they are. They plan to go to all the other similar prisons.

"Edith Pye has already done some of this and T. Edmund Harvey has come out again to go on with it. It is real Christian work. Edith Pye has also collected data on sundry civil maltreatment cases by the French that have stirred her tremendously."

J. H. S. writes as follows of his general impressions of the Ruhr situation, and of the new Germany as personified in the Youth Movement:—

"We have been intensely interested in the Ruhr situation and are full of details as to the way the French act and the Germans exercise their marvelous passive resistance. I cannot go into details now, but after five days' going about, I am of the opinion that it is a question of credits and nerves. The French have surrounded the whole Rhineland and Ruhr and have attempted to impose a 10 per cent. tax on all German goods coming in or going out over this artificial frontier. This applies to imports of raw material such as iron ore, etc., but not to food, except wines. The Germans naturally refuse to recognize the legality of the occupation (claiming the Treaty is being broken and many besides Germans think so, too) and they will not pay the 10 per cent. tax. Hence the starving out process in all economic life.

"The French appear to think they can outlast the Germans, but if they do, my guess is their red ink figures on their books will be so large as to stir the French rentier (householder class) as to his taxes and result in a change of policy at Paris. Meanwhile the German manufacturers will have to live on credits until they can again ship their products. It is amazing how they manage to keep going. The French occupation has brought a new unity to Germany.

"The passive resistance is wonderful to see in operation and is of course a great experiment in the world's history and one that all anti-militarists everywhere should pray may succeed. If against the best organized army in the world, passive resistance can make futile the military occupation and force a conference over a table, it will be the greatest possible argument and demonstration against the military system. How strange are the fates of history that Germany, so recently the greatest military nation, should be the one first to put this great experiment to trial. The issue is clearly understood here by everyone, and, as I say, the unity and determination is remarkable. It is a great moral question with them.

"I have also been searching keenly for the alleged 'unwillingness to pay' that one hears of so much at home and in France. In the Ruhr where so much coal has been paid for reparation account, if anywhere, one should be able to find such unwillingness, if it is so general. But I have yet to find anyone from Karl Haniel (employing 100,000) down to the workmen's representative in Krupp's and the coal industry, who does not say that they want to get rid of the payments as soon as possible after knowing what they are finally fixed at within the bounds of possibility. Again, I search everywhere for the 'revenge' against France that makes the French feel so much fear for their security. I do not yet know of the rest of Germany, but here among the workers it is absolutely absent as yet; but no one knows what French aggression may make possible among the young. The present workers are equally against militarism whether French or German.

"I have also been profoundly interested in the Wandervogel or Youth Movement in Germany—an uprising against the old life military and social and a return to the great out-of-doors, nature, the old poets, away from the drinking cafes and out to nature, away from the old Government of this empire, Kaiser and army, to new free institutions; and from the old church allied to the old system and long made a prop for it, to a free and natural search for a personal God. One sees these young people in their groups, simply clothed, starting off or coming in from tramps, often singing or with guitar.

"At a conference last fall for absolute abstinence from alcohol, more than 2,000,000 of them were represented. One feels the new life of realities stirring and one is thrilled to think that literally millions of young people are in it. There are no 'leaders' because they feel that 'before the war and during the war there were leaders enough, now they want freedom, so one of them explained it to me. Yes, the chastening and suffering of this nation will bear spiritual fruit, and out of the new Germany, if it is permitted to develop, will come new contributions."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

ELWOOD C. PERISHO, now of Guilford College, N. C., will deliver the commencement address at Friendsville Academy, Tennessee, on Fifth Month 11th. Dr. Perisho is an actively interested Friend of the Academy.

Two families were received into membership at the Detroit Monthly Meeting in Fourth Month—one by certificate of removal from the limits of Indiana Yearly Meeting and the other from a Presbyterian Church in Kalamazoo, Mich. The addition of these names gives the Detroit Meeting a total membership of one hundred and twenty-four. Other additions are in prospect.

SENIORS at Haverford College, active in literary work, organized recently an honorary Journalistic and Literary Society, under the name of the Pi Society of Haverford College. John R. Hoopes, of West Chester, Pa., formerly Editor-in-Chief of the Haverford News, was elected President. Other officers are J. F. Reich, of Morrisville, New Jersey, Editor of the Haverfordian, and Howard Comfort, of Haverford, Pa., both members of the Junior Class.

The project is enthusiastically supported by the Alumni, many of whom were present.

The British Weekly, edited by Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, and one of the chief of the general religious papers in England, although of recent years it has not been marked by sympathy for Quaker matters, nevertheless devotes its leading article in its issue of Second Month 15th to the new edition of John Woolman's Journal and Essays, edited by Amelia Gummere (Macmillan).

They refer to it appreciatively, and say: "It will find a place of honor on the 'Saints' shelves' in many a private library of Great Britain and the United States."

"We have been impressed, while re-reading the Journal in this new and attractive form, with points of contact between John Woolman and Saint Teresa," says the writer of the review. "In their early religious experience, communion with the unseen, and restless search for souls, they received the same gifts from the Lord of the household. . . . The Quaker diarist and St. Teresa were alike in their early vision of the living waters. . . . John Woolman and St. Teresa were in communion with the unseen. . . . Each was athirst with love for souls, each took long and arduous journeys in such missionary effort as their place and means allowed."

The Graphic, the famous British weekly illustrated paper, gives a delightful full page portrait of our Friend, Dr. J. Rendel Harris, in its issue Third Month 3rd.

At the meeting of the Executive Board of the F. F. M. A. of Philadelphia, it was decided that Gilbert and Minnie P. Bowles' furlough is to begin the coming summer. Rosamond Clark, who has been secretary to Gilbert Bowles, also returns this year, and George Burnham Braithwaite, son of George Braithwaite of the Japan Book and Tract Association, is to take up this work. Born in Japan he has recently returned from England. He abandons much more lucrative commercial work in order to work with the Mission. There is a prospect that Sarah Ellis, a former missionary, will also return to the Mission. She has been caring for her parents, who have recently died. Extensive building operations are being completed which will make much more efficient the work of the whole Mission. Money has been sent for the building of a new home for the Binford's, but so far it has been impossible to buy land in Shimotsuma. It is proposed to build on leased land. It is interesting to note that the various stations in Japan have a total list of members and inquirers numbering six hundred, as well as an average First-day School attendance of four hundred and ninety-eight. They have collected for meeting purposes Yen 1510 during the year.—Exchange.

TONES IN PREACHING.—In the "Life of H. W. Longfellow," 1886, ii. 304, we read:—

"1857. August 17. Went to hear a Quakeress from England, Priscilla Green, speak in the church. She spoke with a sweet voice and very clear enunciation; very deliberately and breaking now and then into a rhythmic chant, in which the voice seemed floating up and down on wings. I was much interested and could have listened an hour longer. It was a great pleasure to me to hear such a musical voice."

[It has been said that in "The Courtship of Miles Standish," upon which Longfellow was engaged in 1858, "Priscilla, the Puritan Maiden," was so named after Priscilla Green.]

Was Samuel Cunard, the late Chairman of the Cunard Shipping Company, a Friend?

In The Field (London), Fifth Month 15, 1915, we are told that "Samuel Cunard, a Quaker from Halifax, Nova Scotia, was the originator of steam postal communication between America and Great Britain. . . . The first departure under the mail contract was the Britannia, which sailed from England on Seventh Month 4, 1840." The "Dictionary of National Biography" states that Samuel Cunard (1787-1865) was the son of Abraham C., a merchant of Philadelphia, whose wife was a daughter of Thomas Murphy, and that he was probably born in Nova Scotia, but there is no mention of Quaker connection. He married in Second Month, 1815, Susan, daughter of Wm. Duffus, of Halifax, Nova Scotia.

N. P.

THOMAS A. JENKINS, of Chicago, describes a visit to the workshop of Albert Cook Myers in the building of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. He comments on the vast amount of material that the editor has brought together and calls upon interested people to rally to the support of the undertaking. He hopes that the editor may have the work ready for publication by 1926, the sesqui-centennial anniversary of American Independence.

ENGLISH FRIENDS have for years had under serious consideration the disposal of the Bishopsgate Street property. The arguments for and against the sale find their counterpart in the question that has vexed Philadelphia Friends for years in regard to the property on South Twelfth Street. An Exchange states that the Devonshire House property, the headquarters of the Society of Friends in Great Britain, is now definitely and publicly offered for sale, with a date given for its offer by auction, "unless previously disposed of." The site is described, not unfairly we think, as "one of the finest in the City of London;" for, with its total frontage of about 270 feet on two important thoroughfares and an area of about 30,000 square feet, it is centrally situated, and close to the termini of three railways.

THE statement below cannot but make many who have passed the college student period wish that in this particular instance time's pendulum might swing back.

Students at Earlham College, Indiana, will take courses in geology and biology this summer, under the heads of the two departments, in the Yellowstone National Park.

THE following is a significant expression made by a dear

English Friend recently with us on Gospel service. Some one writes:—

As we passed the Metropolitan Museum of Art the other evening, he expressed a wish to sight-see there, and was beginning to jot down directions, when he slowly closed his note-book and sliding it back into his pocket, exclaimed with quick decision, "No, I haven't time to spend there. If I spend it there I cannot be with people, and I came to America to see people, not things."

UNIQUE among monuments is the granite boulder erected to a tree, near which it stands, in a field in Madison County, Iowa. It is suitably inscribed and was dedicated last Eighth Month to the parent Delicious apple tree which is still bearing apples at the age of fifty years. Its offspring in trees, known and grown in every apple producing quarter of the globe, number 7,500,000, which, it is estimated, bring an annual crop valued at $12,000,000. The origin of this interesting and useful tree, the romantic history of which is said to have no precedent, was in the orchard of Jesse Hiatt, a Quaker farmer, who, in the fifties, had left his Indiana home and settled near Peru, Iowa. He was an apple specialist who loved the tree and its fruit with the love of one who knew their secrets. Finding that one of his Belleflower seedlings had died but that from its root had sprung a tiny shoot, he simply resolved to give that sprout a chance in the world. Patiently he watched its growth until, years later, he was rewarded with its excellent fruit. He named it the Hawk-eye in honor of his adopted State, but later it was called the Delicious by the grower who contracted for the scions and distributed the trees over the globe.

"THE CARPENTER AND HIS KINGDOM," by Alexander Irvine, a recent member of New York Meeting, has just been published by Charles Scribner's Sons. According to Roger W. Babson, "The book is very timely, and should be read by every one interested in the great industrial problems which this nation soon must face."

ALAN C. VALENTINE, the Rhodes Scholar from Swarthmore College at Oxford, in a letter about his new experiences, written to a member of the College Board, speaks of the value of "the right kind of tradition," which he finds at Oxford. He says: "There are no locks on the doors at Balliol, not because there is any student government to protect against thieving, but simply because no one seems to consider the possibility of thieives. The locker-room man tells me that although every 'gym' locker has a lock and key, he has never heard of their being used, and anyone who locked his locker would be committing a social blunder. There is no rough-house, or broken furniture (so far as I have seen yet)—not because it would not be possible, and not because the men are not 'red-blooded,' but simply because they would consider it childish as a general thing."

NOTICES.

Is Your Home Truly Modern?

Owners of houses built a decade or more ago often find bath-room facilities altogether too inadequate for modern requirements.

The problem in such homes is how to expand Sanitary Equipment in the present structures; to secure the comfort and convenience of additional bath-rooms without rebuilding.

You will find much practical help in a Pamphlet we can send showing how such plans may be carried out at an economical outlay.

COULD THIS THING BE!

The wide-eyed gravity some children wear
Has more of dignity than purple robes;
Their unabashed, clear gaze has all the air
Of superhuman knowledge, as it probes
Our vaulted depths; that luminous regard
Veils mighty secrets they are fain to tell,—
Deep hints that on the ruby threshold barred
Remain forever undivulgable.
O could but one of these adventurers,
So lately poised midway of Heaven and earth,
Master our speech before remembrance blurs
And he forgets the truths he knew at birth!
How hungrily we'd listen, could this thing be:
And yet, it happened once—near Galilee!

—JOHN T. TROTH.

THE TRUTH THAT SETS US FREE.

"Ye shall know the Truth and the Truth shall make you free, for if the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." Christianity claims to be that Truth. When our Lord bore His "good confession before Pontius Pilate," He declared His Kingship to consist not in a political and material domination, but in His absoluteness in the realm of Truth. In fact He announced Himself, to be "The Truth" itself. The eternal Verities were livingly told out in Him.

Now it stands to reason that the Truth is its own witness and authentication—as the sun is seen by its own light. And that there can be no truth at variance with Truth. So that in the Incarnate Son of God we have the complete and final revelation. He will never be superseded. "God has spoken in His Son." And that Divine speech in the terms of Personality has constituted our dispensation: "these last days." There will be no dispensation beyond and above the present, as if the Truth had not been fully declared. The veil that hid the Truth is rent, and remains rent forever.

It is an unspeakable relief to know this. It is the secret of rest amidst the hubbub of voices and clashing creeds. Certainty is not found in the decisions of an erring church, or in the moods and emotions and phases of our soul life. It is in the One who could say: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall never pass away."

(1) In Christ we have the truth about God. We learn from Him to call Him Father. We see His glory in His pure countenance. And the Truth does set us free from slavish fear and hard thoughts of God. We learn to trust Him as Jesus trusted Him in the darkness of the cross. We anchor in His love and rest in His sufficiency. God is accepted as the pure, the lovable, the unspeakably glorious Being, the personality of Jesus has made visible.

(2) We obtain the truth about man. We see Divine glory in the humblest human being and immense potentialities in the wreckage of humanity. We are set free from cynicism and pessimism regarding man when we know the truth about him. "Henceforth know we no man after the flesh." We regard every man as a spiritual being, the roots of whose true life are to be sought in the unseen and eternal. And as we regard ourselves and others in this light, we shall neither cringe before others who seem to be above us, nor despise them, if they appear to be beneath. We look deeper than color, race, rank and circumstance.

(3) We learn the truth about sin. And to know the truth does set us free from its witchery. Temptation dangles the apples of Sodom before the eye, but the truth declares that they will turn to ashes between the teeth. No one would enter into temptation if he had in living memory the truth about sin; that sin is a deceiver and a mocker; and that the brackish streams of earth cannot slake the thirst of the soul.

(4) Finally we learn the truth about death. Can we still fear death when we know the truth about it? It is our heavenly Father's servant to open the door into His immediate presence. Till Christ "brought life and immortality to light" by His death and resurrection, men were all their lifetime through fear of death subject to bondage. The Beyond seemed so hazy and unreal. But the Truth has come, and what a difference it makes! Death in the light of the Truth is not a terminus but a station, and, through Christ, a step forward and a step upward. "For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain."

The apostles carried the Truth into their world. It was bleeding from a thousand wounds for which the ancient philosophies and cults had no healing balm. Even Judaism with its noble ethics and its lofty religious conceptions proved insufficient. But the Truth, incarnated in Jesus Christ, ushered in a better day. And if the world is sick and sad once more, has the ancient Truth lost its potency? Is Jesus Christ a spent force? Lo, the nations are sitting like the blind beggar at the roadside, waiting, waiting! Shall they not hear the cry: "Jesus of Nazareth is passing by?"

A Sermon.

"For He is our peace who hath made both one and hath broken down the middle wall of partition."

[On Ninth Month 24th last, T. Edmund Harvey, then in this country, having but recently returned to Philadelphia from attendance at the Five Years' Meeting at Richmond, Indiana, and the Ohio Yearly Meeting, held near Barnesville, was visiting in Moorestown, N. J. On First-day morning he expressed the hope that the two meetings that assembled in the same enclosure and at the same hour should gather that day in the one house. His wish was acceded to and at 10.30 the two congregations met in the larger of the two houses. T. E. H. spoke. One who was present, a proficient stenographer, has furnished us with a draft of his sermon. Feeling that it contains food for helpful reflection for the many who were not present, we reproduce it here, virtually word for word as delivered, and in justice to T. E. H., would add that he had no knowledge whatever that such a report was being made.—Eds.]

The house in which we stand, the shutters that sometimes separate one part from another, may be in a way a visible symbol of the growth of the realization of the ideal of Christian discipleship; as the spirit of the Master whom we are trying to serve comes more and more to control our lives, the middle wall of partition that separates fellow-disciples from each other will be taken away, will be broken down; and it will be done because of His presence in our lives, because of our being willing to obey his uniting spirit of love and sacrifice and service.

The bitterness that separated the Jew and the Greek when Paul wrote that letter is difficult for us now to picture; and great though it was, it was so taken away by that loving spirit of the Master that Paul was able to feel that there was no more division between Jew and Greek, between barbarian, Scythian, male and female, but all were united into one family; and as we look over the pages, the blotted, blurred pages of human history, we feel how sadly we who have called ourselves by that wonderful name of Christians, we who have called ourselves by the wonderful name of Friend, have failed to realize the all-embracing love that must come with true Christianity—the all-embracing spirit of fellowship and service that must come if we try to realize all that there is in the word Friend, especially when we think of those words of Christ Himself to His dearest followers on the night before He left them: "I have called you friends." In so far as the Christian church has failed, it has been surely because people who called themselves Christians have failed to be the friends of Christ and the friends of their fellow-men; the two go together. The middle wall of partition that rises up, not only between fellow-Christians, but right through life, making barriers between one class and another, dividing worker and employer, dividing labor and capital, dividing nation from nation, race from race,—this can only be taken away, surely, by a positive spirit, that is stronger than the spirit that separates: a spirit of love and of service, that is the outcome, the realization—of what is meant to be a member of the Divine family, made a member by the power, by the life, by the grace of the Master.

Long ago, even in the time of the apostles, men tried to make use of the name of the Lord Jesus as a magical device to conquer evil—to drive out wrong—to gain power; and they failed, as the church has failed ever since, when it took the name, and left the power and life. We remember how the Jewish exorcists in Ephesus tried to drive out an evil spirit—tried to heal the man possessed or mad, by the use of the name of the Lord, and how they said: "I adjure thee in the name of Jesus, whom Paul preacheth;" and the mere use of that name was of no avail whatever. The mere use of that holy and lovely name—the name that we feel to be above every name—the mere use of that when the spirit is far away, has failed, again and again. Some of the saddest pages of human history are surely the pages which tell how those that took that name on their lips betrayed it in their lives.

And yet, by a wonderful, Divine miracle, sometimes those who were not able, through the faithlessness of Christians, to take that holy name on their lips, have been touched in their lives by the power of the life of Christ so that, by the revelation of the spirit of God working quietly and silently, unperceived, in the heart of man, they have had a true vision of at least some portion of the infinite truth, and have been able to attain something of the life and the love of Christ, even though they did not know whose power it was that was helping them.

A hundred years ago this year they burnt on the seashore in Italy the mortal remains of the poet Shelley; and the Christian people of his day thought that they had said farewell to an atheist—a man utterly cast out from Christian and godly society. Even the kind-hearted Charles Lamb could make fun of that tragedy, the drowning of Shelley in the Mediterranean storm, and rejoice over the death of the "atheist poet," as he was called. He had been sent away from the university when only a boy of sixteen for writing a pamphlet on what he thought was the necessity of atheism; he had been driven away from Christianity, he had been driven away from accepting and realizing all that Christ was by the faithlessness of people who called themselves by the name of Christ—by the unreality of the religion of those who professed themselves to be Christians; and in his hate he said: "If this is religion—this clearly hypocritical thing which does not keep man from selfishness and vice and separates men from one another—I can have nothing of this." He turned away from this caricature of Christianity that men had made; he tried to seek some better way; he appealed to men to look forward to a better state of society, in which force should no longer rule—in which light and reason and love should reign; he appealed to them to come to it not by the way of force, but by the way of truth and faithfulness and suffering; and he wrote a wonderful poem to embody some of his thoughts: "Prometheus Unbound"—in which he took the ancient Greek legend of the great Titan, Prometheus, who had surrendered his position of honor and privilege in order to come and bring the fire from heaven to help poor, struggling humanity; although the supreme god, Zeus, had forbidden that this should be done. Prometheus, touched with pity and love to poor struggling humanity in the darkness, had come, in spite of this power that forbade, at the risk of everything, to bring the Divine fire that cheered human life; and then he had been bound by the angry Zeus to the rock in the Caucasus forever to submit his heart and vitals to be gnawed by the avenging vultures of Zeus. In his poem Shelley finely commemorates the final triumph of this sufferer, who had courage to suffer for right over the power and force of an unjust law; and he sums up the teaching in some wonderful words in which he speaks of the way in which these spiritual forces must prevail, the suffering and love in themselves prevail, over all the powers that are set against them.

He pictures this figure suffering, going on suffering woes and ills that seem immeasurable—prepared to go on suffering forever for the sake of humanity and just enduring by the power of love. And in the end this spiritual power prevailed. He did not realize it; and yet, surely, in that poem, with the vision that came to him which he handed on to others, Shelley was handing on something of the very life and the message of Jesus, our Master, our Lord. He saw the vision of one suffering for others to an infinite extent and conquering through suffering over force—over what seemed like the law of the world—enduring to the end in spite of all. It was the very life of Christ, surely, the very spirit of the sacrifice of Christ revealing itself in the heart of this poet whom men thought of as an atheist, giving him a hope, and giving him power to hand on a message of hope to others. And yet one feels how tragical and sad it was that the noble, beautiful spirit of Shelley could only have this darkened vision, this broken vision of the wonderful hope that he might have received, if only the Christian folk of his day had been worthy of the name of Christians; if only he could have seen that it was not just the spirit of man rising up there against the unjust, the cruel and the harsh law of the world; but that it was God Himself, the very life beyond our lives, reaching after man, seeking, redeeming and revealing Himself, in some measure, in every human life—supremely and uniquely in that life and in that sacrifice: if he could only have felt that, what joy there would have run through his poetry, what hope and what faith would have inspired him there!

Then we think not merely of the wonderful broken vision that came to Shelley, in spite of the church's unfaithfulness, but of the marvelous vision that streams out for us still, through the lives however humble, however ill-equipped of all the disciples of the Lord who have followed in life and in truth His will. The life of Christ, the light of Christ, the power of His love, the power of His sacrifice, streams out still from the life of every true disciple; because all that is good in man comes from the one Divine source. Here in New Jersey we think—we cannot but think—of that wonderful life lived a century and a half ago in such simplicity and obscurity—in seeming failure so often—the life of John Woolman. We realize how what seemed like failure to his contemporaries, has been turning ever since to the most wonderful and most fruitful success. He did not live to see the triumph over slavery, even in his own Society, although he was able to see the great part of Friends converted to the belief that they must no longer hold slaves, if they would be faithful to the spirit of the Master.

But we see now how his life of service and unselfishness and love was a constant inspiration, not only to a number of his contemporaries, but to numberless other followers—the people who came after—to Garrison and Whittier and many another; and we see how he touched and affected in a thousand ways many different lives; and more and more, not only in this continent, but all over the old world, people are reading the writings of the simple New Jersey tailor and finding there illumination for the present duties of life—the best thought which we know of, for our poor, shattered world—from that life of vision lived in the power of the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Yet if we would follow Christ, we are to follow Him as the Way. It is a conception so big that we want to dwell on it continually—that Christ is the Way and that the society of followers is itself a way to Him. In the New Testament, before the word church was used by the disciples for their fellowship, there was an earlier word, and perhaps a more beautiful one, the word that we read of repeatedly in the Book of the Acts: "this way." The Christian disciples followed the way. It is a conception of Christian discipleship as one of constant growth, moving forward, never satisfied. It is also a conception implying that we are together going along the same way, the way of Christ, following the Master and guided by His spirit. And kept in the way by His power.

We are not all of us at the same point in the road. The way may seem different and even at the moment it may be different for different disciples at different stages of the way; and yet, if we are going along in the same way, our faces will all be turned in the same direction and we shall still be able to recognize our fellow-travelers; and if we belong to the one Christ, we shall want to help them, we must help them; for no man goes that way alone. Even in the Middle Ages, when men held exaggerated and distorted views of the meaning of Christian discipleship and sought to save their souls by separating themselves from the life of men, burying themselves in monasteries and convents and inflicting tortures on their bodies in the hope of purifying the soul—in spite of all the mistakes that those monastic Christians made there remained for them the thought that even in their cells the monks and the nuns must in their solitude pray for the world outside, for others as well as for themselves. And again and again those who were faithful to their Master did leave their life of solitary prayer to come out, to come back into the world in one way, or another to bring some message of help and of healing for struggling and suffering humanity in the name of Christ, and in His power. And if we are following the Master along His way, we cannot think of personal salvation only; we must think of the whole family, we must think of the world for whom He suffered, the world for which He died. We shall want to strive with His power and with His spirit to rebuild industrial relations, business life, the relations of workman and employer, until they are transformed by the touch of His spirit. We may only be able to do a little here and there in our lives; but we can let a little bit of His spirit in, surely, in spite of our failure, if we keep near Him. It will be a little bit of the way; it will be a little bit of advance towards the kingdom. We have to think of His spirit as calling upon us and urging us to leave no part of human life outside the sphere of redemption. He wants to see politics purified and ennobled, local administration purified and redeemed; He wants us, surely, to do our utmost as His disciples to bring national and international relationships more and more into harmony with the way that He has shown. It can only be as we live nearer to Him, as we try to think in His way, to have His thoughts—to read again and again the story of the life of lives and feel closer to us than our own thought that guiding presence—putting up the hands of our faith when the night is about us thick and dark and we can no longer see—putting up the hands of our faith there in the dark, with the simplest of prayers for His help, for His presence and His love. It can only be thus that we can have strength to go along His way—the way of the Master, the way of fellowship, the way of service, the way of sacrifice; and, as we go, surely, the further we go the more we shall feel the barriers falling that separate our lives from each other, the more we shall feel the strength of the background of His peace. "For He is our peace who hath made both one and hath broken down the middle wall of partition."

The Esther Fowler Orphanage.

CAIRO, Third Month 13, 1923.

DEAR FRIEND:—

I went this morning to visit the Fowler Orphanage. It is in the outskirts of Cairo in a good, substantial building originally built, I believe, for a hospital. Before they had rented buildings that were very poor. The lady who started the work is now too old to go on with it and it is in charge of Ella Barnes, who is a member of the United Presbyterian Mission here in Egypt. She seems to be carrying the work on in the same spirit of devotion as her predecessor did. She was very much pleased to see some one who had known Esther Fowler. I saw a copy of THE FRIEND on her table and when I asked her for some account of her work she gave me the enclosed, parts of which may be worth printing.

We are having most interesting experiences all along the way.

Very sincerely thy friend,

ELIZABETH B. JONES.

In our report last year, we mentioned the fact that we had started a little banking system of our own. It has proved to be a great help to the relatives as well as the girls. Their gifts, together with little sums which the older girls have earned in various ways, amount to about six pounds.

We have introduced the "Story Hour" into our work this year with very satisfactory results. We began during the summer by taking the girls up to the roof after sunset and having one of the teachers tell the story of "Pilgrim's Progress" in short sections. When that was finished, they begged for more stories. We are now taking the Life of Christ in the same way, and having each girl learn to tell each story as we go. This method worked so well with the girls that I decided to try it with the women who come in one morning each week. The majority of these women can not read. We have all been surprised and pleased at the way they have learned to tell the Bible stories. One of the most stupid women I have ever known has brightened up and not only takes part in the meetings, but is telling the stories to her children and neighbors. In addition to the thirteen Moslem girls in the Orphanage, we have estimated that about seventy-five Moslems have heard one or more of the Gospel stories this year through our teachers and women.

While Dr. Giffens was living in the flat at one end of the Orphanage building, they found that things were being stolen from their house. They decided to report the matter to the police. I felt troubled, lest the thief and his accomplices would lay the blame on our girls. Three of us prayed very earnestly that God would cause the thief to be caught in such a way as to prove his guilt beyond a doubt. The answer came in a strange way. A watch and chain disappeared from the Orphanage guest-room the very day that the police officer came to make inquiries, and the dishonest servant was caught with the stolen articles in his shoe.

Some months ago, we were needing some every-day dresses for the girls. Money was scarce and I never like to go into debt. We all prayed that God would send us the money to buy the material for the dresses. Days passed and no extra money came. Finally I took what little we could spare and went to the city. After inquiring in all the best shops, I came home with a heavy heart and only a few meters of goods. I couldn't find any material really worth making up, for less than seven or eight piasters a meter and we were needing at least two hundred meters. I said to the teachers and girls that we must pray and wait for God to provide.

That very afternoon, one of the teachers came in and told me that there was a man downstairs selling some goods to the servant's wife for two-and-a-half piasters a meter. I said I was sure it would be a waste of our time and thread to make up such cheap material. The girls would have it torn to shreds in no time. She insisted upon bringing up a sample for me to see.

Imagine my surprise when she brought a tobe of good, strong material, as good, if not better than I had found for eight piasters a meter at the shops. "How does it happen that this man has such material to sell at so low a price?" I inquired. The explanation was that a man had started a small shop and failed to make it pay and was having to sell out at a sacrifice. He was anxious to let us have his stock at two piasters a meter.

We said: "See how God has answered our prayers! If he had sent us the money we would have spent forty pounds for what He has sent to our door for ten pounds!"

The servant who has been faithful in his work at the Orphanage for many years, has given us a great deal of worry because of his evil ways and ill-treatment of his wife. We had been praying definitely for his conversion for the past two years, but his heart seemed as hard as stone and he was going from bad to worse. He not only beat his wife, but was reported to have a long knife hidden with which to kill her brother.

During the week of special meetings, the Lord touched his heart and he became a new man in Christ Jesus. He went to his brother-in-law and asked his forgiveness. We have had many things to rejoice our hearts this year, but nothing has made us happier than to see the change God has wrought in this servant.

Our hearts have been saddened this year because God has taken from us one who has been a loving father to us all. Dr. Giffen was Chairman of the Orphanage Committee for many years. He always took an interest in all that concerned the girls and teachers. He was never too busy to help us when we went to him, and we knew that he was praying for us every day. The loss of an earnest, praying friend is the greatest bereavement that can come to any one.

Word has come to us of the death of Esther Fowler. As many of you already know, it was she and her worthy husband who collected the first money for the Orphanage. John Fowler died about ten years ago. They were not wealthy people. When they came to Egypt about twenty-five years ago, their expenses were paid by the Society of Friends. While here, they were so profoundly moved by the suffering and degradation of the children, that they resolved to do all in their power to establish an Orphanage for girls. They returned to America and quietly, but steadfastly, solicited funds until they had about five thousand dollars. The interest of this fund was used for several years to pay house rent and the work began, the Orphanage depending entirely upon God to send all that was needed to support it from day to day.

All mission work is a work of faith and prayer. It is only fitting, however, that we should recognize the fact that God has honored the faith and prayers of John and Esther Fowler and our teachers in that He has not only sustained the work all these years, but has also provided a beautiful home for the Orphanage.

There are, at present, forty-seven girls in the Orphanage. Two are attending school in Luxor and one is helping in a missionary home, making a total of fifty on our roll. Two of our girls began teaching this year and one has become a Bible woman.

We had a beautiful wedding in our school chapel last summer (1922), when Gamela was married to a prosperous young man. These two converts need our earnest prayers that they will continue to grow in faith, and be a blessing to others. Four of our girls united with the church this year. A Moslem girl, who came to us about a year ago, has read the Bible through and seems to be a true believer. She has been wanting to be baptized, but the way has not opened up for that yet. Another Moslem girl, who was with us for three weeks, urged me to let her be baptized, but her relatives made so much trouble that we had to let her go away.

We have been requested to tell what the daughters of the Orphanage are doing. A great many of them have married.

Noor is helping in the Orphanage as a matron in the girls' kitchen. She has a sweet voice and leads the singing in our church and prayer-meetings. She has also helped teach songs in some of the other schools. She teaches a Sabbath school class and leads the large girls in their Sabbath afternoon prayer-meeting. She takes charge of two group meetings in the homes. At one of these meetings she usually has four or five women and eleven or thirteen children and teaches Bible stories. She was so nearly blind when she first came to the Orphanage, that she was taught to read the blind type and several books were bought for her.

Miriam had a few months training in kindergarten and is now teacher in the Orphanage school. She also superintends the bread making.

Bahia is one of our teachers and looks after our sick girls.

Hanis taught for several years at Abu Ila and is now teaching at Mahmashy.

Adelle is the kindergarten teacher at Mansourah. She taught two years at Benha.

Agnes also taught at Benha, and is now the primary teacher at Zagazig and so the list continues, comprising a dozen or more names.

We ask your sympathy and prayers for the teachers and girls in this home and for your fellow missionaries upon whom you have placed the burdens of responsibility.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THIRTEEN MOTHERS.

MARGARET T. APPELGARTH.

Who were they—these noisny persons who loved her nearly to death when they arrived and neglected her nearly to death when they were gone? It was entirely too much to have thirteen mothers! If it had not been for Ignacy . . . oh, but there was Ignacy.

It was Ignacy who made lists of the things Finis must be and do and possess. Among the latest of these: "Girls ain't boys," he announced. "Girls is different."

"Ain't you ever took notice of the other girls on this street?"

They had not. But all twelve of them dashed instantly to the front window to see the sights that might be seen; and there was the detestable Sophy Lepczynska parading by in unbelievable splendor—

"Mit curls!"

"Mit hair ribbons on her hairs!"

"Mit sashes around her middle!"

"Mit a ring-from-gold on her fingers!"

Ignacy nodded viciously: "She ain't so schwel, that Sophy. Our girl should be to more schwel than her; yah?"

The next Sabbath the thirteen mothers were discussing the finery of the street and had followed Sophy in all her splendor as far as the Sabbath School building when suddenly singing—oh, they loved singing! With words only half said, they stood with parted lips listening to the music from within.

And then the impossible happened. She appeared. "Come on in!" She said. "It's for everybody, you know."

"Yah!" grunted Ursin gloomily. "I got a grand sash tied round my middle! That ain't no place for me."

"Nor me!" said Sigismund. "Nor me!" "Nor me!"

"Nor me!" the others echoed, mentioning curls and ribbons and rings-from-gold.

They hung back, but She would have none of it. "Nonsense! I dare you to come in!"

Well! ! !

They trooped in very sheepishly and bashfully and noisily. It was all very mystifying, but then came more singing, with Ignacy out-doing everybody else; he did not know the words, but that made no difference—he let his voice out, as if he were calling clear down the street; he gathered his voice in, until it was the gentlest coo, the kind he used to put Finis to sleep. He adored singing. But the other twelve Marchlewiczses sat tongue-tied and uneasy until She came to sit beside them.

"I hope you will join our Sabbath School," she said.

"Sabbath School?" they echoed. "What for should it be?"

"Did you never hear of a Sabbath School before?" She asked, scandalized.

Thirteen heads nodded "no."

"Oh!" sighed the Wonderful Lady. "Did you ever see a Bible?"

"No!" the heads wagged. (And the lady remembered reading that six million Americans had no Bibles yet. Here were thirteen of those six millions.)

"Did you ever hear of Jesus?"

Nobody was quite sure.

The lady sighed. "Let me tell you about Him."

They listened. . . .

They had never heard one word of it before. They were very much annoyed by a bell that tinkled long before she was through, so Henryk said: "You shouldn't to mind bells, Leddy, just spiel ahead!"

But the lady had to mind the bell; and in no time at all Sabbath School was over.

"Did you like it?" she asked eagerly.

"I got a awful glad over it!" said Ignacy, with his quaint wide smile.

Even Henryk was interested: "Why for shoudn't we got news of this Jesus before, Leddy? Ain't He new in town?"

"I am afraid He is!" she sighed. "You see, the people in my city suddenly began thinking about the boys and girls in this Coal Town of yours. So here I am! And this is my little house. 'Coal Town Christian Centre' is its name, and you can come to see me any time at all. Come, if you smash your finger! Come, if you want to play! Come, if you're lonely all up-and-down inside you, although you don't look as if you could ever be lonely—are you all brothers?"

(To be concluded.)

Furnished by Jane Mauls.

At the present moment mankind may profitably consider the words with which Pasteur closed his oration on the opening of the Pasteur Institute in 1888:

"Two opposing laws," he said, "now seem to me to be contesting with one another. The one a law of blood and death, opening at each day new methods of destroying life, compels nations always to be prepared for battle. The other is a law of peace, of labor, of health, its only aim is to deliver mankind from the enemies that assail him. The one is always seeking conquest by violence, the other the relief of mankind. One regards a single life as more important than all victories, the other slaughters hundreds of thousands of lives to the glorification of one man. Only God can tell which of these two laws will gain the upper hand. But we may be sure of one thing, that science, always heedful of laws of humanity, will always work to enlarge the frontiers of life."

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

"It is not our intention to have criminals control Pennsylvania. And, as I said in my inaugural address, we must either control them or they will control us. Our work is not yet done, but we have made a reasonably good start."—GOVERNOR PINCHOT.

SLOWLY but surely Prohibition in the United States is becoming an established fact and its enforcement a reasonable success. The best information indicates a pronounced decrease in the amount of drinking. The liquor business is on the way out. —Toledo Blade.

THE passage by the Pennsylvania Legislature of the Enforcement Law pledged by Governor Pinchot is rightly regarded as a Prohibition victory for the entire country.

THE killing of 135 or more officers of the law while endeavoring to enforce the statute, or the death of many hundreds from the use of wood alcohol as a beverage, are not arguments against Prohibition. They are in fact so many evidences of the importance of the enforcement of the law.

MAY WORK IN TWENTY YEARS.—The headline writers for wet newspapers are clever in presenting the discouraging aspects of Prohibition. Probably the Cincinnati Enquirer and others of its kind will never become reconciled to the elimination of the saloon and of the traffic in intoxicating beverages, but one might expect them to be at least courteous enough not to give a false impression of any statement of the President of the United States. When Warren G. Harding said that he expected, "Constant, progressive improvement in the enforcement of prohibition laws with a resulting decrease of the importance of that issue in the popular mind," it was no sign of wavering that he suggested that it might take twenty years to get adjusted fully to the new order of things. What are twenty years to the consummation of a revolution in government policy so important as this? We have had seventy-five years of attempted "regulation" before we discovered that relegation, not regulation, is the only adequate policy in dealing with any iniquitous traffic,—relegation to its fitting place with other wrongs that cursed the human race,—

 "The hateful memories of the elder time."

MALICIOUS MISREPRESENTATION of Prohibition in the United States, while common in our own country, is even more sedulously cultivated in other lands where the information to disprove is not readily obtainable. This has been conspicuously true in connection with campaigns for Prohibition in Australia and New Zealand.

In the long run the liquor business is digging its own grave by such methods, for the truth will be found out eventually. Recently an inquiry by cable from the South African Temperance Alliance came to Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon through the American Consul at Johannesburg. An official reply was sent by Secretary Mellon, reading in part as follows, "Prohibition and the enforcement thereof is not a failure. The President of the United States made no such statement." Unfortunately, not many Temperance Societies have the funds to "spike the lies" so effectively as in this instance.

"IN WETTEST NEW YORK," is the caption given to a delightful bit of irony copied from The Outlook, N. Y. It reads as follows:—

Wettest of all wet towns is New York City, the wet press tells us—wetter by far than in pre-Volstead days—and its wet drink is whisky. The whisky trade, a mere infant industry before the Amendment, has attained colossal proportions, we learn. It behooves the American business man to look into this as it furnishes many a helpful suggestion! He will discover—

(1) The Folly of Advertising. Until Prohibition came, not only the newspapers, magazines, and billboards of America, but its night-time sky, loudly advertised strong drink; yet how little was sold!

(2) The Folly of Window Dressing. Those pyramids of innumerable well-filled bottles were supposed to attract purchasers. Today our dealers in strong drink provide the true enticement: Out of sight out of mind!

(3) The Folly of Indiscriminate Sales. When anyone could buy, trade languished, quite naturally. Now that only a chosen few can buy, trade thrives!

(4) The Folly of Price-cutting. How difficult it was in those dull, pre-Volstead days to dispose of two cocktails for a quarter! Charge a dollar and a half each, and behold, the problem is solved!

(5) The Folly of Pampering One's Customers. By making their places of business conveniently accessible (a hundred to the mile), and embellishing them with works of art, and providing extravagant free lunches, the purveyors of strong drink drove customers away. Under the present system, which makes the tippler travel long distances and furnishes disgusting places of business, as a rule, with melancholy and dire loneliness giving them an air of depression thrice depressed, it is a struggle to serve drinks fast enough!

Were it not for our devout confidence in the asseverations of the wet, wet press, we might almost mistake this whisky-ridden metropolis for the astonishingly dry town that it actually is. Inasmuch as polls are at present so popular, we visited a neighboring establishment the other day and polled the representative New Yorkers who make up its staff. Of each representative New Yorker we inquired, "At how many places can you—you yourself, not you generally—obtain drinks!" The answers ranged from "None" to Eight—a single Eight. "Eight" is most in the wettest of wet towns, where until the Amendment any representative New Yorker had his choice of thousands!

GARY, INDIANA.—Seventy-five citizens of this city and Lake County were indicted by the Federal grand jury last Twelfth Month on the charge of conspiracy to violate the Volstead act. Of those indicted, seven were cleared of the charge, one nolle prossed, five pleaded guilty and fifty-five were convicted. Among the latter were the Mayor of the city, the municipal judge, the prosecuting attorney and former prosecuting attorney, the sheriff and former sheriff of Lake County, a prominent local attorney, the treasurer of the Republican committee of Gary, and two women. Fifteen nationalities were represented in these convictions—American, Greek, Czecho-Slovakian, Austrian, Roumanian, Irish, Negro, Spanish, Polish, Russian, Croatian, Serbian, Italian, Swedish and German.

The uncovering of this condition at Gary must result in a clean-up. The courts and the officers of the law throughout the country have been given unmistakable warning. This exposure will certainly aid dry law enforcement.—American Issue.

OUT OF 86 recent liquor prosecutions in New Hampshire, 85 were guilty. Seventeen of the 85 were given jail sentences and 68 paid fines amounting to $7,600, according to a report by Prohibition Director Lewis.

PROHIBITION enforcement is not an expense to tax-payers. The liquor law violators pay the cost and something besides.

This has been demonstrated many times, not only in certain districts, but in the general report of Roy A. Haynes, Federal Prohibition Commissioner of the United States. In some States the revenue from enforcement amounts to a large sum of money. In Wisconsin, for instance, the "Enforcement Commission" costs the State $60,000, but the return in fines for the same period of time has been as much as $500,000.

"Home" in North China.

Edith Stratton Platt.

Fun Ling entered the dirty little kitchen loaded with shu kai (corn stalks), poked long stalks of it into the open hearth, and waited for the smouldering mass to blaze. Great curls of blinding smoke began to pour out into Fun Ling's eyes and throat. Whether it was the incessant smoke of this hateful stove or the great desolation in little Fun Ling's heart, her eyes were red and swollen, and she shivered as one who feels the world a very, very chilly place to live in. She stooped mechanically to her allotted task of preparing the family meal twice daily. It was no small chore for there was her mother-in-law, ruling head of the compound and no lover of Fun Ling, to satisfy; there were three aunts and an old uncle; four sisters-in-law and one of their husbands; and there were ten little hungry children clamoring for rice. Life was very straight and grinding for the girl.

One joy she had—her little son Chun Min, who balanced himself on his slipper tips and sang a we weird song with rollicking eyes. But what he wanted was a kite with big red wings, and what he needed was a little cotton-padded jacket to keep away the shivers and Fun Ling had no money. To be sure the family was not poor, but this girl was poor. Her dowry was almost used up and all the help she got was food and lodging from her mother-in-law. Sometimes, though, when her husband came home he smuggled a few dollars to her past the vigilant eyes of his mother, but he came only twice a year or so and she could never count on that. Yet how proud she was of this father of her child—the man who had worked his way, they said, up to the position of Principal of a large school in Moukden, forty miles away. Sometimes she dreamed of a day when she and Chun Min could live with him and yet why should she hope? He had never mentioned it and well she knew as long as his mother lived she must serve her and his people.

That man on the front row of my English class, looking so confident and self-satisfied, is little Fung Ling's husband. Little he guesses that my thoughts shoot back to the lonely girl-wife in the distant village while we are discussing the style of Oliver Twist together!

And yet there is nothing exceptional about his case. This is accepted as the normal arrangement in the non-Christian Manchurian home. A girl, at an early age often, is sent away to a strange family where she sleeps and eats and drudges in her husband's home. Up to the age of twelve or over her children are her financial responsibility to clothe and educate, and she gets no larger share of her husband's income than do his sisters-in-law or his nieces or nephews. After this her children pass into the family budget and become virtually the property of the family. This incomplete communism results in bitter inequalities between the wives who have and the wives who have not. It is indeed a lucky arrangement for the man without a job or for the shiftless fellow who shirks his share of the support, but throttles the man with ambition who has the weight of all his relatives on his back. It has, be it said, its strong side and the quick acceptance of the burdens of the weak and inefficient by the generous Chinese lad is impressive to us of the strongly individualistic West. But the hardships and tragedy of young womanhood are only made bearable by the masterful position to which the mother of sons attains in later years. The present she must accept as the inevitable price she pays for the compensating future and count herself happy if baby boys are born to her in rapid succession.

This is one of the staggering problems that these young men of our Association have to face, those who mean to Christianize their personal lives. They are practically all married; they are, if they have ideals, unhappy. Home to them is too often an uncomfortable, unlovely place of quarrels and jealousies, loud-voiced petulant women and undisciplined children. No wonder when summer vacation comes along young Ting chooses not to go home to wife and family—to go anywhere but home; or that the banker lad spends his holidays in the bank because he will find comradeship there. It is only just dawning upon them now that following Christ involves a fundamental revolution down there in the personal life where it hurts most.

Friendship is an art much cultivated in China, and a strong and beautiful experience is the relation of father and son, of brother to brother; these are deep and binding ties; that of husband and wife quite casual and superficial often. There is a Chinese proverb which says: "A brother is like my hands or feet; a wife like my robe." Until one suddenly realizes what a difference Christianity has made to womanhood, the ordinary Chinese man seems, although the soul of courtesy to a foreign woman, inexcusably unchivalrous and devoid of affection to his own wife. We had the experience the other day of entering the room where one of our finest young Christian doctors and four Chinese girls were seated. The doctor stepped up and introduced three sisters and as we lingered on the brink of the fourth introduction to the sweetest girl of them all, he retired awkwardly and mumbled something about a wife. It is no wonder that she often is an embarrassment, though in this instance she was a refined, educated girl. Ordinarily here in the conservative North of China she is uneducated, unrefined, absolutely ignorant of life beyond her compound. She is confronted with the deepest responsibilities of life with no preparation or recognition. She is submerged in her husband's family. What should the boy, her husband, do about it? It was not his will to marry this strange girl. Why should he be responsible? Many of them, unless they are stabbed broad awake, evade the problem, go off to Peking, or somewhere for several years of study or manage in other ways to be as little handicapped by home ties as possible.

But Christians cannot side-step. The Chinese Church is faced with this imperative. It has seen at least one issue in this field clearly—monogamy and the purity of the home. It has made a magnificent onslaught on the institution of concubinage which riddles non-Christian Chinese life. This is an achievement that can scarcely be over-estimated in our consideration of the church. It has also introduced a larger element of love that is softening the sharp jealousies and injustices that are all but inevitable in this type of family system. But the "Christian Revolution" of the Chinese home has only begun. It must be led to face the difficulties of the patriarchal system, the true basis for marriage, and to work out methods that will give expression to this new idealism.

In the meantime, there is the delicate problem of the transition period and the shocking inconsistencies of a new faith. The case of the old Chinese pastor illustrates this. He arranges for his daughter a marriage that he deems very advantageous. To be sure the young man is not a Christian, but, on the other hand, the family has money. She goes out of the home of the pastor, her father, to the non-Christian home. There are many sisters-in-law—some accredited wives and some concubines. She is despised and harried for being a Christian. She is commanded not to leave the Compound or to visit her own family. She and her child are virtual prisoners in the strange unhappy household. Her husband lives and works in another city and seldom returns. Little comfort he would be in any case. Frequenter of brothels and gambling dens, diseased in body and warped in soul, he whom she never has loved, how could she love him now? But her old father still pronounces the benediction in the church, though it cannot reach through to her. He is the head of a family of children and grandchildren and great-grandchildren of whom he may well be proud. Just the other day one of his sons, an Elder in the Church, and a fine Christian doctor, betrothed in turn his daughter against her consent. Perhaps the fate of his own sister urged him to take this step and insure for this child marriage into a Christian home. But what of the girl whose destiny is thus arbitrarily fixed? What of the development of personality, unique and precious, in such marriage arrangements as this? What separate identity or opportunity to work out their own ideals does the new couple have in this old-type family system?

There are those who see that here is a problem fundamental to all others of the social order. One of our Association secretaries sees it. On his heart it weighed night and day—that home of his. His wife not able to get along with his sister-in-law; his children growing up in an atmosphere of suspicions and hates. And when he saw it clearly, he acted. Amid great opposition he set up a little one-room home of his own which he and his wife jointly support. And still it weighs upon his heart—the illiteracy of his wife, whom he married strongly against his wish at the age of fifteen; the gulf between their interests and capacities, and the influence of these things upon those boys and girl of his. But he goes beyond his personal problem. The homes of China are on his heart. "It is a sad thing," he said one day, "to be born a girl in China. My little daughter said to me the other day, 'Father, why did God make me a girl? I want to be a boy, Father!'"

China cannot be Christianized until womanhood is self-respecting and respected until education is given equally to girlhood; until marriage is lifted to the plane of intellectual and spiritual comradeship. These men cannot be won to the Christian life apart from their homes. A message of personal salvation for them as for us only opens the door through to a vast undiscovered country. To become a Christian must mean for them as for us to tackle the problem of relationships. To ignore the implications is hypocrisy or blindness or cowardice. These men must face this fact. The Chinese Church must face it. We ourselves must preach it in word and life.

This is our hope for our home—that it may be, if not in achievement, at least in purpose, a beacon to the undiscovered country of perfect love; that it may awaken desire and quicken hope and drive to action those who would be co-workers with Christ in creating Heaven on earth, the Kingdom of God with men.

THE CEDARS OF LEBANON.

A letter from Gertrude Harrison, in Brumanna, tells of a visit to the largest group of cedars on Mt. Lebanon.

After an all-day motor drive along the northern coast of Syria, they started up the mountain, climbing 6000 feet. Then they had to leave the car, and climb 1000 more on foot, arriving at the cedars at sundown. The trees have been walled in to protect them, and a keeper is there constantly. Some are thousands of years old, and seven people, stretching fingertip to fingertip, could not encircle them.

G. H. says: "I am glad Hiram left some for me to see!" After sleeping in tents, the party rose at 4 A. M., and spent two hours strolling through the wood, enjoying the beauty of the trees. After half-past six breakfast, they started on the return journey, arriving back at Beirut, after a twelve hours' motor run, inexpressibly tired, but, "oh, it was well worth it."

"RECENT TRENDS IN PROTESTANTISM."

A thoughtful paper by Charles Foster Kent appeared in a recent number of Scribner's Magazine, some paragraphs from which are of especial interest to Friends.

Starting with the thought that "In its origin and genius Protestantism represents the prophetic tendencies in Christianity," he goes on to show how "the recognition of the right of independent thought, and the authority of the living prophet go far to explain the rise of the sects, and the many divisions which today separate and weaken it." One of the "recent trends" is toward co-operation, and he cites forty towns "in the staid New England State of Vermont," where three congregations have united in one and "The entire religious and moral atmosphere of the community is being changed. It is not strange that this movement is spreading like the leaven of early Christianity." Touching on the "Fundamentalist" movement, he expresses his belief that each party needs to know and understand the position of the other, and that both must face squarely three facts. First, that the Author of their faith placed the entire stress not on declarations but on demonstrations, on life and deeds, not on creeds. Second, that the youth of today must live in the twentieth century and that their faith and their development should be the first concern of the church. Scolding and prodding will not compel the twentieth century to go back into the shell of the eighteenth, even could that shell be restored. Third, Protestantism, as the great prophetic movement of Christianity, is today confronted by stupendous tasks and responsibilities which can only be met with united front and in the spirit of Him who found His life by losing it. His many-sided teachings contain the fundamentals on which all his followers can safely and securely take their stand, content to differ regarding the debatable questions of intellectual belief.

Another recent trend of thought he believes to be toward what he calls a "differentiated ministry." It "is well to remember," he says, "that Paul, in his burning letter to the Corinthian Christians, urges each to serve the beloved community according to his special ability." "It may be the devoted mother, or the enthusiastic settlement worker, or the invalid saint, or the faithful physician, or youth with glowing vision, or old men, dreaming dreams, who have a message that will set cold hearts aflame and send young and old alike out into paths of joyous service." This is not new doctrine to Friends, but how interesting to find it so recognized!

Illustrating this further he tells of a gifted and popular clergyman who died suddenly, and his assistant—a young man—was asked to take his place until a successor was found. He did so on condition that all the members of the congregation share the responsibilities with him, and today this body of "active, working Christians" is fast becoming the most potent religious force in one of the larger of our American cities.

"The explanation of this re-birth of a church is simple. Psychologists tell us that we are interested in that to which we are able personally to contribute and in nothing else. The Master Teacher knew well this simple but vastly important principle. He saved the men and women who pressed about Him, first by believing in them and then by giving them a task which each could perform. The very essence of the Christianity of Jesus is individual loyalty to the fraternal community expressed in service. Protestantism is gradually grasping this ideal of universal enlistment, and as a result new life is coming back to many dying churches."

"There are unmistakable indications," concludes the writer, "that they (the sects) are passing through a great transitional period out of which will emerge a more unified, a more spiritual, and a more truly prophetic Protestantism."

MOTION PICTURES OF FRIENDS' WORK IN EUROPE.

The American Friends' Service Committee announces that it has just received from Europe, motion pictures showing the present relief and reconstruction work of Friends. These pictures, which bear the general title "New Worlds for Old," are divided into three reels: (1) The Memorial Hospital at Châlons-sur-Marne, France, and the work in Austria; (2) Poland; (3) Russia.

These pictures are now available for exhibition before Friends' groups. The Service Committee will furnish a motion picture machine and an operator when necessary. As the machine is run by electricity, the meeting-house or other room in which the pictures are to be shown must be provided with electrical connections.

It is the hope of the Service Committee that special meetings will be arranged by Friends at which these pictures may be shown. Quarterly Meetings are suggested as opportunities in connection with which such exhibitions may be arranged, or they may be arranged in any community where Friends will undertake the local work of organizing the meeting.

The schedule for the pictures is now being made up. All interested meetings or communities are requested to write to the American Friends' Service Committee, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., stating first, second and third choice for dates on which film is desired, and indicating nature of audience to which it will be shown. Please mark letters: "Attention Motion Picture Department."

CAN THEE HELP SEND THIS SHIPMENT OF CLOTHES TO AUSTRIA?

In a letter written from Vienna, Wilbur K. Thomas, who is now inspecting the fields of Service work in Europe, requests that Friends make a special effort at this time to collect clothing for Austria.

During his stay in Vienna, Wilbur Thomas met with the Clothing Committee of the Mission there, and learned that the Mission has profitable use for all clothing contributions sent from America. He writes: "The workers are anxious for any kind of serviceable clothing which we can send, and I hope that we may make a satisfactory collection for this purpose."

At the meeting of the Vienna Clothing Committee, which

Wilbur Thomas attended. Minutes were drawn up giving advice as to the kind of clothing and other supplies needed. Under the heading "Second-hand Clothing," these Minutes state:

"The greatest need is for outer garments for men and boys,—suits, overcoats, trousers, etc. For boys, clothing between the sizes of twelve and eighteen is particularly welcome, although smaller garments for both boys and girls can also be used. Second-hand muslin underwear in good condition can always be used in large quantities, and likewise low-heeled, broad-toed shoes for men and women and boys and girls. Women's garments in good condition are welcome."

The Minutes state that any number of layettes can be used, while there is also need of new clothing and shoes, sheeting and muslin, woolen goods in the bolt, and blankets. The American Friends' Service Committee can purchase quantities of one or more of these commodities at very low rates. Contributions are needed for this purpose.

Most of the clothing sent to Vienna is used in helping the distressed middle classes—students, professional men and their families, members of the former aristocracy—large numbers of whom, even though formerly wealthy, are now destitute. What the help of the Mission means to these people may be judged by the following letter, which was signed by twenty-one students in one of Austria's technical schools, and which forms one of many expressions of thanks constantly being received by the Mission:—

"Dear Friends:—

"The undersigned wish to express their thanks to the originators of so much joy and helpful assistance.

"It is not an alms we students receive through your kindness; we are invited to meals—just as if a kind relative had asked us on a holiday. There is such a joy in our households each time we bring news promising a new act of kindness—and such pleasure when we bring some new present of the Society of Friends to our struggling parents.

"Should we not be thankful in our inmost heart for so many benefits!

"Will you, dear friends, accept our heartfelt thanks and the prayer that God may reward you a thousand times for all the good done through your work.

"We hope to be able sometime to act as you do—and to pass on all the benefits by which we have profited to our needy neighbor."

NOTES ON THE MESSAGE WORK.

SCHOLARSHIPS FOR WOODBROOKE.—A letter has been received from the Council for International Service—the English equivalent of the Message Committee—telling of many requests for scholarships to Woodbrooke being received from Central Europe. The present impoverished condition of the Central European nations makes it almost impossible for students from these countries to attend Woodbrooke without financial help. Owing to the limited number of scholarships available many of these applications have to be refused. The Message Committee feels that attendance at Woodbrooke by these young people is one of the best means of broadening the international outlook of the coming generation in Europe; and the Committee will make an effort to secure funds in America in order to provide one or more scholarships for this purpose. The total scholarships amount to $230 each, as it is necessary to cover tuition and all expenses. Contributions toward the provision of such scholarships may be sent to the Message Committee, in care of the American Friends' Service Committee.

FORTHCOMING VISIT OF DR. HERTHA KRAUS.—An international visit which the Message Committee is helping to support is that of Dr. Hertha Kraus, who was one of the leading German workers associated with the Quaker child-feeding work in Germany, and who will arrive in New York about Sixth Month 1st for a fourteen weeks' visit to America. Dr.

Kraus has recently been appointed Director of Welfare Work for the city of Cologne, one of the leading positions for municipal welfare work in Germany. One purpose of her visit to America is to study American methods of administering work of this kind. She will also come with a message of good-will from Germany to America, and will be available for Question Box Talks on such subjects as the following:—Welfare Work in Germany; The Place of German Women in Public Life; The Youth Movement; Changes Wrought by the Revolution; The Position of Labor Politically and Economically; University Activities; Student Co-operative Activities; Young Peoples' Handicraft Work.

The Message Committee would be glad to receive contributions toward the support of Dr. Kraus' visit, and also to learn of opportunities for her to give public addresses.

On the recommendation of Alfred C. Garrett, who together with Agnes Tierney was recently in Germany in connection with the Message work, the Message Committee recently appropriated $1,000 for the translation, publication in German and distribution of certain free copies of Rufus M. Jones' "Spiritual Reformers." The Committee, also on Alfred Garrett's recommendation, appropriated $500 per year for three years toward the support of the work being done by Walter Koch, a young German Friend, in connection with a working-men's educational centre at Cassel.

It is understood that Alfred Garrett and Agnes Tierney will give a further report of their recent activities in Europe upon their arrival at home.

SHIPMENTS received for week ending Fourth Month 28, 1923—51 boxes and packages.

Cash contributions for the same period—$13,676.77.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

No English Friend within the memory of most of our subscribers has made so long a sojourn among us as has A. Neave Brayshaw. We believe his visit has been well ordered and that it has been helpful. He left Philadelphia a fortnight ago, planning to visit Friends at Westerly, R. I., and at other points in New England, ending his American experiences for the present with a dear friend at Saranac, N. Y., and sailing by the White Star S. S. Pittsburgh, scheduled to leave on the 15th inst.

An interesting account of Samuel H. Ranck, Quaker librarian of the Grand Rapids (Michigan) Public Library, was published in a recent issue of Collier's Weekly. "I don't get a boy or a workman to read," he says, "by merely choosing his book; but let me get him out in a canoe or for a walk in the forest and unconsciously kindle in him the desire to know more about some subject, and when we get back I have another reader." "There isn't a man or woman in our country whose daily work cannot be enhanced by reading and to whom that reading cannot be made interesting." "This makes better citizens. Better citizens make better homes. Better homes make better government and better conditions, all of which contributes to happiness." "Samuel Ranck's idea of a public library is that it should help every man to want every other man in the city to be his next-door neighbor. To reach that ideal each must be worthy of the other in intelligence, in idealfulness, in cleanliness and in character."

The Committee appointed in 1921, by the Meeting of Sufferings of London Yearly Meeting, to consider the whole question of official correspondence with Yearly Meetings in America, reported to that body at its last session that it proposed that the practice of appointing official correspondents be dropped. The Meeting welcomed the proposal cordially and will forward it to the Yearly Meeting.

THE Yorkshire 1905 Committee has just issued two new pamphlets—"The Heart of Quakerism," by T. Edmund Harvey, and "Fundamentals of Quakerism," by Carl Heath. The first contains the substance of an address given at Guilford College, North Carolina, last fall. It was put into shape by T. E. H. while on shipboard on his return trip and made its first appearance in print in this paper. The second is the address which our Friend gave at the Young Friends' Conference in Manchester a year ago.

A LITERARY announcement of special interest to Friends is that of the "Life of George Cadbury," by A. G. Gardiner, which figures in the spring list of Cassell & Company.

THE third and fourth numbers of the Journal of the Friends' Historical Society for 1922 are published together and are just out in a volume of about 80 pages, including four pages of index for the year. We have read this rare number through from cover to cover and find much which we know will interest the readers of THE FRIEND. No. 3 is largely occupied with historical gleanings from America, illustrating a variety of quaint practices, expressions and experiences, among others the serious bar to "the ministry" which the wearing of a beard was at one time among American Friends. The principal article consists of portions of the presidential address of Ernest E. Taylor in 1921 on "The First Publishers of Truth." This is an abridgment of E. E. T.'s address at the annual meeting of the Historical Society of Friends in 1921. It contains a full list of "The Seventy" (actually 65)—"those itinerating Friends with the gift of ministry living in the North-West of England whose gospel service had begun by the spring of 1654." Of these the occupations are as far as possible recorded, and an analysis at the end shows that thirty of them were yeomen (or statesmen) and husbands; after that the largest group is five gentlemen, and there were four craftsmen and four schoolmasters. The schoolmasters were Ambrose Rigge, of Grayrigg, Christopher and Thomas Taylor, of Carlton, and George Whitehead, of Orton.

This information appeared in The Friend (London) some time since, but some of our readers have not seen it—

Invited by the National Student Forum Association, six young Europeans are at present in the United States, namely, two Germans, a Dutchman, a Dane, a Czech and an Englishman, "not to import the Jugendbewegung, not to bring a pattern for imitation, but rather to bring a challenge." They hope to spend five months traveling in pairs to American colleges and universities and telling of their experience and hopes, and suggesting that there are problems in Europe which the youth of America can help to solve. English Friends will know of some of these visitors.—Hans Tiesler spent a year at Peter Manniche's International People's College at Elsinore, and Jorgen Holck, of Copenhagen, was in England in 1921 and, "through an intimate connection with the Quakers was led to take part in the Conference towards a Christian International."

GOLD in PRINTING

The reason why so many firms are disastrously shy of good printing that would build sales is the lack of intelligent preparation and persistent use.

And yet, good catalogs, booklets, or folders—well written and well printed—are gold mines—always have been and always will be.

THE WORK OF OUR HANDS.

"Establish Thou the work of our hands upon us; yea the work of our hands establish Thou it."

This verse has always attracted my attention. It seems to me that only a very ignorant or a very wise and good man would dare to make such a request. "Establish Thou the work of our hands upon us." How many of us would really dare to take the consequence of our work—to have it established upon us? Or indeed, is it such that we would wish it to remain even if our connection with it were unknown? "Yea, the work of our hands, establish Thou it." A very far-reaching request, that. Yet it has been the cry of man from the beginning, for he has ever been a builder, a craftsman, a creator; driven by an inward urge to evolve tools, houses, cities, governments, civilizations. It is this builder, mankind, of whom I would speak in the parable which follows.

In a far-off land of marsh and mountain and shadowy forest, a man sat upon a fallen tree and listened. Unkempt, scant of brow, gnarled of muscle, he did not know for what he waited, yet he sat there, pondering, expectant. Then, out of the rugged mountains, out of the whispering leaves above him and the stealthy sedges at his feet, came a voice saying, "Build."

With the coming of the voice, a great flame of desire leaped up in him. He gathered the tall bamboo and built with it a hut, such as no man had seen, fashioning it after the picture of his own desire. He had created a new thing and his mind had grown with the deed. To this house he brought a woman and they settled down at their ease.

But in that far-off land there were strange spirits, more guessed at than known. One there was who came with the sunshine and soft breezes. This one the Builder loved. There were others who dwelt in winds and darkness, fearsome things, and unfriendly. Now when the man beheld how beautiful was the work of his hands, he wished it to stand forever as his memorial, and he cried out to the spirit of the sunlight, "Let the work of my hands remain."

A night came after this when the wind spirits rode down the darkness. The morning sunlight fell upon a lone man sitting beside a heap of bamboo poles. Yet even as he sat there, a voice came out of the distance, crying "Build," and he arose and began to cut down the mighty trees about him. It was a long, hard task, but when he had finished, behold! a house of strong oak beams stood upon the ruins of the old. The Builder wondered that he had ever been willing that so mean a structure as the bamboo hut should stand as his accomplishment. Now he should indeed be remembered—and he rested from his toil.

A tongue of scarlet flame swept through the forest. When it had passed by, the Builder gazed upon a heap of grey ashes; and a wind arose and tossed them upon his head until he, too, was grey with ruin. But the ashes could not shut out the voice which still cried, "Build." He turned to the mountains at his back and wrenched from their sides huge blocks with which to build a mightier abode. When he compared it with those which had gone before, he blessed the wind and fire as wise teachers. Once more he cried out, "Establish the work of my hands," and even as he spoke, the marsh sucked down his house.

But this time, he did not so much as stop to gaze. The gnarled muscles had won skill and the scant brow grown higher in the struggle. He was no longer the uncouth creature who sat listening upon a fallen tree in that long ago. Now, he drained the marshes and built a palace, even mightier than the last, all carved about with splendid figures and glittering with gilded dome.

And now, he did not say, "Establish the work of my hands," nor did he cease to build. That which was done he cast aside, leaving time to save or destroy his work according to its worth. Only the knowledge gained in the building he clung to. He understood that the abodes of the past were but the foundations of the future.

DISCIPLINE.

The Committee appointed by the Yearly Meeting to make recommendations for the revision or correction of the present Discipline have a very prickly burr to open. Views reflecting the best thought of the Yearly Meeting range from the addition of a few dates or the elimination of a few obsolete paragraphs, on the one hand, to a thorough review and rearrangement, if not rewriting of the present book, on the other. As the solemn work is a task that concerns the whole Philadelphia group the Committee hopes that all who have views on the subject will feel entirely free to pass them to the Committee. The final findings of the Committee are quite unknown, although a total of forty-eight separate expressions have been registered in two meetings of the general committee each lasting more than two hours.

Two general attitudes have been clearly reflected in the discussion to date: a book of much the present form that will serve as a guide of evolutionary rules and inspiration for chief use amongst our members; or a book that will be particularly applicable to one inquiring about Friends. There is also the obvious function of educating our own members. Of necessity such a volume must be handy, brief, inspirational, yet definite in regard to Friends' principles. The Committee is agreed that neither hasty, haphazard or unwise changes should be tolerated. There is a strong sentiment, however, in preparing an expression that will adequately present the Society of Friends to the world of today, that will inform our present generation of a rich heritage and will, above all, reflect fine Christian thought coupled with much common sense.

Strange as it may sound, there are many phases of our Church life on which the present Discipline is silent. The testimony of Peace is barely mentioned and not in a positively convincing way befitting Quakers. The equality of men and women in ministry and business is inferred, but not adequately outlined. Many other illustrations could be cited, such as social order, missions, etc. One is reminded on reading the Discipline of the many paragraphs that have crept in, either through some misadventure of an individual, or to avoid a possible misunderstanding of the Society. There is a good bit of defensive "positional" writing. It is due the Society that it arrange its printed views not so much to avoid a misunderstanding as to create a definite understanding of the life and character of Philadelphia Friends.

WHAT I HAVE THOUGHT LATELY.

(a)—The Happy Man.

In spring, he sang for the goddess of spring, but in autumn, he danced for that of autumn. When he was rich, he was thankful to be rich, but when he became poor he was happy to be loved by his poor neighbors. He loved children: with them he read strange stories from a book. He loved old people: eagerly he listened to their endless talks. Why, he would have found the reason to be thankful even if he was given a stone instead of a piece of meat.

(b)—If Stars Are With Me.

(Free translation of a poem by T. Kagawa, a social worker, a poet and a Christian.)

An iron gate, in front of me,
Heavy chains around my wrists.
But no locks have they to lock my eyes.
With eyes wide open
I steal the light.

What is the light which I steal?
The light of the North Star which twinkles high.
If stars are with me,
I do not lack for friends.

Dragging chains behind me
I climb to the window.
From this window my body cannot escape.

But my soul,
My soul swims upward to the sky.

To the world of light,
My soul flies,
To the north, farther to the north, higher and higher.
Good-bye, world, good-bye.
Earthly freedom need I no longer,
For I fly to the sky of stars!

If stars are with me,
I do not lack for friends
To-night
I will sleep with the stars.

(c)—"I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain."
(John xv: 16.)

Who can be indifferent to this message? Is it not God's will that I, too, should take part in the establishment of His kingdom? No longer, my voyage, however long, is dark; no longer I shall be alone in my path. God, my father, will lead me to my goal.

BRYN MAWR.

TAKI FUJITA.

SPRING.

Great Sol hath slowly crept on high again
In his blue arch of sky, and when he beams
On earth, she smiles at him; then, to regain
Her former grandeur, wakes from happy dreams
Her children; coaxes flowers, laughs at streams
That ripple, tumble, dance, in happy glee,
And wash and wear the pebbles till their gleams
Seem those of pearls or gold, as o'er the lea
Their foamy waters rush,—from Winter's clutches free.

O Spring is full of joy. The fragrant air
Carries its message. Soaring through the sky,
The birds return, and in the sun's bright glare,
Their colors glisten and change, while swift they fly
From tree to tree, from bough to bough—on high
Again,—then lightly rest, pour forth a song
In merry mood, or answer, in reply
To the mate's call. Come, join the happy throng
O mortal man! These boundless joys to Spring belong.

INTER-RACIAL FRIENDSHIP.

It is interesting to note that a position similar to that held by Friends in regard to inter-racial friendships is maintained in The New Student, a magazine published by the National Student Forum. Eugene Corbie, a Negro student and a member of the Forum Executive Board, writes in the paper: "There is no doubt that segregation (of Negro and white students in our universities) is fundamentally wrong from all points of view. First, because it presupposes race superiority, which is false; secondly, because it perpetuates the spirit of hatred which is both undesirable and inimicable to the best interests of the social groups; thirdly, because the times call for a different conception of human relationship." He goes on to say that from the time when the first laws regulating the slave trade were enacted in the Barbadoes and the West Indies, men considered that special laws must be made for the Negro.

"These statements about the blacks are so implanted in the minds of the masses that not until recently has scientific light been thrown on the question. Let us stop to consider whether our prejudices have not mastered our senses. Can one wonder that the average black man has not yet demonstrated his capacity as fully as the white man has? Think of the conditions of slavery; of the myriad efforts made to keep him down; think of the fact that he is called upon to do the things that are considered too menial for the rest of the world. And all this because he happens to be what he has not made himself—"a black man." Think that despite his social, political and economic disadvantages he still strives to overcome his ignorance that he may become a competitor in the open field. Think of the cry of social equality that is raised when he strives to become something more than a mere servant and the walls that are set between him and success.

"It was finally concluded that the ignorance of slaves made them inefficient. If the latter statement is true then no matter what the field of activity, the worker should be trained, otherwise he becomes economically less valuable. But to accuse the black man of lack of appreciation of the higher things of life, without giving him the right to participate in those things, is intellectual lynching, since we are condemning a man without a trial. If then we deny the blacks the admission into the things that make for culture, and then expect that they will get it by inspiration, we are sadly mistaken. Unless we are willing to grant that admission, we should desist from our condemnation."

Eugene Corbie then speaks of the spirit of hatred exhibited in the last war. We are using that spirit toward the black man, instead of a policy consistent with advancing thought. The best policy would be one of tolerance, which attempts to arrive at a better understanding of the Negro. We cannot ignore him. Education is the only real approach to a solution.

"We should, when he presents himself for admission to our schools and colleges, rather than segregate him, rather than sow the seed of arrogance and oppression, let him come in and partake freely of the things that will go to make him a more law-abiding and more useful man."

The German Youth Movement.

In a recent letter from Philip C. Garrett, was enclosed an address on "The German Youth Movement," delivered by a young German, Walter Ehrenstein, before a group of Woodbrooke students last year. The address is interesting as tracing the growth and purposes of this movement from the point of view of German youth itself. The writer speaks of the movement as a "life impulse," appearing in an epochal way through a "spiritual rebellion."

"The German youth-movement," he goes on to say, "means a progress in the consciousness of freedom. If we regard the life of a child, we see that he forms his own course of development up to his fourth year of age. He gets his information by questioning his father and mother about everything that arouses his curiosity, it may be the moon or the angels. The more he advances in age, the more his liberty becomes restrained. In school, discipline is dominant; in school, he is punished if he does not take pains in branches which are a terror to his nature. Daily his mind is nourished by parents and other adults with their precocious ideas and conceptions. You must not do this or that, but you must act so or so. Early enough his spirit is pressed into Spanish boots. Apparently, youthful age was not equal in value to adult life. It was looked at as an intermediate, not yet, stage. The difference between youth and adult life was believed quantitative, instead of, what it really is, qualitative. (Recent and most important discoveries in experimental psychology have exhibited that the power of visualizing, which is found among a very high percentage of children, is lost in adult age. And not only this faculty is lost as a tribute to age, but many other faculties well.) The youth was the material of which the state could mould its future citizens, and above all, it took care to infuse these future citizens with the greatest respect for the existing order. The root of the evil is expressed by saying that young people were a means to a purpose. Preparation for the struggle for existence of the individual and for the struggle for the nation's existence was the aim of education. The German schoolboy had six hours of strenuous instruction in the morning, and two to three hours of schoolwork in the afternoon. For many, in fact too many, his twelve years of school life mean years without happiness. Morally, they had not brought away much worth mentioning, which they really owed to the influence of the school alone. It is in moral education that schools miss the mark more than one is aware of. In all questions of education all possible authorities are consulted, all but the young educated himself. There is no doubt that the misery of schools forms a fraction of the total sum of human misery, which ought not to be neglected. Full of longing for fellowship, for nature, for love, the young heart of the town child was stretching out, year after year, towards redemption from the tyranny of people with old souls (though well meant). At school, his value was measured by the efficiency of his memory. But he knew well, though he was regarded by the teachers as if such things did not exist, that he had beyond all a hungry and thirsty heart. And not he alone, but many a comrade of his in the same way. The common despair joined them. The new experience of fellowship was their fundamental experience. Their strength for rebellion arose from it. They all felt equally in bondage. The magnificent German landscape; the great number of castles and ruins on the mountains; the silent dense forests, were the scene on which the drama of rebellion was performed. They felt it keenly that they had nothing to gain any more from the precepts of the adult world.

He goes on to say that as the basis of their morality changed from fear and unexplained custom to rationality and freedom, they began to see some of the old values in a new light and were thus strengthened, instead of being left helpless.

It was quite a natural outcome that the youth-movement, which primarily represents a moral renaissance, could not pass by indifferently the person of Christ. Many of them realized that His commands were in accordance with the desires of their own hearts. Their faith underwent the experience of death and revival. What had been antiquated and tedious before, when it was forced on them externally, was born again inwardly out of their own seeking, and was now their own possession. In detail the different divisions of the movement show great variety in their aims, but they all agree with the following: they disapprove of the overwhelming force of the state; they protest against murder in war; against misuse of capital for the exploitation of others. They object to the poisonous influence materially of alcohol and smoking, and cinemas and backstairs literature on the people. The writer himself witnessed a long procession of protest of young people, marching through the streets of Frankfurt a. M., everyone of the three thousand partakers carrying a torch as a symbol. With regard to their criticism of education, they did not stop with the negative side, but realized their conception of freedom in their newly-founded schools.

The teacher now becomes personal friend and companion to the students, with a personal interest in each one. In concluding, the writer points out how the movement, once started, spread rapidly through the higher institutions of learning.

The youth-movement started among pupils of public schools. When they became students, they transplanted the movement into the universities. When they left the university and entered practical life, they remained faithful to their vocation. It spread very quickly among teachers, especially young teachers. At last it took root in the proletariat, so that now you can see many young workmen and women on First-days leaving the towns for fields and woods, instead of going into cinemas and music halls. All this happened with the very minimum of organization, which was regarded as the murderer of a spiritual organism. Those who are spiritually prominent, are leaders without election. They are leaders, because what they do and propose is the concealed wish of their fellows. Several of our best poets, e. g., Hermann Hesse, Waldemar Bonsels, the late Hermann Lons and Stephen George are sharing in the leadership with remarkable philosophers, like Natorp and Messer, Bluner and Eberhard Arnold. There is no limit of age for those who in understanding sympathy can feel with the young, although they may be eighty years of age, they can be youthful in spirit and belong to the youth-movement. Wherever a Wandervogel or a Freideutscher or a Grossdeutscher or a Quickborner or a Jungdeutscher will meet, they recognize one another, not only externally by the Schiller collars of the boys and the picturesque old German clothes of the girls, but also by a new manner of behavior and a certain gleam in their eyes, and with their cheerful greeting "Heil!" they express: We are comrades in a new life, new love, and new hope. . . . (All very good, were it not for the peace treaty.)

THE SEEING EYE.

A new and rather original exhibition of friendship has been called to our attention. It is a tribute paid by the Class of 1910 at Westtown School to one of their former classmates, William C. Engle.

Engle, after leaving school, determined to follow painting and in order to perfect his native talent he not only studied at the Academy of Fine Arts in Philadelphia, but also spent two odd years as a private student under N. C. Wyeth, recently of Chadds Ford.

The Class of 1910 has arranged with Wyeth to paint a picture that will be presented to the School on Alumni Day, Sixth Month 2nd, as a memorial gift to William C. Engle. Happily, Wyeth chose an inspiring and appropriate subject. Before his death, Engle spent much time at the shore. Upon one occasion he described the picture that he should like some day to paint—a picture of the sea with children on the shore gazing across the water toward massed clouds, where a giant strides. It was his thought to catch and hold by such a group that peculiar faculty of children—the seeing eye. The imagination of childhood is a precious thing. Wyeth has succeeded admirably in doing what his pupil and friend did not live to do.

The picture, in addition to its expression of the friendship of a class for a former classmate is an even finer witness of a master's affection for a pupil. It is a definite tribute to friendship.

PAUSE.

Mid afternoon glides by,

The tranquil sun sinks lower in

The west and blue shadows lengthen.

The snipe fly fast along the white foam's edge and whistle as

They swing onward toward the marshes.

The waves break slow and clear like music,

This is the hour when the Children cease their play, to gaze upon

The azure ether of the sky and ocean; where the great ships

Hang or move grandly to their distant havens.

Written by WM. C. ENGLE.

END OF THE YOUNG FRIENDS' NUMBER.

A Remarkable Chapter in Quaker History.

Johan Marcussen, of Denmark.

About sixty years ago there lived a man in the valley, Roldal, in Norway, by the name of Knud. His father's name was also Knud; hence his official name was Knud Knudsen. The name of the little village in which his home was, was Botnen. So the name by which he was known between man and man was Knud Botnen.

Knud was at that time quite a young man. He was married and had three children, two sons and one daughter. The parish in which he lived was beautifully situated near a lake, with high picturesque mountains in the background. The soil was poor and gave but scanty crops for hard and diligent toil. The inhabitants were poor. That is, they had to live in a very economical way. Their little crop of barley and oats was ground together, the flour was baked into big but very thin cakes. After harvest the women would be at that work for about a fortnight, and then they would have a sufficient supply for the whole year. Part of the flour was used almost daily for porridge. They would raise a scanty crop of potatoes; the cows and sheep would give milk, butter and meat; from the lake they would now and then get a few fish, and by this supply they would live just as happily as people in any part of the world.

Here was Knud Botnen's home. He was neither better nor worse off than the rest. If there was any difference, Knud was amongst the most contented. He had always enough, and a little to spare for those who needed it—just a happy man in his possession.

But then something strange began to work in his inner life. He did not know what it was. It seemed to him as if something was wanting. The people in Roldal were religious people and very strict in their doctrines, and Knud had always been amongst the most pious. He had never said much, but his few words always had weight. Now he had said almost nothing. It seemed as if he lived a life by himself, of which nobody else knew anything. He was diligent in reading the Bible, but in that there was nothing strange; that was almost a universal habit in Roldal. Still, Knud's reading was different. It seemed as if something or somebody was teaching him during his quiet walking about, and this teaching was often different from the ordinary conception of truth, and when Knud was reading his Bible he found that the teaching, which was dimly breaking through within him, was also in the Bible. Sometimes Knud took that book and went out to his neighbors. He was that quiet that he would sit in a house for a length of time with his Bible under his arm, perfectly silent. In rising, he would simply point to the book, and, without saying a word, he would leave the house. Sometimes he would read a small portion and then leave.

The people did not know what to think of Knud. Most of them thought he was getting crazy; but then he was always kind and willing to help, and in his home he was the kindest husband and father. Whatever could be the matter with him? It was clear that it had something to do with religion and perhaps the priest would be able to find it out. So one or two went to the priest and told him that their good neighbor, Knud Botnen, had become a little singular; that, although he was as good and kind as ever, or even better, there was something curious about him. It was of a religious character, for he sometimes would say what never before had been heard in Roldal. It was strange, for although he did not say a single word against anybody, it seemed as if he had a source of teaching altogether independent of the church and the priest, and, of course, that could not be right. The priest was very thankful to these men for telling him of such unheard-of, erroneous conduct. He would surely take it in hand before long.

Knud's father was not fully satisfied with the conduct of his son, and his wife's father saw in his son-in-law a developing lunatic, a stain of shame amongst the peaceful inhabitants of Roldal—and in that his daughter and grandchildren should be entangled—that was awful. These two old men talked the matter over and came to the conclusion that it would be best if they could get Knud's wife and children to leave him. So, one day they both appeared at the house of Knud Botnen and laid the matter before him. Well, Knud was silent, as always. After a while he said they had better lay their concern before his wife. If she felt it better to leave him and follow them, he would not hinder her in doing so. But then his wife did not feel that way at all. She had the very best of husbands, and, although his way of thinking was a little different from what was usual, she felt that wherever he was she ought to be, and if his divergency from the usual mode of religion should bring him into trouble of any kind, it would be her duty to help him with anything she was able. Well, the two old men left Knud, his wife and children to struggle along as best they could.

Then came the priest. Of course, he was the shepherd of his flock, the father of his children. "And what is the matter with thee, my son, Knud? Is not the old Lutheran religion good and reliable any more? Hast thou found anything better?"

Knud was silent for a while. Then he tried to explain that he felt something working within himself. He did not know what it was or who it was, but sometimes he felt very much broken. Perhaps it was that he felt he was a sinner. Certainly he was not as good and kind and loving as he ought to be. But then again he felt that immeasurable love and goodness surrounded him everywhere, and he felt himself at times so filled that he found no words fit to explain it, and so he kept silent. When he read his Bible he found it in the most perfect harmony with what he felt in his own inner life. It had become quite a new book to him. The priest listened to him in amazement. Then he murmured: "A teaching within—a teaching direct to the soul—hm. But man, thou art a Quaker; how in the world have these notions been brought into thy head?"

Knud could not tell. He had not been outside of Roldal, and the Bible was the only book he had read. As to the word, "Quaker," he had never heard it before. Perhaps it was the first time it ever sounded in Roldal.

It was very strange. The priest did not know how to handle this matter; but surely, it was necessary it should be stopped as soon as possible. It might spread and bring the good, old church into danger. He explained the matter to the bishop, and he came. Knud Botnen was brought before the bishop, and after some time in silence, he gave about the same explanation to the bishop which he formerly had given to the priest. After having listened to all which Knud had to say, the bishop patted him on his shoulder and said: "Stick firmly to what thou hast got, my son."

This spiritual influence which Knud had felt seemed now to begin its work in others, also. The first man who openly acknowledged the teaching within was Jon Rinden. He and Knud had for several years quiet meetings together, in order to listen to the voice teaching them within. Afterwards came Lars Botnen and a young woman, Knud's sister. Then a blind woman, Eli. And as truth worked its way others joined the little flock, amongst them two brothers, Jon and Ole Oime, and Eli's brother, Mons.

As to the mystic word, "Quaker," which the priest had thrown out, it did not trouble them at all. Most likely it never afterwards entered their thoughts and was forgotten. In Stavanger and neighborhood there had been a small meeting of Friends ever since the beginning of the nineteenth century, but they knew nothing of the spiritual movement in Roldal, and the people of Roldal knew nothing of the Friends in Stavanger.

While this was going on in Norway, there was a man in America, Lindley Murray Hoag, who felt a strange drawing toward Norway. Several times he saw in dreams a lake and houses near it; the lake, houses and meadows being surrounded by high mountains, forming altogether most splendid scenery; and it seemed to him that he was eating fishes caught in that lake. In him was worked out a concern for a visit in the love of the Gospel to Norway.

In the year 1853, Lindley Murray Hoag came by way of London to Stavanger, Norway, and laid his concern before the Friends. Norwegian Friends received him most kindly and several of them, among whom was the able interpreter, Endre Dahl, went with him to all places where Friends were found, and much blessing followed their labors. As they traveled along, Lindley Murray Hoag was looking for that valley and lake, which he so plainly had seen in his dreams when in America, but, although he saw many mountains and many lakes, he did not see anything like that which he saw in his dreams.

One day Endre Dahl told him that they had now been to all the Friends that he knew of. Lindley Murray Hoag became uneasy, and, after a time of quietness, said that he had not yet been to the place which formed the real concern for his journey. A map of Norway was placed before him, but that did not give him any help. He became more uneasy and walked from one end of the room to the other for some time. All of a sudden he stopped and turned toward the mountains in the east. Pointing in that direction, he said: "There, over there, is the place where I must go." They had already been to all places in that direction where Friends were located; but Endre Dahl and some other Friends readily consented to go with him once more.

A place called Sovde was chosen as the first stopping-place. There was a meeting-house, and a meeting was appointed. A man by the name of Bajarne Aaby heard of it. He knew the people in Roldal and felt that he ought to go and tell them of the meeting. It was haying time. When Bajarne Aaby came to Roldal he found the people out haying. He told them his errand, and said, "There is a man from America and some people from Stavanger going to have a meeting at Sovde tonight. They are all Quakers."

Quakers! This was, most likely, only the second time this strange word was heard in Roldal. The people made haste and went to Sovde. When they came to the meeting, Lindley Murray Hoag was preaching, Endre Dahl interpreting. The Roldal people listened with amazement. Was this a new revelation? Did the message come from another world? What had dimly worked for years in the depths of their souls was here put before them in plain language.

The meeting ended. Lindley Murray Hoag wanted to go with the Roldal people, but the road was too difficult for him, over the high mountains. Another road was recommended, longer, but easier. By this Lindley Murray Hoag and the Stavanger people went the next day. As they passed a low chain of mountains, the Roldal valley, with the Roldal river the small villages and the high mountains in the background, lay spread before them in the most brilliant illumination. Lindley Murray Hoag stood for a while like a marble statue. Then he exclaimed: "Oh! this is what I saw in my dreams in America."

Some time before this the people in Roldal had had some difficulty about a marriage. They did not feel it right to enter into marriage before the priest. They thought that their own agreement before the Lord was just as valid as if they had gone through a ceremony of the church, and two young people had acted accordingly. But after a while they became uneasy about it. Knud took the matter in hand. He sat for a long time alone, and in perfect silence. When he spoke about it he explained that he saw dark clouds before him. After a while he saw rays of light coming right from heaven, breaking through the dark clouds and shining on the spot where he sat. When he again spoke to others he said that about the marriage they ought to be perfectly easy. It would come right in due course of time. When Lindley Murray Hoag came they were married after the manner of Friends.

The tithes to the priest caused these people much trouble. They found that the established church, in its teachings and arrangements, was so different from what they read in the Bible about the early church that they found it incorrect to sustain that church and its servants; thence, they could not conscientiously pay the tithes. According to the law, the priest had a right to his tithes, and when the people did not pay it he had a right to distraint, and he used his right. This was felt very much by the people in a place where the soil gave but scanty return for hard labor.

Knud had one year bought and brought home timber and lumber for a new house. The time came when his tithes had to be paid. The priest took all his timber and lumber, and Knud lost what he, with much labor and through self-denial, had gathered.

After the visit of Lindley Murray Hoag, the people in Roldal became connected with the Society of Friends in Stavanger; a meeting-house was built, which was also used as a school-house, and one of the Friends, Mons Winje, acted as teacher.

Through much tribulation, Friends plodded along for several years, and quite a number were added to the church. But it was so hard. Hard work to get the necessities of life, and this made still harder because of the strict laws about the tithes.

News came to Roldal about a country where people were free to act in accordance with true righteousness and to serve God in true love; but that country was far away. However, they talked the matter over, and undoubtedly tried it in prayer before the Lord. Friends were truly united together, and in 1869 nearly fifty persons left Stavanger in a sailing vessel bound for Quebec, Canada, and one day all these people came to Legrand, Marshall County, Iowa. Never before had so many strangers been seen at this small station.

Land was cheap, and every one of these Norwegians was successful in temporal matters. An old school-house was used as a meeting-house for several years. Later on a meeting-house and a school-house were built between Legrand and Dunbar, and were called "Stavanger."

Of their further life and spiritual welfare, I had better not give any account. It would only be my personal impressions. They might be partly correct, but would be in danger of one-sidedness. One thing I feel I must add—I have been told that when Knud was an old man he would sometimes rise in the gallery of the meeting-house and say with much emphasis: "We will have to get back to our old landmarks." Did that old man feel that, as they prospered temporally, they were in danger of growing cold and indifferent to the teaching of the Spirit, the light within?

It has been a great joy to me to gather these facts. I think I will remember as long as I live the emotion and the tears in the eyes of those old men as they told me of their experience many years ago, when they first were gathered into the church of Christ. May the blessing of the Lord go with them and their children after them.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THIRTEEN MOTHERS.

MARGARET T. APPLEGARTH.

Adapted from Everyland.

"Sure! And you should see our girl!" boasted Ignacy. "I should love to see your girl!" the lady smiled. "Why can't I come home with you now?"

So like knights of old escorting Ye Princess Faire, they led her through those ugly streets. "You should to step careful here, Leddy, there's puddles!"

Such a puddle! Like ink. The lady picked her way daintily around it. She looked at the small shanty-houses dingy from showers of soot forever belching out of the factory chimneys; she looked at peoples' front yards littered with tin cans and garbage and cinders; she looked at the trees which the soot and the cinders had robbed of their leaves; she looked at the hills and hummocks of coal piled up, waiting to be shipped to your furnace and mine.

"What a hideous place Coal Town is!" she said to herself; then to the boys: "Is your father a miner?"

"Sure! And you should to see the bucket they lets him down in, Leddy. A awful big bucket, mit lots of other mens. But Popper ain't so scart; he goes down most to the middle of America. We walks around on top of him all day!"

"It's awful dark down there, Leddy."

"It's like cities down there, Leddy, mit streets-from-coal, mit avenues-from-coal, mit little rooms-from-coal."

"Popper whacks at them coal walls all day."

"When Popper comes up on top of America once more, he just drinks und drinks und drinks."

The lady sighed: "Tell me about your mother."

"Mudder, she got dead, Leddy. Sooner Fine-ice was born, see?"

"Fine-ice? Is that your little sister? Who takes care of her, then?"

"You shouldn't to waste pities on Fine-ice, ma'am!" said Ignacy, earnestly. "He takes awful good care of her; we shouldn't to let no neighbor-womens get inside the house!"

"Let's hurry!" cried the lady.

When they came indoors, the Wonderful Lady gathered Finis up into her arms. She gave one look at that cloudy little face; then she buried her own face in the soft little neck. "Oh, dear Friend of Little Children," she prayed, "help me! Help me! And bless this poor starved little baby."

Finis loved it.

It was not like her thirteen mothers. It was not boisterous. It did not volley and thunder. It knew exactly how to hold babies! Finis smiled.

The thirteen mothers smiled vainly.

Then said the lady: "I have the grandest news for you, for in my little house I have some cribs. The cribs are called a 'Day Nursery.' Babies will lie in them all day long while families are away working. For babies get lonely when nobody is home to nurse them. Babies get hungry. Babies get thin. The rosebuds fade from their faces."

The thirteen mothers peered anxiously at Finis: "Should she have got rosebuds?" asked Ignacy.

"She should!" sighed the Wonderful Lady. "I will put them there. You watch!"

So they watched. And it happened. For only twelve months later when they had a "Better Babies" Contest in that town, it was Finis Marchlewicz who won the blue ribbon! Finis, fairer and fatter than you would have believed possible.

"Just see that baby's face!" chuckled the jolly judges, feeling jollier than ever when Finis smiled at them. "Whatever makes any baby in this gloomy Coal Town beam like that?"

Ignacy climbed up on their little platform, tip-toed behind the table with their weighing baskets on it, and whispered into their ears: "Sooner the Leddy brag Jesus on this town, it made a special glad for kids, see?"

A SUGGESTED RETURN TO CHRISTIANITY.

(An editorial note in The Manchester Guardian Weekly for Third Month 2, 1923.)

The Oxford Union Society has approved by 177 votes against 74, a motion contending that the time is now ripe for war enmities to be discarded, and for a friendly attitude to be taken up towards all the peoples who fought against us in the late war. In so doing the undergraduates of the University certainly showed themselves to be nearer to Christianity than the rector of an Oxford parish who recently denounced from his pulpit the generous offer made by certain members of the University to a few German students who are to be received as guests at Oxford for a few weeks in the spring.

Anyone who has visited Germany of late years can testify to the depressing and demoralizing effect upon educated Germans of the moral isolation into which they have drifted since 1914. Terrible as is the financial barrier built up around Germany by the collapse of her currency, rendering as it does any contact with foreign countries almost impossible except for the extremely wealthy, it is nothing to the moral blockade that has been raised against her by those who maintain that the injunction to forgive our enemies is inapplicable when those enemies happen to be Germans.

The Germans, and especially their past rulers, have had their faults, and we have spoken plainly of them here. But to count those faults an excuse for permanently excluding the countrymen of Goethe and Beethoven from all international intercourse is to treat the Gospel as a "scrap of paper." Such is the policy apparently advocated by part of the French and even of the English press. It is not ashamed to fan the half-dead embers of war-time hatreds for the sake of a "stunt," nor to incite its readers to delirium in the miseries of fellow-men simply because they are Germans. The action of the Oxford Union is a timely sign of the nobler temper of a new generation of Englishmen. Unless the example of Oxford is soon followed by Europe at large and worn-out recriminations abandoned in favor of some return to the practice of Christian morality, Germany will become the Ghetto of Europe, with consequences to her neighbors scarcely less lamentable than to herself.

A Day With a By-gone Industry.

Frances Tatum Rhoads.

Violet Oakley, in one of the series of pictures which portrays "the founding of the State," in the capitol building at Harrisburg—that one where William Penn, standing in the vessel's prow, looks across the sea to the fulfillment of his "holy experiment"—has used, on the scroll which decorates the top of the picture, this text from Deuteronomy: "Thy God bringeth thee into a good land of fountains and depths that spring out of the valleys, a land whose stones are iron."

And this, like all the quotations which the artist used to emphasize the meaning of her wonderful paintings, is most appropriate. For it was not long before the early settlers discovered the hidden treasure of the Pennsylvania hills, and began to profit by it.

The Indian tribes along the Manatawny ("the place where we drink") "viewed with dismay the large amount of wood cut for charcoal," says an historian, and though a few Indians were employed about the forges and furnaces, "to their far-sighted chiefs this wholesale destruction of the woodland presented a melancholy picture, and possibly contributed not a little to their disaffection." The time came which they foresaw, when suitable timber for charcoal was almost gone, and by that time the competition of more modern methods and machinery was also to be reckoned with, and the charcoal forges and furnaces were abandoned. But before this time fortunes had been made (and lost) in the iron business, and much of early history and romance clusters about it.

From the beginning Friends had been prominent among the "iron-masters," and, as Pottstown was founded by one of them, it seems quite in keeping that the group of Friends, now resident there, should, several of them, be actively interested in the past as well as the present features of the business.

Some of these Friends had planned an all-day trip, for the benefit of a family of campers among their hills, to visit various old forges and furnaces. When the appointed morning arrived it proved all that could be desired in the way of weather, and we drove merrily out of Pottstown, by the historic "ridge road," to Coventry, our first stopping-place. Having done some previous reading in Swank's "History of Iron," and the beautiful volume, "Forges and Furnaces in the Province of Pennsylvania," issued in 1914 by the Society of the Colonial Dames, we were prepared to see at Coventry not only the site of the forge (now entirely gone), but the mansion where the widow of Robert Grace entertained Benjamin Franklin. This fine old house stands on a hill above the road, near a beautiful cluster of oak trees, and we had expected only to view it from the outside, but one of our hosts was a personal friend of the two ladies who have inherited it, and we were kindly invited to enter and see the paneled room where family tradition says Franklin was entertained, and other interesting and beautiful things associated with the past. It is a fine specimen of an old Colonial home, lovingly preserved.

When our call was ended we sought the walled enclosure of a small burial-ground, across a field from the mansion.

Here lie the bodies of Samuel Nutt, and Thomas Potts, and relatives and descendants—many of the names of which we had been reading were graven on the simple stones beneath the fine old trees.

Our next point was Warwick, where we stopped about noon. This furnace, built in 1737, was the third erected in Chester County, and here the first Franklin stoves were made. Perhaps we, with our modern heating systems, can hardly realize all that this meant. Franklin says, in his Autobiography:—"Having, in 1742, invented an open fire-place for the better warming of rooms, and at the same time saving fuel, as the fresh air admitted was warmed in entering, I made a present of the model to Robert Grace, one of my early friends, who, having an iron furnace, found the casting of the plates for these stoves a profitable thing, as they were growing in demand." They had the words, "Warwick Furnace" in large letters, cast on the front plate. Here also were made pots, kettles, smoothing irons, and other articles of household use.

We were interested to learn that at one time Warwick Furnace was owned and operated by a woman—Anna Nutt, widow of Samuel, who provided in his will that she should have "one hundred and twenty acres of land on the south branch of French Creek, on which to erect a furnace, and also leave to cut as much timber on lands adjacent as shall suffice to erect the same." The firm of "Anna Nutt & Co." seems to have flourished; indeed feminine interest counted for much in the early days of the iron industry. Forges and furnaces were named for wives and daughters—"Elizabeth"—"Isabella"—"Joanna"—and the lady of the manor had a care over all the people employed, prescribing for them in sickness, and looking well to all their wants.

The frame buildings at Warwick are fallen into decay, but the fine stone work in the walls of the great charcoal house is still staunch and strong, though great trees have grown up inside and overtop them. We scrambled down the hill to peer into the top of the furnace, and search among the slag heaps for curious specimens, veined like agate.

Some board seats and a speaker's stand remained from a meeting of the Chester County Historical Society some months before, and as we sat about on them enjoying our generous picnic lunch, we tried to reconstruct the busy scenes of long ago when "twenty-five tons of iron a week" was the usual output. Great business for those times, but how small it sounded when our host compared it with the daily product of a modern furnace!

Old account books show that a few Indians and Negroes were employed as well as Irish and Scotchmen, but the skilled workmen of the old furnaces were usually Germans, and they are especially remembered for their skill in decorating stove plates and "fire-backs." "Many of their designs," says one authority, "are imaginative and fine, if primitive;" and they are a study in themselves, ranging from quaint Bible scenes, to floral and fruit designs, or patriotic figures, of Liberty or Freedom. These early artists traveled from one furnace to another, carrying their moulds with them.

At Hopewell furnace, which was our next stop, the young people of our party, exploring the ancient buildings, came upon an old-time coach, which one of them said, wonderingly, was "fixed up inside just as nice as an automobile, with padded straps to rest your arms, and a cloth lining."

What would the stately dame who journeyed to Philadelphia in that coach when it was new have thought of her companion?

Hopewell is off the main road, among rough wooded hills; and the mansion and workmen's homes—quaint little stone cottages, form a village of themselves, now largely deserted. Here also stoves were made (the writer could remember well one in the nursery, from which in childhood she had spelled the name), and the "furnace lands," at one time, comprised over five thousand acres. "Fifteen thousand cords of wood were consumed annually in making charcoal," we are told.

Joanna furnace was next visited, and then Windsor forge, near Churchtown, and the Welsh mountains. The name of the township, Carnarvon, indicates early Welsh settlers, and one of these, John Jenkins, is said to have lived in a cave or dugout until his house was built, "remains of which are still to be seen," say the historians. We did not find these, but we did see another relic: "a substantial little stone house which was used for the storing of ammunition and food in case of an attack by the Indians." There were Indians all about, but they seem to have been friendly, and one member of the Jenkins family went hunting and fishing with them in his boyhood.

The forges are now gone, but the old mansion with its terraced lawn sloping to the banks of the Conestoga Creek is in excellent preservation, and again we were favored with an inside view. The lady of the house, sitting in her high-backed chair at the front door, smiled on us when she found we were a party of Friends, and that some of us had known her nephew, John Nevin Sayre, through the Fellowship of Reconciliation. She has been an artist and sculptor, and evidently loves her beautiful old home. We might explore the rooms downstairs, if we would "not ask questions," she said. We readily promised; but once within had to make our question marks into exclamation points, for the rooms and hallway were crowded with the most remarkable and question-provoking things. During a little talk which preceded our leave-taking we learned some answers to the questions we could not ask. The Nevins are directly descended from the Jenkins, and there have been some strong characters in the family.

The story has been preserved of one mistress of Windsor in early days who was much distressed by the drunkenness among the men employed at farm and forge. They would frequently come to the table at their boarding-house in a state of intoxication, and her earnest exhortations seemed to have no effect. So, with the help of the women servants, she confiscated the bottles in which they kept their rum, and set them in a row upon the table. Then, appearing while they were at their meal, she told them she had some of their property, and asked each man to claim his own bottle. This they were ashamed to do, so she pleasantly said, "Then they are at my disposal," carried them to an open window, and broke them on the wall outside, assuring them "in a mild but decided voice," says the chronicler, "that if they replaced them by others they would share the same fate."

The old account books of Windsor Forge give a long list of slaves, some with classic names of Greece or Rome, and others, as "Philadelphia Him" and "Lumon Boat," named from the places where they were purchased. The Jenkins were kind masters, and the wedding feast given a favorite slave "Quash," was long remembered in Churchtown.

The sunshine of our long, bright day was fading as we reached "Isabella" furnace, our last stopping-place. It had been evidently more recently abandoned than the others, and was of a more modern type. Here we ate our picnic supper while the last bird-songs sounded from the tree-tops and shadows gathered in the little valley.

Then our three car-loads "re-packed"—we sped along the homeward track to Pottstown and Wernersville. We had gathered much more information and pleasure than these fragments convey.

We had paused to look back at times and people long passed away. And from our day of happy fellowship "among the hills," we brought back a wholesome sense of the fleeting nature of all man's inventions and contrivances, however strong and stable they may appear, however well they perform the tasks of his own day and generation.

WILBUR K. THOMAS CABLES FACTS OF RUSSIAN FAMINE SITUATION.

The Philadelphia Public Ledger carried on the front page of its issue for Fifth Month 3rd a cablegram from Wilbur K. Thomas, Executive Secretary of the American Friends' Service Committee, who is now in Russia making a survey of Friends' work there. This cable, which contains the latest facts received by the Service Committee about the Russian famine situation, reads as follows:

"Moscow, May 2.—Quaker relief units in Russia report that deaths from starvation still are occurring in sections of Pugachev and the Bashkir Republic and that until about August 1st certain sections cannot be supplied with food.

"The reports state that it is too late to ship food from America, but that money can be cabled up until June and further purchases of flour made in other areas.

"All money received by the Quakers and not spent in that way will be used later in reconstruction work, such as for medicines and supplies for hospitals and children's homes, agricultural work and such things as will tend to make the peasants in the famine area self-supporting in another year.

"The effects of the famine, however, will be felt for many years.

"The Quakers appeal to all who believe in the brotherhood of man to help these people in their time of need."

This cable confirms the many previous reports that deaths from famine are continuing in Russia this spring, and that the number of lives saved will depend to an important degree upon the extent to which American relief work is continued.

Many Americans ask: "Admitting that millions are starving in Russia, is America not relieved from responsibility to help by the actions of the Soviet Government?" The reports which usually give rise to this question, are those of the export of grain from Russia, and of the execution of members of the clergy.

A fair answer to this question calls for consideration of a number of points. It should first be realized that a large majority of the millions affected by the famine are peasants who are in no sense responsible for the acts of the government. Condemning innocent men, women and children to death because of the acts of a government over which they have no control is a policy which no American ought to sanction, regardless of his political opinions. In the second place, those who have been in Russia believe that many press reports have given an unfair impression of the facts.

Murray S. Kenworthy, who was formerly Chief of the Quaker Mission in Russia, has made recent statements which throw light on a number of phases of the situation. Relative to the execution of the clergy, he says that while most of the Communists are not affiliated with the Church, the Soviet Constitution guarantees liberty of religious beliefs and exercises.

The government has never attempted to suppress the Church. The greater number of the people of Russia have continued to attend their churches and have not been interfered with by the government.

What the government did was to confiscate certain of the Church treasures on the grounds that the latter were needed to buy grain for the famine sufferers. It did this after having offered the Church an opportunity to dedicate a portion of its treasures voluntarily to this cause, which offer the Church refused to accept. Certain members of the clergy resisted the confiscation, most of them being members of the old Zarist party. They were accordingly tried on the charge of resisting the government. Americans are similarly tried when they resist the edicts of our national government.

In the matter of grain exports, Murray S. Kenworthy says that all indications point to the fact that any exports of grain which have been made were not for purposes of radical propaganda as indicated in the press, but in return for locomotives and agricultural machinery. Russia has never manufactured these things herself, and her stock of them has been greatly depleted since the war. Without proper locomotives she cannot transfer grain to the famine zone, and without agricultural machinery she is hampered in reconstructing her agricultural life and bringing the famine to an end. The grain which she exports to secure these things, therefore, will probably result in saving more lives than it would if held for food. Owing to the depreciation of her currency, Russia has no means of paying for foreign purchases at present except in grain.

The Quaker workers report that the government is shipping seed grain into the famine zone, advancing loans for the purchase of horses to re-stock the peasants, and otherwise helping to meet the famine situation. The help which it is rendering, however, is inadequate to meet the situation, and the bare fact remains that unless America continues to send a large amount of relief, large numbers of innocent people will die of hunger.

THE PURPOSE AND GENERAL PLAN OF THE MESSAGE WORK OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

On account of the great war many people have had their faith in God rudely shaken. This is particularly true of the war-stricken countries, where thousands of people have been led to question the tenets of the Christian faith. Because Friends generally refused to participate in the war and recognized no enemies, many of these people have come to think they see in us a spirit different from that which actuates the politicians and leaders in world affairs.

As a result of this the Message Committee of the American Friends' Service Committee has been under deep concern to know what course to follow. It has ever been the purpose of the Service Committee to spread the message of love and goodwill and to do its part in establishing the Kingdom of Heaven upon earth. The Service Committee has supported constructive work in France and other countries when the forces of destruction were everywhere at work, and has fed the hungry regardless of nationality and creed, not only because people were in need, but also to express in an active way the Christian message of goodwill. It has been difficult, however, to carry this message without laying ourselves open to the criticism of seeking to build up our own denomination. We feel it desirable, therefore, to make a statement of the different kinds of activities that we believe we should engage in and in which we are all united.

At present the following lines of activity seem open to us:

(a) Personal visits from those who feel the concern of such a message, to those people in Europe who are also seeking a better way of life and whose contact with Friends has already opened a door for friendly visits of this sort.

(b) The printing of literature explaining the principles which have actuated our service and its distribution to such groups of individuals as ask for it. Such literature would be partly translations of books and papers already in existence and partly written to fill special needs. We feel it advisable to have a permanent representative in the countries where the opportunity is greatest, who could keep us informed as to needs of this sort, and could perhaps place articles in periodicals there, and in turn send us articles of interest which we could use in helping to create a better understanding of these countries here. Another line of work would be the placing of historical material dealing with the Society of Friends, its origin and work, in university and public libraries so that they might be available for investigators and students.

(c) In order to further these activities, the establishment of Quaker centres in various countries, and especially in the larger cities, where travelers and foreigners can be helped to get in touch with the people who are most vitally interested in working for better international relationships.

(d) The encouraging of an interchange of lectures by men and women who are vitally interested in cultivating a better international spirit, and assisting in the exchange of students and teachers.

NOTES ON THE MESSAGE WORK.

A LETTER recently received by the Friends' Centre in Berlin from a resident of Breslau, illustrates the help given by the Message work in assisting those who are seeking light on the problems of personal religion.

The writer having become disillusioned of his previous religious faith, "began to wait until the Lord should show him his way."

"The Society of Friends became known to me," he writes, "when the Quakers' charitable work in behalf of German children was started. I was interested from the beginning, as I had never yet met with such love and devotion toward the children of so-called enemies. My five children were then below the age of fourteen, and they imbibed the warm sunshine of the Quakers' real Christian love together with the food; this woke in me the Divine spark that had been nearly extinguished under the ashes of my crumbled faith."

Later, the writer attended a public meeting, addressed by an American Friend, in which the people of Breslau gathered to hear about the spirit which had inspired the Quakers to undertake their child-feeding work. "This address," continues the letter, "replete with the Christian spirit as it was, awoke new hope in my breast. I then obtained some literature about the origin and work of the Quakers."

The writer later corresponded with the Friends' Centre in Berlin. His letter continues:—

"To my letter of the 23rd instant you reply on the 25th that there exists no group of Friends in Breslau. I was very much astonished at this news and suddenly felt deserted by the whole world. But no! Not deserted. I have now friends in Berlin, in England, in America and even nearer—in Breslau itself. God will give me the strength to bring them together—and God did give me strength.

"On the first of Second Month at seven o'clock we had the first Meeting at our house,—just a few dear friends who joined me in waiting on the Lord. Others have promised to come to our next meeting. I was extremely pleased to have at least made a foundation for a local Breslau Centre, and rendered thanks to God, praying for His blessing.

"Evidently God's blessing was on our first meeting, which we conducted as well as possible on Quaker principles. The whole gathering felt the presence of the Lord and all looked forward eagerly to assembling together soon again. I read aloud and discussed the pamphlet 'On Waiting on the Lord,' which you, dear friends, had sent me among other things. It became clear to us that we must wait for the spirit of the Lord in our meetings, and that the spirit of the Lord is revealed to us not only in one member of the gathering at a time, but in each one partially, so that the meeting is more profitable than if the opinion prevailed that only one was called upon to proclaim or explain the word of God."

The letter closes with a request that the Berlin Centre send them instructions regarding their future meetings, so that these may be conducted "in the true spirit of Christian love as it is recognized by the Society of Friends."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THE HONFLEUR CONFERENCE (Seventh Month 22nd to Eighth Month 12th)—At the picturesque fishing-town of Honfleur on the Norman coast, a conference for the study and discussion of international questions is being arranged for the summer of 1923, under the auspices of members of the Society of Friends. It is planned to hold short courses of study on such subjects as modern history, sociology and economics, and to have as well, numerous lectures by men and women specially qualified to speak on international questions. It is intended also to hold lectures and discussions on new social ideas and problems, and upon matters of historic and artistic interest.

Among the lecturers will be Jeanne Melin, Lucie Dejarin and Jean Longuet; the lectures will be given in both French and English.

Honfleur is easily reached in forty minutes by daily boat from Havre. The town is of unusual interest and beauty, and the surrounding country affords delightful opportunities for excursions on foot or by bicycle. Among those responsible for the Conference we recognize the familiar names of Sophia M. Fry, T. Edmund Harvey, William I. Hull, Rufus M. Jones, J. Henry Scattergood, Wilbur K. Thomas, Carolena M. Wood, Mary Kelsey and others.

DR. INGE, Dean of St. Paul's, London, in the Church Family Newspaper, of Fourth Month 6th says:—

"One of the most prevalent of modern errors is what a German might call Demokratismus, the notion that unless the Church can somehow, by hook or by crook, collect the largest crowd before the narrow gate, the Church has failed. Instead of the Church judging the world, the world, the vox populi, is to judge the Church. We have surely forgotten the warning, 'Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you, for so did their fathers unto the false prophets.' As Benjamin Whichcote says: 'The longest sword, the strongest lungs, the most voices, are false measures of truth.' The Quakers, who in many ways are the best Christians we have, set a good example in being quite indifferent to numerical success. They have only 150,000 members, but their spiritual influence is as great as that of the most imposing among the Churches."

LARGEST BIBLE ORDER.—The largest single Bible order ever placed by any organization in the United States, perhaps in the world, has just been given by the American Bible Society to a firm in New York City. One million, five hundred thousand volumes of Scripture portions, consisting of the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, the Book of Acts, and the Book of Proverbs in English and Spanish constitute this order. These little books are to be uniform in size, sixty-four pages each, with a separate heavy cover, and will be sold throughout the United States and South America for one cent each. This is the first time since the war period that the Society has been able to produce these volumes at this price. Before the first deliveries had been made, advance orders to the number of 800,000 had been received.

APPRECIATION from abroad of the work that the Friends' Literature Committee is doing has taken the form of a contribution towards its funds from the members of the Friends' Meeting at Madras.

THE Boston University School of Religious Education has recently issued the result of a wide survey, among other items is the statement that of the fifty-six students of Indiana who have as one of their major studies, a course in the Bible, Earlharn leads the list with thirty. It also gives Earlharn the position as leader in the plan and scope of Bible Study.

THE practice of "recording ministers" in the Society of Friends had an interesting origin and in many places it still maintains with strong support on the part of the "weight of the meeting." The Friend (London) states that one Quarterly Meeting recently, after widespread discussion, was almost unanimously in favor of continuing the practice, and a minute is being sent to Yearly Meeting accordingly.

Another Quarterly Meeting, held near the same time, decided that it was prepared to discontinue the practice of recording Ministers.

A LEADING Northern Church of England clergyman, Dr. Claye, Rector of St. Thomas's, Stockport, addressing his congregation gathered at a solemn service of recollection on the anniversary of the Crucifixion of Christ, said that the portions of the service devoted to silent prayer were, in his view, the most important parts of the service.

NOTICES.

A CONFERENCE will be held at Coatesville Meeting House, Fifth Month 19, 1923. Two sessions, afternoon session to begin at 3.30 p. m., Standard Time. Box supper with coffee and cocoa furnished. All interested Friends are most cordially invited to attend.

A MEETING for Divine worship will be held at the home of Albert M. Way, Drexel and Somers Avenues, Drexel Hill, Penna., at 3.00 p. m., First-day, Sixth Month 3rd. Members of both branches of Friends and others are invited.

MEETINGS for worship will be held regularly on First-day mornings at Birmingham during the summer, beginning Fifth Month 20th, at ten o'clock, Standard Time. Any Friends wishing to attend the meeting and having no means of conveyance may address Dr. Wm. T. Sharpless, West Chester, Pa.

An appointed Meeting for Worship will also be held on the afternoon of Fifth Month 20th, at two o'clock, Standard Time.

THE Young Friends' Eastern Conference will have its complete program ready to publish in the next issue of Friends' papers. It has been carefully planned with an eye to rest as well as to instruction. Classes are arranged for the morning only, as are the devotional groups and the Open Lecture, the latter to be given by Rufus M. Jones, of Haverford. The afternoon will be given over to recreation and organized sports under trained leaders. The beautiful Westtown lake provides for swimming and canoeing, both of which will be allowed only when the lake is officially "opened" and guarded. Tennis and baseball will take care of those who prefer land sports. Camp suppers and "roasts" by the lake are on the schedule, too.

Five of the English young Friends who will be traveling in America this summer will attend the Conference to strengthen the bonds of fellowship between the Youth of the Society in these two countries. Hertha Kraus, a leader of the Youth Movement in Germany and closely associated with the Relief work there, will give one of the evening lectures.

Anyone desiring information in regard to any of the Conference plans, may write to Mary J. Moon, at 20 S. Twelfth Street, or Elizabeth Ann Walter, 154 N. Fifteenth Street, Philadelphia.

MARRIED.—Fifth Month 1st, at Jordans, WILLIAM LITTLEBOY, of Selly Oak, Birmingham, England, to EDITH M. WINDER, until recently Hostess of Woolman School, Swarthmore, Penna.

BORN.—To Harold M. and Pauline R. S. Lane, Sapporo, Japan, Third Month 2, 1923, a daughter, who has been named Marjorie.

DIED.—At his home in Woodland, N. C., Fourth Month 16, 1923, JOSIAH COPELAND, in his seventy-ninth year, a life-long member of Rich Square Monthly Meeting of Friends.

THE LAW OF EXPEDIENCY.

Were wisdom in the scorn of consequence."

Some of us, who in our early years conned the sober pages of Dymond's "Essays on Morality," have arrived at a deepened conviction that mankind owes a great debt to the author; that until the Christian world accepts without omission or evasion, Dymond's philosophy regarding God's will as the primary rule of morality, it will flounder about in hopeless weakness and indecision; and that Dymond's attack upon Archbishop Paley's captivating Law of Expediency still continues to be a needed contribution to clear thinking and forward marching.

The Christian world is indeed far from having arrived at Dymond's point of view. The trouble and danger of living up to the Divine commands "in scorn of consequence," to borrow Tennyson's phrase, or the apparent hopelessness of reaching thereby a desirable end has made it easy for us to say in conduct at least, "Let us do evil that good may come." For instance, a certain much-used member of a popular church asserts that she does not hesitate to tell a falsehood if it makes for gain in a good work. Those of us who do hesitate to speak thus know how easy it is, if caught unawares, to use little untruthful admissions because we seek to avoid the unpleasant results of plainness of speech, or because we enjoy the pleasant results of a smooth tongue.

But it would be wearisome to try to show the full extent to which the expedient usurps the place of the right and the true. We shall but consider one patent example—the arguments of Christian professors in defence of particular wars, "Three-fourths of the thinking people today believe in peace," said a speaker at the Bluffton Conference. And yet scarcely one-fourth or even one-tenth will be true peace men in time of war. Something happens which makes them assert that the peace theory must be set aside. "Men hate war, men use it—the end justifies the means." Christianity must go. "Yes, war is un-Christian," says the clergyman, "but for the present I shall have to uphold it." "I will hang up my Christianity on a peg until the war is over and then hope to be forgiven." This defection is really dreadful—we use the term advisedly—but it is characteristic of the course of multitudes. It is a flat rejection of Christianity, and an assumption that Christ had not enough wisdom to frame a code of morals by which men can live. It is largely responsible for the long delay in the coming of the promised era when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation."

To point a moral we would introduce an impressive scene witnessed within the past year. It was a hot First-day afternoon and there were gathered in a place of worship at the little Mennonite settlement of Bluffton, Ohio, the delegates of the sects in this country who opposed war on religious grounds—Dunkers or Brethren, Schwenkfelders, Mennonites and Friends—a mere handful among the millions of church-goers in the United States. Visitors, however, were there from the surrounding district, so that the house was well filled. The audience had come to listen to young men give their experiences as conscientious objectors during the war, and to affirm their intention of living for peace.

All seemed auspicious. At the conclusion of the pre-arranged speeches the presiding officer called on the audience for further expression on the subject. In response a young man from the back of the room came forward with an air which betokened serious purpose. Taking his place at the pulpit, he told us he had convictions which he thought it his duty to put before us. He hated to take life, even down to the destruction of animals. "But," he said with emphasis, "war cannot be avoided." We were not unfamiliar with this assertion, but somehow the Conference itself had been so one-sided, so unanimous in its peace pronouncements, that the young man's bold declaration stirred us wide awake. He referred to the wars of history, to the invasion of Europe by the Saracens, and their repulse by the army under Charles Martel in 732. What would have happened had the invaders not been stopped by force of arms? Civilization would have been destroyed, Mohammedanism established over Europe. What would have happened at the time of the American Revolution if all the Colonists had been pacifists? Civil liberty would have had its death-blow. What would have happened in '61 if the Federal government had allowed the South to secede without armed resistance? The Union would have been destroyed, slavery would have had a new lease of life. What would happen now if, when attacked as individuals, we raise no gun to defend ourselves or those of our own household? Who could bear the deserved stigma of such cowardice?

He ceased, marched back to his seat. The tension was great. We were not converted by his earnest assertions, but we were in doubt how they would be met. The presiding officer called upon the head of the Philadelphia delegation to make reply. This Friend arose from the floor of the house and slowly his commanding figure ascended the platform.

THE FRIENDS COOPER

Briefly, quietly, impressively, he stated the attitude of the Christian pacifist. His defence was on this line:—"We are not here to consider 'safety first.' Our contention is that we must strive to obey the commands of Christ, under all circumstances, at all hazards. We believe that the law of love is never to be violated even under provocation by our enemies. War is undeniably an exhibit of the passions that Jesus condemns, therefore we repudiate it and all its evil train. Hence, in loyalty to Him, a loyalty greater than that which we owe to the powers of this world, we must bear what they are allowed to inflict and trust God for our protection and justification. Those dependent upon us must also learn this same truth, and not expect us for their sakes, dear though they are to us, to cast aside our allegiance to our Heavenly Leader."

This imperfect paraphrase will fail to produce the effect then and there produced on the minds of the audience, when we felt, to use the ancient expression that "Truth reigned." Whether the young man, who was said to be a member of the American Legion, and a school teacher, was similarly reached, is not for us to say.

We would refer readers of THE FRIEND to a forcible article in the current number of the Atlantic Monthly—"The Test of Faith," by Edward Richards, which bears especially on the point brought out by the foregoing episode. It shows how a pacifist risks all for his cause, and how protection is given where force would most likely have failed. In fact, Christians now, being "the heir of all the ages," can look back and see how again and again the expedient has proved to be the inexpedient, how the idealist has proved to be the most practical of men, and how "wisdom is justified of her children." It is a profitable study.

Joel and Anna K. Cadbury.

"Lovely and pleasant were they in their lives and in their death they were not divided." So strikingly fitting were these words that they were repeated many times in connection with the passing of our two loved friends from life here to the fuller life beyond. As the ranks of our older friends have grown thin these past months by the loss to us of a number who have done valiant service, we find ourselves clinging to their memories with a yearning tenderness and a desire to know more of their virtues, to understand better the sources of their power, that we on whom their service falls may better fit ourselves for the duties which their going lays upon our shoulders.

One trait of both Joel and Anna K. Cadbury was a very deep and abiding love for the Society of Friends and a keen interest in all its affairs. One of the children has spoken of the impression that came to them when, as little children, they heard the matters of the meeting discussed in the family group. The love and interest of the parents was so spontaneous and so evident that the earliest recollection of the children was associated with the Society and its work. Both of our friends served long and ably as Clerks of their Monthly Meetings and then as Clerks of their Quarterly Meetings. They were both Overseers of long standing and even after illness made it impossible for Anna Cadbury to leave her home, she did faithful and acceptable work as Overseer, by correspondence. Many a grateful heart among our absent women members will remember her letters of sympathy and cheer. Joel Cadbury was for over twenty years an Elder and his wise and helpful counsel will be keenly missed. He had a rare gift of gentle tact and rare sympathy and humor which made themselves felt as much by the grace of his presence as by his spoken word. This grace of Christian courtesy and sympathy he carried everywhere, on trains and trolleys and street, in the round of business and most beautifully in his own home. He lived among us in the commonplace of everyday and "wist not that his face was radiant."

Education was another constant interest of our friends, and their love of young people was always evident. Their home was cordially open to them and both were deeply interested in finding opportunities for boys and girls to get to college who otherwise could not have gone, especially in encouraging girls when going to college was not so popular for women as it is today. All of their six children went to college. Anna Cadbury was a teacher before her marriage. She was for one year Assistant Teacher at Westtown School and then held a position at Germantown Friends' School. She was a wide awake and progressive teacher and had prepared herself by a special course of training, unusual, at that time, for the work she had chosen. After her marriage she continued her interest in education. Besides the careful and intelligent oversight of her own children's training, she was on the Committee in charge of Western District Colored School and both she and her husband served for a number of years on the Westtown Committee. Both gave largely and widely of their money to schools and colleges and other educational interests and were alert and open-minded to the new movements and developments in education.

After the Civil War Joel Cadbury and several of his brothers and sisters were actively engaged in Friends' work for the Freedmen of the South and he retained his interest in the education and uplift of colored people throughout his life. The personal association which both of them held with colored people was beautifully free from race prejudice and some of their colored friends have spoken gratefully of the real democracy of their feeling.

For thirty years Joel Cadbury served efficiently on the Board of Directors of the Friends' Hospital, at Frankford, and gave liberally of time and strength to its interests till the time of his death.

No tribute, however brief and inadequate, should omit a reference to the home life of Joel and Anna Cadbury. In these days when so many influences militate against the harmony and unity of the home, one wishes that such a one as theirs might stand out as a shining example of what a Christian home may be. The source of its beauty and strength was a religious faith so sincere and natural that it unconsciously permeated every phase of life and a mutual love so deep and strong that it met every experience of life without variable-ness or shadow of turning. Unselfish service was its keynote. Small wonder one entered such a home with a sense of rest and remained to share its peace. There was always a fine simplicity in their hospitality, a freedom from any display, which did not change with changing fortune or fashion. With this was combined a beautiful sincerity and cordiality which went straight to the heart of the guest. Because of the family connections in England, friends and relations from there found the hospitable door open and visiting Friends from many quarters shared the welcome of the home. For some twenty years the home life centered around Anna Cadbury because of a long and distressing disability which kept her from going outside it. These years of suffering, often intense, she met with a high courage and an indomitable fortitude which only those who knew her best really realized. Always alert and eager of mind, she kept in touch with the outside world surprisingly. Many of her friends recall the bright smile and outstretched hand of welcome which made one forget the pain-racked body, so did the brave spirit dominate the frail flesh. Her cheer and courage radiated being her little circle and gave inspiration to many a life she could not directly touch. And through these years of testing and suffering the love between husband and wife only deepened and ripened into finer, sweeter comradeship. Nothing could exceed his tender devotion and thoughtfulness for her slightest comfort; always she responded with grateful appreciation and loving fellowship. It seemed strangely sweet that two lives so beautifully united here, of those who had plighted faith fifty years and more ago to be loving and faithful till death should separate them, should find even death could not stand between and should go with only a few short hours interval into the presence of Him whom they loved.

The joint funeral at Twelfth Street Meeting House was a very solemn and impressive one. Many besides Friends were present. Members of the meeting, business associates, employees, neighbors and loving personal friends came to pay the tribute of friendship and grateful affection. Many vocal expressions witnessed to the strength and beauty and helpfulness of their lives. One of the daughters fitly expressed their legacy to us of the younger generation, when she said her parents had taught them to keep their minds open to the truth wherever they might find it and not to fear to follow where it led.

With all their devotion to the Society, it was no blind traditionalism which they held. They were open-minded and wise with a sweet reasonableness, always ready to follow in the path of right and true progress. With clear judgment and steady devotion they followed where they felt the Divine Guide led. These words from Browning seem very fitting for them both:—

"One who never turned his back, but marched breast-forward,
Never doubted clouds would break,
Never dreamed though right were worsted, wrong would triumph,
Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
Sleep to wake."

LORD PARMOOR ON THE RUHR SITUATION.

Lord and Lady Parmoor invited a number of influential people to their London house some weeks ago to hear accounts of the latest conditions both in occupied and unoccupied Germany.

The pronouncements made by Lord Parmoor on the situation are noteworthy because of his standing both as a lawyer and as a Churchman. He said:—

"Why is it that more than four years after the Armistice, Europe is still so far removed from a general peace settlement? The answer is to be found in the continuing prevalence of a war spirit, running along the same channels as in the period before and during the war. Bad acts are the outcome of a false psychology. In some ways the war enmity has been intensified by the horrors of the war time. This is the real explanation of the Ruhr invasion so manifestly inconsistent with a near settlement of the reparation problems. On the alleged plea of security this invasion is inevitably founding an era of insecurity, not only for this generation, but for future ages. The moral evil is a hundredfold worse than the material one. You can murder peace as certainly as Macbeth could murder sleep.

"We who were parties to the Treaty of Versailles and who refused then to assent to the project of the occupation of the Ruhr district, cannot escape the burden of responsibility to which our national honor is pledged. The way of peace may be difficult but it must be pursued persistently. Two points are to be emphasized. No one can tell into what fatal conditions we may drift. No further facilities of any kind should be given in or over the territory occupied by British troops. We must also unhesitatingly and in language not capable of a double meaning, utter our protest against any form of open or veiled interference with transport or train service which might bring famine and famine diseases into the occupied area."

THE DAY LABORER.

DEAR FRIEND:—

Thou may remember T. J. Battev quoting a verse or verses in the "Select Meeting," Yearly Meeting week.

They impressed me as quite beautiful, and when the opportunity offered, I asked him of their author.

He could not remember, but said he would like to send them to me. I have wondered whether they would interest the readers of THE FRIEND.

M. E. S.

"In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand, for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good." (Eccles. xi: 6.)

The following poem, bearing the above title, is copied from No. 11 of a series of printed "Leaflets for Letters," issued in Philadelphia more than fifty years ago by the Protestant Episcopal Book Society, No. 1224 Chestnut Street. Neither name of author nor date is given.

Sow ye beside all waters,
Where the dew of heaven may fall;
Ye shall reap if ye be not weary,
For the Spirit breathes o'er all.
Sow, though the thorns may wound thee—
One wore the thorns for thee;
And though the cold world scorn thee,
Patient and hopeful be.

Sow ye beside all waters,
With a blessing and a prayer:
Name Him whose hand upholds us,
And sow thou everywhere.
Sow, though the rock repel thee,
In its cold and sterile pride;
Some cleft there may be riven,
Where the little seed may hide.

Fear not, some will flourish;
And though the tares abound,
Like the willows by the waters
Will the scattered grain be found.
Work while the daylight lasteth,
Ere the shades of night come on;
Ere the Lord of the vineyard cometh,
And the laborer's work is done.

Work! in the wild waste places,
Though none thy love may own,
God guides the down of the thistle
The wand'ring wind hath sown.
Will Jesus chide thy weakness,
Or call thy labor vain?
The word that for Him thou hearest,
Will return to Him again.

Oh! with thine heart in heaven,
Thy strength—in thy Master's might,
Till the wild waste places blossom
In the warmth of a Saviour's light.
Watch not the clouds above thee;
Let the whirlwind round thee sweep;
God may the seed-time give thee,
But another's hand may reap.

Have faith, though ne'er beholding,
The seed burst from its tomb,
Thou know'st not which may perish,
Or what be spared to bloom.
Room on the narrowest ridges
The ripened grain will find,
That the Lord of the harvest coming
In the harvest sheaves may bind.

Impressions of the Far East.

William C. Allen.

Eight years have elapsed since my last visit to the Far East. Many changes have taken place in that time. The material development has been great. The traveler entering the harbor of Yokohama is immediately impressed with the modern conditions in front of the Japanese background. He proceeds to Tokyo on one of the little trains that connect Yokohama with Tokyo and discovers in many respects the same situation. Tokyo, Yokohama and Kobe have become cities of tremendous vitality and influence. Whilst many streets in Tokyo are as full as ever of the charm and picturesque-ness of Japanese life, and old-time scenes delight the man from the west as he wanders through the midst of one or two-storied houses and shops, the newer parts of the city, for instance near the Imperial Palace, the new, big railway station and the Ginze—the principal shopping street—are being made over. Large office buildings, big shops, handsome bank buildings and fine club houses appear in every direction as far as the eye can reach. An immense hotel will succeed the small hostleries of the past when it shall have been completed. In Yokohama and Kobe have sprung into being great docks capable of accommodating the largest vessels, whilst warehouses spread along the waterfronts for miles. The great factories of Kobe and Osaka pour forth volumes of smoke which can be observed miles away. The harbors of Yokohama and Kobe are not only thronged with innumerable sailing craft of every size and description, including the humble sampan and gallant ships from foreign ports, but also with continually arriving and departing steamships from all around the globe. San Francisco harbor with her masts and smokestacks looks like an annex only to the infinitely greater activities of these seaports of Japan. The traffic among Oriental countries surpasses the belief of the Western man until he has seen it for himself. As to Japan he sees that a mighty nation has come into being over night.

Whilst the business men of the largest cities of Japan have adopted western clothing—and certainly not improved their personal appearance thereby—the women of Japan still wear the fascinating garments used by them for countless generations. Whilst business is in the very air, whilst the streets resound with strange cries, and whilst all is bustle and activity, our Japanese friends of the higher classes have not forgotten the old-time courtesy and dignity which characterized them years ago; that some of these attributes may have been lost to some extent among the masses probably as a result of imitation of western ways, but not all. The rickshaw men are as courteous as ever. I have never been overcharged by them. I recall how one morning in Tokyo, during my visit in 1922 to that city, I dropped work and took a rickshaw ride accompanied by my faithful camera. My kourma stopped whenever I bade him, whilst I would dismount and snap some suggestive scene. He became highly interested and took particular pains to lead me to beautiful spots of which I had been quite ignorant. In Hibiya Park he led me to a quiet spot where were glorious masses of azalias in full bloom—red, red, everywhere in the glowing sunlight. The perfect riot of reds, scarlets and magentas was beyond description—acres of blinding color surrounded by trimmed greenery and flowers! I have seen manifold dazzling effects in gardening in many lands, but never such a magnificent display as this massive solidity of reds. Japan, in the rush of commercial expansion, is not forgetting the beauty and the art that adorned her in the past.

There are immense business operations in Japan. Her captains of industry, her wizards of finance do not always deal with small figures. Thus the Mutsumi Bussan Kaisha, Limited, has a paid-up capital of one hundred million yen. The Oriental Steel Company, Limited (I waive its Japanese name) has a capital of forty million yen; Suzuki & Company, a full-paid capital of fifty million yen; the Mitsui Kosan Kaisha (mining) has capital of one hundred million yen, and so forth. The great department store of Tokyo, Mitsukoshi, in some respects excels the leading shops of the great cities of China with its display of goods, its grand marble staircase, its escalator, its rest rooms for women and children. Some Japanese banks have paid-up capital as follows: The Bank of Chosen, fifty million yen; the Bank of Taiwan, forty-five million yen; the Yokohama Specie Bank, Limited, one hundred million yen; the Mitsui Bank, Limited, sixty million yen. A yen equals half a dollar of American money. Some good-sized banking concerns of America or Europe look small in comparison with a few of the banks of the Far East. China also has some great banking companies.

When we go to China we there discover wonderful progress within the past few years despite the military and political upheavals that have distracted that country of recent time. Glance, for instance, at Southern China. It is true that the British Colony of Hong Kong with its tide of business and scenic beauty, its population and vast shipping and commercial interests, is only about one hundred miles from Canton, China. It is true that these great cities do not seem to have been able to construct even a motor road between them. At the same time Canton, under purely Chinese management and disturbed by occasional revolutions, is making rapid strides towards modern conditions. The Bund, the broad strait by the river front, has become one of the great city thoroughfares of the world. Within a few years it has been lengthened and the land side of it has been improved with substantial shops and commercial houses. The river teems with countless vessels of every description and is alive with hundreds of thousands of sweltering, toiling coolies. The old city wall is being taken down and a wide street is taking its place. Broad boulevards are being relentlessly cut through the old-fashioned, dirty, hideously narrow streets in different directions.

While in Canton I stopped at the Christian College, which is the most important educational centre for all South China. The student body numbers over 800 and there are over 100 instructors, native and foreign. In the higher courses a large portion of the students are Christians, most of them having become publicly affiliated with the Christian faith since living there. They constitute a fine group of young people. Not only does the Christian influence run deeply and broadly from the faculty to the students, but much attention is paid to instruction calculated to develop the material interest of that part of the country. Thus a department for the extension of the silk industry on scientific lines is winning much approval and support from leading Chinese and recently from the farmers who, at first, were opposed to innovations on such lines. Professor Howard, in charge of this work, conducted me over the buildings devoted to his fascinating enterprise and revealed its practical operation—a wonderful story alone.

I addressed the student body on several occasions, once upon the subject of Internationalism, and received a warm response and sympathy to my appeals. At the same time it was recognizable that past insults and commercial exploitation poured upon China for decades by so-called Christian powers, have created the feeling that militarism—as much as they dislike it—may yet force them to resent the treatment they have received and become their hope of securing redress in future years. One horribly humid and blistering hot evening I addressed some 200 earnest men in the Y. M. C. A. in Canton.

Illicit opium traffic continues and is increasing. It is stated that those who are appointed to uphold the law are often engaged in the business. Piracy still exists on the rivers and about the shores of China. The steamship on which we traveled between Canton and Hong Kong had armed guards aboard who paced the deck with guns across their shoulders. It is said that the attitude of the people towards political questions is generally unsatisfactory. Idol worship has been increasing during the past few years. A writer on this subject says, "One reason for this may be found, perhaps, in the activities of the military party and in some of the large temples in the interior one may see votive offerings inscribed with the name of one or another military unit." This is very similar to what one sees in Christian places of worship where memorials are erected to the memory of military men, and, I presume, where none are ever seen to those who have suffered because of their adherence to the pacific teachings of the Sermon on the Mount. Christians and non-Christians are in some fundamental aspects very much alike.

The position of women in China steadily improves despite the conservatism of the people. Women constitute but thirty-eight per cent. of the Christian Church membership, whilst girls number but seventeen per cent. of the enrolment in the mission high schools. Some of the most delightful women I have ever met with in my life have been those connected with educational institutions in China. In attractive personality, dignity, mental equipment and intellectual power these ladies compare with any in the world.

Of course during my somewhat limited experiences on this last trip to the Far East I met with foreigners who are opposed to the missionary movement in the Far East. These people do not know what they are judging. I met also with men and women who consider it absolutely necessary that the people of the Far East be held by the strong arm of a military policy. These advocates of force fail to recognize the change that is coming—they do not understand that reason and justice are to be the substitutes if future peace is to be maintained. During this visit to the Orient I met with a well-known general with whom I had numerous conversations regarding these matters. He is a fine man. He claimed to be a pacifist and, without doubt, sincerely so. We could not tally ideas on all points, although we did fully agree as to the general policies that should be pursued to avert war. Probably our respective positions were found in his remark as we parted, "Speak softly but carry the big stick—it is the only thing they respect;" whilst I replied, "But the trouble is that one big stick always creates opposing big sticks, and that the whole system is contrary to Jesus Christ." I hope to enjoy future friendship with him.

China continues to suffer economically from the Great War. There are two types of business men and statesmen. Business men and rulers in Christian lands who inaugurate foreign commercial policies and push propaganda in order to establish those policies are often—not always—indirectly responsible for the unnumbered afflictions of countless millions of non-Christians, who learn to hate us because of our wars. These so-called "heathens" recognize that the situation is largely rooted in greed and in competitive efforts to exploit them and remote portions of the earth. I have within the past twelve months met with stories everywhere which have revealed the deep-seated resentment of the dark and yellow races towards the white and dominant races, because the latter, whilst in some respects developing their resources and contributing to their comfort, have attained these ends at the expense of national pride and racial aspirations with machine guns and gunboats. Of latter time "Christian" dominance has in some instances been attained by bombing from the air innocent women and children. I have heard it declared by foreigners resident in the Far East that the inhabitants of those countries have lost respect for, and confidence in, the western nations since the failure of the latter to observe the terms of the Treaty of Versailles and their squabbles for the spoils of war. Unquestionably, missionary enterprise is tremendously handicapped by the present non-Christian situation. What are our churches going to do about it?

With exceptions, some of the old religious faiths of the Far East are dying—they do not yield the solace or the Saviour that the Gospel of Jesus would afford them. Why do they not turn to Jesus? The preaching of the Gospel is handicapped by the inconsistencies of Christendom—its often failure individually and internationally to practice the Gospel teachings.

Whilst the Chinese are torn with political strife, whilst their dialects are various and their monetary system a reproach, whilst other countries have too frequently taken advantage of them and fomented no end of trouble, the old country is far from dead. Her resources are boundless. She learns good and evil from the West. We have instructed her in militarism. Her strong men openly avow that their future safety will consist in arming her, so as to put 30,000,000 of her men, available for the army, in battle array against the "Christian peoples" who have taught them the use of explosives and machine guns. Do we wonder at the position they are commencing to assume?

Everywhere the Chinese are reaching out and absorbing the wealth of the countries adjacent to their own. They have a thirst for toil, they are not afraid of undertaking any commercial expansion beyond their own borders. Their banking and business houses extend throughout the Dutch East Indies, they are generally honest, their business men are the merchant princes of that part of the world. They overcome unjust opposition and laws, their numbers multiply throughout the Orient in countries far distant from their own. Who will be able to contend with this peace-loving people whom Westerners criticize and ridicule because they have not engaged in foreign wars for thousands of years? They have not for many generations taken the sword internationally and have not perished by the sword. Are they going to endure insults, abuse and exploitation forever? Is it not time for Christendom to commence to treat them decently? Is it not about time that we commenced to treat ourselves decently? Are they not keenly watching the Christian peoples kill and starve each other by the many millions, and abiding the time when we, decimated and enfeebled in virility and resources, shall be dictated to by them? I uphold no bogey.

It is not too late for us to mend our ways—they do not want trouble—and if we practice the Golden Rule they will gladly respond to its faintest touch. Our armaments intensify their fears and every new battleship weakens us because it makes us enemies. If we continue to fail in the practical application of the teachings of Jesus we must expect, according to the revelations of history and science, to be supplanted by others; and God may yet make trial of the yellow races and through them seek the consummation of his ultimate purposes as he would apply His beneficent intent to the children of men. It unquestionably is up to the churches and Christians of America and Europe to bring pressure on their governments and insist on better ethics in international relations if the white man's boasted civilization is to endure.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE STORY OF THE SOWER.—The stories Jesus told were generally about things people often saw, and one day he told about a farmer going out to sow seeds. Perhaps the people who heard the story were watching a farmer at work. The little children who heard him, perhaps, would not understand the meaning of the story, but older boys and girls found out, after a time, that He was really teaching them as well, teaching how God loves us and wants us to love Him. So some people wondered what He meant, when He began to tell a story about a farmer going out to sow seeds. Can you guess what Jesus was thinking, when He talked about the "sower"? He was thinking partly about Himself and His work, and perhaps when you have heard the story, you can guess what the seeds were, too.

The farmer had a whole field to sow his seed in, so it would take a long time. He carried a bag full of seeds and walked down a little hard, stony path, across the field. As he walked he scattered seeds with his free hand. A few seeds dropped between his fingers on to the stony path, and there was no soil to cover them, so they could not grow. And the birds, who always fly round when seeds are being planted, saw them and came and pecked at them and ate them up. And some seeds dropped among tall weeds that grew close to the path. They had no room to grow, because the great weeds choked them. And other little seeds fell on to places where the soil was so thin you could see the hard rock underneath, so these seeds could not send roots deep into the ground. And because there were no roots to hold them, and to send up food to them, though they grew up tall, these plants were poor and thin and very soon withered away. But the rest of the seeds fell on to good, brown earth and were able to send roots deep down into ground that was ready for them. Then the farmer left his field, but when he came again in the autumn, it was a golden field. All the little seeds that had fallen into the soft, rich earth, had grown into tall, golden stalks, bending over because the grains of corn were so heavy. How pleased the farmer was!

Have you guessed what Jesus was thinking about when He talked about these seeds? They were the words which He spoke. And the different places where they fell, were different people who listened to Him. Some people heard Jesus talk about God, and how we could show we love Him by being unselfish and thoughtful for everyone we meet, and they determined never to forget and tried every day to help to make other people happy. These people were like the good ground. Other people listened to Jesus but did not care about what He said, or were too busy with other things, or tried for a short time and then gave up because it was too difficult. These were like the stony or weedy or rocky ground. That is the end of the story and we can think about it, too, like those people who heard Jesus long ago and we can make ready good ground for Jesus to plant His seeds.

If we draw two straight lines across our drawing paper we can make four squares in which to show the four kinds of ground in the story.—HILDA M. COVENTRY, in The Friend (London).

“THE SPIRIT DRIVETH HIM.”

(Mark i: 12.)

[The paper which follows was prepared, in connection with their regular Scripture work, by a member of the class of 1924, at the Moorestown Friends' School. The topic assigned was to show Jesus' interpretation of His mission, as revealed in the account of the temptations.—Eds.]

Christ came fully to the realization that He had a tremendous power for good over the world, not with any sudden burst of knowledge, but by a slowly broadening vision of the spirit of God manifesting itself in Him. Nevertheless, the force of this realization was no less overpowering. How could He use this Divine power to the greatest possible advantage?

He was outwardly but an ordinary man of Judea, working earnestly at His trade, to provide the necessities of life for His family. We, ourselves, are ordinary workers at the present time. What if we should realize that we had in us the power to become the most noted or the greatest person in the world, if we so desired; although at the same time, we might realize that becoming famous was not precisely the channel into which our power should be directed? We might know that such Divine power should be used to glorify God, instead of furthering our own selfish ambitions; but the choice would be left to us. Which choice would we make? That is where the temptations came in Christ's life.

Then was Jesus led up of the spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. And when He had fasted forty days and forty nights, He was afterward an hungered. And when the tempter came to Him, He said, If Thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread."

In each of us, and predominant in many of us, is the desire for the actual things of this world; things which we must apparently possess to be happy. Many clothes, fine homes, automobiles, theatre tickets, radio; are these essential for our happiness and the carrying out of the purpose for which we came into the world? In less modern terms, but in a no less real way, the desire for these "treasures on earth," must have been present in Christ's world and in His life, as well as ours. He must have been rather poor and doubtless His life was not all plain sailing. If it was possible to acquire these "things," which seem so to add to one's pleasure, why should He not acquire them? His answer to the temptation, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of God," shows that in His spiritual struggles, He realized that there was something far higher and better than these "things;" something that fills a far more essential need in our lives, and He determined to live by the "word of God." He would fulfil His mission on earth; He would do the will of God as it was shown to Him, and put aside the desire for personal ease and comfort.

"Then the devil taketh Him up into the holy city, and setteth Him on a pinnacle of the temple, and saith unto Him, If Thou be the Son of God, cast Thyself down; for it is written, He shall give His angels charge concerning Thee: and in their hands they shall bear Thee up, lest at any time Thou dash Thy foot against a stone."

Christ must have fully realized the unlimited power with which He was endowed, and the desire to test this power in some dramatic way was a natural one. He must also have realized that He could easily acquire fame with miraculous actions, and astound the world into taking notice. Might it not be possible that this was what He was supposed to do with this great power; to draw the attention of wondering crowds to Himself, and thus impress His hearers with whatever He might say to them? But would they have been impressed? A wandering magician, perhaps Divinely inspired, causing a temporary sensation, interesting for a time, but soon forgotten: this might have been the result of such methods. He had to make the choice, and the result of His decision is a "living Christ," who has guided the lives of men of every rank, nationality and profession for almost two thousand years. "Jesus said unto him, It is written again: Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God."

The last temptation seems almost to include the first two, and it follows directly from them. "Again, the devil taketh Him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth Him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; and saith unto Him, All these things will I give Thee, if Thou wilt fall down and worship me."

How easy it would have been to have set up an earthly kingdom, with such a tremendous force and personality, simply by accepting the general idea of the expected Messiah. What great achievements and exploits could be undertaken, since He was sure to have the power to carry them out. "Then said Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan; for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve." Christ realized that to set up an earthly kingdom would be practically worshipping Satan, for it would be directly opposed to what He knew to be God's plan for His life. War, prosperity, self-indulgence; and the Divine side of life would have been forgotten entirely. The Kingdom of God would have become a myth. That was obviously not the result for which Christ was to devote His life. He chose the higher ambition; working for the Kingdom of God on earth. His task was not to bring about an earthly kingdom, not to use His Divine power for His own selfish ends, not to test His true Messiahship by marvelous and useless miracles; but by bringing the message of love into human hearts struggling for light, and to give help and guidance to those who are hungering and thirsting after righteousness.

BOOK REVIEWS.

A BOOK ON HERETICS.

"In praise of heretics," even if it is not to be the title, will be the theme of the next book by Rufus M. Jones, Professor of Philosophy at Haverford College, Pennsylvania, and the acknowledged successor of the late Professor William James as a writer on Psychology and Religion, who has just arrived in England, so that he can undertake research in the subject at the Bodleian at Oxford.

This book, he tells me, will not be quite so large as his "Studies in Mystical Religion," the first volume in the Standard Quaker History series, the sixteen years' work on which was completed last year by the issue of his "Later Periods of Quakerism." He hopes that his new book will not only show what valuable contributions heretics have made to the life of the Church, but also will show what are the fundamental characteristics of a true Church, and what its nature should be today.

"We have not got any historic heretics in America," he told me, "and so I have had to come to Oxford! But I am not looking for heretics of today—mainly just those of the first three centuries."

Dr. Rufus Jones does not attach today much importance to the heresy charges being made in America by the religious party known as the "Fundamentalists." "It is true," he said; "that a large number in every body take up the fundamentalist position, but I have little doubt that thoughtful people, especially the young, will follow a Christianity adapted to this age which is preached by many leaders." The real trend of religious thought in America, he said, both on this subject and on that of world peace, regarding which the feeling is perhaps deeper and more profound among the people than their leaders, is best represented by the progressive papers, the Christian Century, the Christian Work and the Churchman.

The effects of a recent motor accident have prevented Dr. Rufus Jones visiting the Quaker Relief work in Russia, as he did two years ago on behalf of the American Friends' Service Committee, but he has been able to carry out his programme of visits to the Near East, where he has especially inspected the work among refugees in Constantinople, Greece, Palestine, Syria and Egypt. "If true, it almost tempts me to believe in original sin," was Dr. Jones' comment on the report that the Turkish authorities contemplate imposing a one hundred per cent. import duty on relief goods. "I have been in close touch with Col. Haskell, who is in charge of the magnificent American Red Cross Relief work. Such a step would make it impossible to carry on in the areas where the duty would apply."

"The most effective thing in the Near East," was Dr. Jones' description of mission work. In Damascus, the excellent Red Cross work is being wonderfully supplemented by the English and Scotch Missions which are undertaking the education of the Armenian children. In Cairo a particularly fine piece of work is the American University at which half the total of students are Mohammedans and half Christians of every denomination. I had a most excellent reception when I addressed them on religion and ethics.

The estimate in an American "White Paper" that there are over a million drug addicts in the States, Dr. Rufus Jones thought was too high. "The problem, however, is very acute," he said, "and can only be tackled at the source by restricting drug production. We were very concerned to notice in Egypt a great deal of poppy being grown, and we were informed this was for commercial purposes—and presumably for drugs."

MANY favorable testimonials and reviews have been published of the London Book of Discipline, Part I. The one given below must be added to the list, as possibly the most flattering of them all:—

In the Theologische Literaturzeitung (1922, Eleventh Month 26th), Dr. E. Hirsch of Göttingen has written a most appreciative review of the three parts of the Book of Christian Discipline of the Society of Friends in Great Britain. After describing its general character and the contents of Parts II and III, he says: "The union of practical sobriety and earnest, devout love, such as is characteristic of Quakerism, give a definite character to both volumes, in spite of the (instructive) combination of pronouncements from the earliest and most recent times, and despite the manifold variety of the subjects."

In respect of the second volume in particular, the query occurs to one whether our church ought not to put together for her members a similar practical hand-book in harmony with her own spirit. The first of the three volumes, is, however, decidedly the most valuable. . . . I am not aware of a similar collection illustrating the history of any other religious communion. From the book there speaks a proud, thankful love to their own communion, and its history, and at the same time an extraordinarily wide-hearted and sure consciousness of their own way. One would fain envy the Quakers that they have known how to put in the hands of their members a book that is so educative to loyalty and to faithfulness to their own church. And here the wish rises again more pressingly: would that we might create for ourselves a corresponding liking for our own church! The difficulty with which our greater inward wealth (of spiritual material) confronts us can surely not be insurmountable.

Our scientific libraries ought to seek to procure this first volume, in spite of the difficulty of the exchange. It supplies the place to the scholar of many books that are scarcely accessible to him on the history of Quakerism, and with its biographical and literary articles is also in other ways of priceless assistance. To name only one example of the scientific gains that it brings: the figure of John Woolman (1720-1772), who scarce finds a scanty mention amongst us in Germany, becomes recognizable in its true greatness, even from the few extracts given by the first volume. We learn that this precursor of the struggle for the emancipation of the slaves tackled the whole social problem with deep earnestness.

For the period of the origin of Quakerism, too, there is to be found exceptionally rich material of study, for instance, the original report of the famous ocean voyage of the Woodhouse, in 1657.

GERMAN PROPOSALS FOR LASTING PEACE.

(The following article, based upon an interview with Chancellor Cuno of Germany, was written by Wilbur K. Thomas in Berlin, where he stopped recently in the course of his inspection tour of the fields of Friends' Service in Europe.)

Chancellor Cuno, on Twelfth Month 31, 1922, made public a most startling proposal. Except for the propaganda of hate, which is still being directed toward everything that originates in Germany, this would have been received by the world as one of the great steps toward peace in Europe. This proposal was brought to the knowledge of the French Government through the good services of a third power (the United States) and circulated in the German press. The people in America have not been allowed to grasp its significance.

In the face of military defeat and the bitter lessons of the war, the Chancellor, speaking for the German Government, declared, immediately preceding the Paris conference and ten days before the occupation of the Ruhr, that Germany stood ready to enter into a mutual agreement with France and the other powers interested in the Rhine not to declare war without a special plebiscite. This treaty, he said, should be binding for a whole generation. An obligation of this kind, he declared, would lead all peoples concerned to seek peace instead of war, and would give a sure guarantee of peace.

As a guarantee for adequate reparations and payments he further proposed that Germany would assume the obligation to pay a fixed sum out of loans which would have to be raised under the direction of an international financial body. In this way Germany's economic power would be allowed to gradually recover and Germany could consequently pledge herself to make further payments through the mediation of the same body for a longer period of years. The national Government with all her resources, particularly of the industrial and banking interests, was ready to go to the limit of its capacity in meeting these payments. Chancellor Cuno, however, declared he would never sign an agreement, the fulfillment of which would be impossible and which would lead to the destruction of both debtor and creditor.

Was it not possible for the United States to insist that these proposals be seriously considered at the Paris conference? When one sees the terrible conditions that exist in the Rhineland today and the hatred that is being engendered by the occupation, one can but wonder what better proposals could have been made to ensure the peace of the world.

Furthermore, in an interview given to J. Henry Scattergood of Philadelphia, Homer L. Morris of Richmond, Ind., Gilbert McMaster of Youngstown, Ohio, Clement M. Biddle of New York and myself, he further declared that Germany stood ready to back up these proposals today so far as the economic ability to do this has not been weakened by the Ruhr occupation, with all the power of the German people. He declared that the German Government and the German industrial and banking interests were ready to pledge their property and income to the utmost capacity.

He repeated his former statements that Germany wanted no war, and was ready to ensure peace with all the power at her disposal. Is it not possible to make the world listen to these proposals?

The spirit of a new Germany is being born through the sufferings of her people since the war and on account of the Ruhr occupation. It is manifesting itself in a wonderful way. This great challenge, which Germany has given to the world, points the way to peace, founded upon a sound moral and economic basis.

THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE APPEALS TO PRESIDENT HARDING.

Realizing that the relief and reconstruction work which it is conducting can only be a step toward spiritual and economic world reconstruction, the American Friends' Service Committee recently addressed the following letter to President Harding:—

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT:—

We write to you out of our experience in relief and reconstruction work in France, Serbia, Germany, Austria, Poland and Russia which has continued since 1917 and which has opened, quite beyond our expectation or desert, opportunities for understanding of the hearts of the common people.

Sad as was the condition of the peoples of Europe when we started our relief work, it is appalling to realize that their condition in many instances is worse today. We feel that in great sections of Europe hope has been lost and despair has seized great parts of the population like a disease.

The occupation of the Ruhr has solidified the spirit of Nationalism in Germany and given tremendous impulse to the forces of reaction. The boundary between Poland and Russia has been closed and no one can foretell what another day's news will bring forth. Turkey and the problems of the Near East threaten, India is in a state of unrest and unemployment is sapping the energies of Great Britain.

In view of the situation as we see it, we write to ask that your administration call, before it is too late, a new and real Peace Conference of the nations of the world which will definitely consider not only the political but the economic problems of the world, and in which some opportunity for the best intellectual and spiritual leadership of the people at this time may have a chance to express itself.

We are convinced that only upon the recognition of some such fundamental basis as the complete brotherhood of mankind can solutions which will be of permanent benefit to all mankind be achieved.

To you the executive head of this great nation we turn, confident that you and your administration are in sympathy with the purposes of our appeal, and we ask that you exercise the great powers which have been entrusted to you by your fellow-citizens for the salvation of the nations.

SOVIET GOVERNMENT CARRYING ON LARGE-SCALE FAMINE RELIEF.

The American press has carried so much propaganda against Russian relief this winter that it is important that Friends possess the facts of the situation.

Significant indications of the present attitude of the Soviet Government toward famine are contained in a statement written by Robert W. Dunn, who has just returned to America from his service with the Friends' Mission in Russia. Robert Dunn is known to many Friends as the author of the stories contained in "Pen Pictures of Russian Village Life During the Famine" and other material which he wrote while in the famine zone. He writes:

"There can be no doubt that the Soviet Government is now facing up to the actualities of the famine situation in certain sections of her territory.

"The official organ Isvestia in a recent leading editorial states that the time for the intensification of famine relief has arrived, for 'it is no longer a question of fighting the after-effects of the famine but of famine itself.' This is the view now held by the directors of the Government Commission for Dealing with the After-Effects of the Famine. This organization has already shipped a million-and-a-half pounds of food grain to the famine district. It will help an equal amount during Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Months, the three most critical months in the cycle from harvest to harvest, and the months in which the largest number of peasants will reach the end of their resources.

"Official figures now show the total famine population of the Volga Valley and the Crimea, not including the Ukraine, to be 5,600,000. The most seriously affected regions are in the Tatar, Bashkir and Kirghese Republics, in Samara Gubernia and in the Chuvash territory.

"Including all the relief being given by foreign relief organizations and by the 'Posledgolod,' more than 2,000,000 people who are listed as starving or suffering from undernourishment will not be cared for. In some of the regions named above not more than 30 per cent, to 50 per cent, of the population will be receiving any help.

"To meet this situation the Soviet Commission has only the food mentioned above and some $40,000 in roubles which are being used to buy grain immediately. The Commission is also approaching the American Relief Administration with a request that the latter organization extend its feeding program to include some adults. A uniting of prosperous provinces with needy ones is also being effected, each good harvest province being responsible for feeding in the other province to which it is assigned."

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING.

At the very opening of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting, which was held Fifth Month 8th, the gathering was deeply solemnized by a weighty petition to the Throne of Grace that whilst we were all broken and empty vessels, that condition might be one of preparation, so that under the Divine Hand we should be filled with the Spirit and fitted for the service of the Master. There were present several visiting ministers. Max I. Reich dwelt on the necessity of our being transformed from the image of God in which we have been created, into his likeness, by the operation of the Holy Spirit. Benjamin F. Whitson's theme was a similar one.

In the business meeting proceedings were largely the transaction of formal matters. The appointment of a Nominating Committee to propose, if way opens, the names of Friends to visit our smaller Meetings was productive of some discussion, there being a feeling that perhaps this was an unnecessary duplication of the activities of the Visitation Committee and of the Extension Committee of the Yearly Meeting. This Nominating Committee met the same afternoon with members of the present Committee to Visit Small Meetings and of the Visitation Committee.

The reading of extracts from the Minutes of the Yearly Meeting revived many of the interests of its sessions. Attention was directed to some of the important actions taken, especially the appointment of the Committees to revise the Discipline and to consider in a broader way than at present the work for the Indians. Friends were urged to read Part I of the London Discipline entitled "Christian Life, Faith and Thought," and also the book by Professor Rayner W. Kelsey, giving a history of the endeavors Friends have made on behalf of the Indians. The seriousness of the work allotted to the Revision Committee was particularly dwelt upon and in a most feeling way Friends were exhorted to be guided by Best Wisdom in this weighty undertaking.

ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING.

The religious meeting which preceded the business meeting of Abington Quarterly Meeting, Fifth Month 10th, was well attended. Four Friends gave helpful sermons.—Benjamin S. DeCou, Mary Emlen Stokes, Joseph Cosand, Dr. Wm. H. Tomlinson and Caroline C. Warren appeared in supplication. The sermons embodied the "spirit of gladness when coming into the presence of the Lord; the importance of cultivating our talents to be ever ready when called upon for service. There are so many opportunities for service available, but infinitely more opportunities for communication with the Heavenly Father. Our minds and hearts will not need prepared sermons when the Lord has taken possession of our lives; we can then live in unity with God and one another; and be filled with thanksgiving, especially for the fellowship of the Lord."

The business was then taken up. Well-selected extracts were read from the Minutes of the late Yearly Meeting.

Joseph H. Haines was appointed to fill the place of George S. Morris, deceased, on the Committee of Arch Street Centre.

John T. Emlen reported that the conference held jointly with the Philadelphia Quarter in Germantown on the subject of the ministry was attended by about three hundred. It was addressed chiefly by A. Neave Brayshaw and Rayner W. Kelsey. The keynote of the conference was individual service and consecration.

The concern of Hannah P. Morris to visit New England Yearly Meeting held at Westerly, Rhode Island, was endorsed by the meeting which expressed a warm and favorable approval.

It was suggested that we ought to be considering the extension of our organized boundaries. It was mentioned that Stroudsburg was at one time a member of this quarter.

The meeting then closed; after which supper was served, followed by an open meeting with an attendance of over three hundred. It was addressed by J. Henry Scattergood on "The Present Ruhr Situation."

WESTTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.

Over the recent week-end recess, some of the members of the faculty, past and present, and other officers of the School, made a two-day auto-trip to the Poconos. They were housed in cottages belonging to the Bailsys' and Smedleys', and the management of the Manor were very kind in courtesies shown, the group being guests at dinner in the Winter Inn on First-day. Master Thomas and others spent considerable time trout-fishing in the Swiftwater, while those who had not been to the Poconos before were glad of the opportunity of exploring the many features of interest.

Taki Fugita, a government scholarship student at Bryn Mawr from Japan, recently spoke in the girls' evening collection, and then addressed a meeting of the Westtown Missionary Society.

Plans are now under way for converting the upper portion of the old mill into an assembly-room for the use of the Westtown Community Club. It is expected that the work will be done this summer, so that the house will be ready for use this fall. The necessary funds for the remodelling of the building are being raised among the friends of the School; the expense of furnishing the assembly-room will be borne by the club, and at a recent meeting initial plans were made for raising the needed money.

Carroll T. and Anna Hartshorne Brown recently took a four-day week-end trip through New England, visiting the various women's colleges which our Westtown girls are attending. Short but profitable visits were made at Connecticut College, Wheaton College, Wellesley, Smith and Mt. Holyoke. They also attended a meeting at Cambridge, which had been arranged for Neave Brayshaw, at which several former Westtown students were present.

The School has recently become the recipient of a considerable number of bird specimens from the collection of the late George Spencer Morris. These should be a useful addition to the present valuable collection in the school museum.

The annual track and field meet was held on the 11th, and was unusually interesting. Excellent scores were made in all the events; three records were broken, in the 440-yard dash by Stanley Moore, '25, in the pole vault by John E. Parker, '23, and in the 880-yard run by William B. Test, '23. Later in the season there are to be track meets with Haverford College Freshmen and with Williamson School.

A very beautiful and valuable oil painting is being presented to the School by the class of 1910. It is a picture by the artist N. C. Wyeth. It is given in memory of William C. Engle, a member of the class, who passed away in 1916; as a student under Wyeth, he had shown rare skill and promise, and between pupil and master an intimate friendship had developed. The picture represents the imagination of childhood,—a group of children playing on the seashore, who, as they look out over the waves and up at the rolling clouds, seem to see the form of a great giant stalking across the sky. The conception of the picture was William Engle's, and Wyeth has been glad to use the theme in this painting in his pupil's memory.

CORRESPONDENCE.

HEATH'S HOTEL, Johannesburg, South Africa,

Fourth Month 10, 1923.

DEAR FRIEND:—

We expect to leave South Africa on the fourteenth of Seventh Month for England; please therefore continue to send THE FRIEND to Cape Town until Sixth Month 7th, inclusive. After that date send Care of Brown, Shipley & Co., 123 Pall Mall, London, England.

We are due in England about Eighth Month 6th.

We thank thee very much for letter recently received. I have not sent accounts of our work to THE FRIEND for two reasons, one is, I confess to somewhat of a dislike of telling about my religious work—I may be wrong in this. Second, the days are short, I am very busy, get very tired, and so have left my reports to the Quarterly Meetings as some index to activities.

I note thy copying reference to our services from the Australasian Friend. I saw a copy of that paper recently, wherein was mentioned a very small part of the work in the city of Adelaide. Evidently the reporter only told about what she happened to know of. I also noted that I was spoken of as "conducting" the service on a certain occasion. The dear Friend who reported that meeting made a mistake—I never conduct a service—although I often speak at services, always stipulating that I do nothing else. As a Conservative Friends' minister I desire to be consistent in such matters.

I have no objection to publishing this letter, if desiring to do so.

With remembrance, as ever,
Thy friend,
WM. C. ALLEN.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

OUR Friend, Robert Bird, of Glasgow, has carefully revised the re-issue of his well-known life of Christ, "Jesus, the Carpenter of Nazareth," and his publishers, Thomas Nelson & Sons, of London and Edinburgh, have included it in their Edinburgh Library Edition of Standard Books. It appeared last month, along with a Biography of John Bunyan and with Samuel Pepy's Diary, well printed and strongly bound, a marvel of cheap production. The publishers are to be congratulated on their desire to popularize this religious classic.

A RECENT number of the International Agricultural Review, published in Rome, contains an article entitled: "The Assistance Given to Austrian Agriculture by the Anglo-American Relief Mission of the Society of Friends." This article was written by Dr. Ing. Kallbrunner, and was entirely unsolicited by the Friends' Mission.

A WRITER in The Friends' Intelligencer says that she recently found in a journal a sketch on Lincoln in which the author, accepting Mendel's law of heredity, attributed Lincoln's dominant traits of kindness, gentleness, honesty, fairness and justice, together with his unusual mentality, to Mendel's theory that strong family traits and features are oftentimes carried along through generations to appear again in one individual. This law Mendel proved by actual laborious research to be true in both animal and vegetable life. The author questions: "Where did Abraham Lincoln get his strong and unusual mentality and his high sense of right? Does it date back to his Quaker grandfather in Virginia, or yet further back to his Quaker great-grandparents in Pennsylvania?"

PENN COLLEGE has announced that Kelly Johnson, having the highest honors of the Class of '23, will be awarded the Haverford scholarship, and Margaret Ware, holding second place in point of scholarship in the class, will be awarded the Bryn Mawr scholarship.

The following, clipped from an Exchange, gives some interesting items of the Quarterly Meeting in North Ireland:

Ulster Quarterly Meeting was held at Lisburn, Third Month 17th to 19th, in beautiful spring weather, but with a smaller attendance than usual at this time. George G. Williams, with minute from California Yearly Meeting, and Alfred Davidson, from China, received a cordial welcome. Both Friends had acceptable service in various ways. The report from the Quarterly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight stated that 122 Friends had taken some vocal part in the meetings for worship during the year; their ministry was regarded as helpful and practical. It was further noted that 102 visits had been paid by members of the Ministry and Oversight Meeting to the different meetings in Ulster; in addition to 33 visits by other Friends. The service had been greatly valued, especially in the smaller meetings. The statistical returns showed a membership of 1,176, an increase of 14 over 1921. Alfred Davidson briefly, but impressively, addressed the meeting on the claims of China.

THE Union Signal quoted Capper's Weekly some time ago to the following effect: "1500 girls have been lost in one year from the through trains between New York and Chicago. The newspapers tell of them. We have an idea of what has become of them." The editor then added: "The truth is we are rearing too many butterflies, both boys and girls, and are giving too many automobiles to play with. The rearing of too many children is left to the Y. W. and the Y. M. C. A., school teachers and churches. There is nothing that will take the place of the good old-fashioned American home with its home training, its home duties and responsibilities. Good times some of the time are all right, but good times all the time are all wrong, and lead to weak, unhappy, characterless lives if nothing worse!"

LAST spring the Yearly Meeting of New York adopted two new Queries on health. They are: "Do you endeavor to maintain your physical health at the point of greatest efficiency, realizing that thereby you will be able to do better work for Christ?"

"Do you so abide in God's love that your mental attitude towards life is cheerful and serene, gaining divine power to keep you strong for His work?"

THE following minute of protest, duly signed, was issued by one of the English Quarterly Meetings at its last session. The subject referred to is a very live one with English Friends at the present time:

"Attention has again been drawn to the question of Capital Punishment. It is our emphatic judgment that the time has come for its complete abolition. Much of the cause of violent crime is to be traced to tainted heredity and evil environment; a fact which emphasizes the duty of meeting moral failure by redemptive care and not by retribution. Capital Punishment rests upon the assumptions that the community is sometimes justified in taking the life of the individual, and that some persons are past redemption. Both these assumptions we deny. We are further convinced that as a deterrent, the method must be pronounced a failure."

NOTICES.

A MEETING for Divine Worship is appointed to be held at Friends' Meeting-house, Greenwuch, New Jersey, on First-day afternoon, Sixth Month 3, 1923, at three o'clock, Standard Time. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

By order of a Committee of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting.

BOOK OF DISCIPLINE.—The stock of the last edition of the Book of Discipline is almost exhausted. With the prospect of an entirely new book in the near future, it would seem ill-advised to issue more of the old edition.

Friends who have duplicate copies would confer a favor by mailing one of them to Wm. B. Harvey, 302 Arch Street.

BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING will be held as usual at Burlington, Third-day, Fifth Month 29th, at 10.30. The Meeting of Ministers and Elders the day previous at 10.30 at the Meeting House in Trenton. Both meetings convene on Daylight Saving Time.

J. E. M.

THE FRIENDS' HISTORICAL SOCIETY have planned their summer excursion for this year to Fallsington, Bucks County, Pa. The date is Sixth Month 9th, so please reserve it. These annual gatherings are always most pleasant occasions. A full program for the afternoon will be circulated.

INFLUENCE.

The desire for it can become one of the most insidious of all temptations.

Most of us can remember being duly impressed, in school-days, when we heard about "the influence which each one of us exerts." Expressions of this sort were usually made by the same people who were aroused and cheered as they "gazed into the bright young faces before them, and thought how the dear girls and boys of today would soon be the men and women of tomorrow." We have probably in the time since come to classify much of that sort of expression as part of the stock-in-trade of the school visitor, yet enough of the impression of those early days has survived, with many of us, to keep us sensitive to the word when it is mentioned. We have a vague uneasiness at times, lest what we do may perchance be of a hurtful influence to others, or may at least hinder what might be our influence for good. We are sometimes aware of the influence which certain persons have exerted upon us, and secretly long that our own lives might some day be of a sort to exert a similar benign and helpful stimulus on those adjacent to them.

We are almost universally urged to change our occupation, accept another position, go somewhere else to live, if it looks as if we could thereby achieve "greater scope for usefulness" or "a wider influence." And this without regard to the possible rightness of remaining just where we are. Those who are living lives of comparative isolation often yearn, naturally enough, for what seem the more fruitful fields of opportunity allotted some of their fortunate friends, forgetting that, after all, what is important in the Divine sight is not the stir we make in the world, so much as that we are "fitly joined together." Remember Peter's figure of the "lively stones" built up into a spiritual house. Some of these are exactly cut and painstakingly polished, that they may occupy a conspicuous place, others are hidden away forever in the walls, yet are they none the less essential (it may well be that they are more so) in maintaining the structure. What our place is should be less our concern than to find it and keep in it. Here is a task for whatever we may have of courage and humility.

It is not for any one of us to determine the radius of the circle of his influence. Let that thought comfort those who feel that their lives touch but few others, so that their opportunities are pitifully restricted. What if a man might, by changing the nature of his work or the scene of it, be sure of influencing five times as many people as before? It is still quite possible that he should remain exactly where he is. Perhaps he will live out his life in obscurity, pitied by those who cannot comprehend how he could stupidly have refused to answer the knock of opportunity when it came. These will ask why he did not take at its flood that "tide in the affairs of men," instead of being content to live on, forever "bound in shallows and in miseries." Perhaps he will come to the end having really influenced but two or three people. But one of these may, in turn, wield a powerful influence on thousands. Who will then dare say he ought to have done otherwise?

The plausible counsels of well-intentioned friends but serve at times to obscure the issue. A growing conviction of the rightness, for us, of some course of action that may appear singular (accompanied by no desire to be singular, but by the realization that times come when one must dare to be so) is met not infrequently by our esteemed friend Mr. worldly Wiseman's warning, that unless we want to diminish our sphere of usefulness, and narrow the circle of our influence, we should conform as far as possible to the world about us. "Be human," is the advice of the hour, which, being interpreted, means, "Be precisely similar to everybody else," if such a thing were possible. Had Jesus acted according to our myopic human vision, would He have been willing to pass His three short years of earthly ministry in the obscure confines of a remote Roman province, among a bigoted, ignorant people who He foresaw would never understand Him, but would in their blind fanaticism cut His work off before it ever had got fairly started? He would rather have gone to Rome or to some other great centre, and perfected an organization, with many vice-presidents and local chairmen, diplomatically seeking to get a hearing with those whose position would make their alliance helpful to His cause, and taking care not to say or do anything that might lessen the influence He was hoping to exercise upon them, and through them upon the world.

But that does not seem to have been His way. He appears to have laid emphasis upon the integrity of life, rather than upon its scope.

If real, influence is unconscious. Moses, we are told, wist not that his face shone. So has it been with those who have most profoundly influenced our own lives. Influence is like happiness, in that the pursuit of it is the surest way of missing it altogether. Forget about it, lest we open ourselves to the charge of priggishness. Let us seek rather to know the path that God has chosen out for us, and to step out in it fearlessly

THE FRIEND PAPER
PUBLISHED WEEKLY
NO. 48

and with joy, whether it prove conspicuous or obscure, remembering that doing good is not necessarily the same as doing right. Though we have been speaking in terms of the individual, much of what has been said applies to our Society as a whole, and to its work. Let us stop saying, or even thinking, that "Friends are in the limelight of the world." Consider where limelight is chiefly used. Do we want to think of ourselves as strutting about a stage, playing a part, however noble? Such self-consciousness tends towards artificiality and pose, or at its worst even Pharisism.

One further point, from a somewhat different angle.

If it be true that those who really do exert an influence for good are unaware that their faces shine, it is equally true that they often long for a little assurance that their lives are not unfruitful. A quiet, obscure life has within a few weeks gone to the other shore, a minister whose utterances, made in great simplicity, were to some of us like the breaking of the alabaster box of spikenard, very precious, when "the house was filled with the odor of the ointment." A relative wrote, in a personal letter, "Thy appreciation of my sister as a Westtown memory was most grateful to us. She had a very humble opinion of herself and of her service in the Church, but would have been animated, had she known that her offerings reached her hearers." We all know those whose faces shine, who have helped us, whose lives and example quite unknown to them have urged us on and cheered us, who would be not one bit puffed up, but truly "animated," could they but know a little of the service they have rendered. Yet so often we withhold that knowledge easily shared.

The Voyage of the "Woodhouse" (1657).

[Reference has been made in THE FRIEND recently to the voyage of the Woodhouse and we have been asked for the history. It will be found in Bowden's History, Vol. 1, and is referred to in some detail in "The Beginnings of Quakerism" and in other Quaker histories of the time.—Eds.]

This remarkable account of the voyage of the "Woodhouse," in the summer of 1657, with the second party of Quaker "Publishers of Truth" for Massachusetts, shows the spirit in which the Quaker message was carried to America. Six of the party, with two other Friends, had made up the earlier mission, but the Massachusetts authorities, determined to protect the purity of their Calvinism, had imprisoned them under sentence of banishment for eleven weeks, and then shipped them back to England.

A true relation of the voyage undertaken by me, Robert Fowler [of Bridlington Quay, Yorkshire], with my small vessel called the Woodhouse, but performed by the Lord, like as He did Noah's Ark, wherein He shut up a few righteous persons and landed them safe, even at the hill Ararat.

The true discourse taken as followeth. This vessel was appointed for this service from the beginning, as I have often had it manifested unto me, that it was said within me several times:—"Thou hast her not for nothing;" and also New England presented before me. And also, when she was finished and freighted and made to sea, contrary to my will [she] was brought to London, where, speaking touching this matter to Gerrard Roberts and others, they confirmed the matter in behalf of the Lord, that it must be so. Yet, entering into reasoning and letting in temptations and hardships, and the loss of my life, wife and children with the enjoyment of all earthly things, it brought me as low as the grave and laid me as one dead as to the things of God. But by His instrument George Fox was I refreshed and raised up again . . . [and] by the strength of God I was made willing to do His will.

. . . Still was I assaulted with the enemy, who pressed from me my servants, so that for this long voyage we were but two men and three boys besides myself. . . . [After reaching the Downs], again reason entered upon me, and thoughts rose in me to have gone to the Admiral, and have made complaint for the want of my servants, and for a convoy, from which thing I was withholden by that Hand which was my helper. Shortly after the south wind blew a little hard, so that it caused us to put in at Portsmouth, where I was furnished with choice of men, according to one of the captain's words to me that I might have enough for money; but he said my vessel was so small he would not go the voyage for her. Certain days we lay there wherein the ministers of Christ were not idle, but went forth and gathered sticks and kindled a fire and left it burning; also several Friends came on board and visited us, in which we were refreshed. . . . Also we met with three pretty large ships, which were for the Newfoundland who did accompany us about fifty leagues, but might have done three hundred if they had not feared the [Dutch] men-of-war, but for escaping them they took to the northward and left us without hope of help as to the outward; though, before our parting, it was showed to Humphrey Norton early in the morning that they were nigh unto us that sought our lives; and he called unto me and told me, but said:—"Thus saith the Lord; ye shall be carried away as in a mist." And presently we espied a great ship making up towards us, and the three great ships were much afraid, and tacked about with what speed they could; in the very interim the Lord God fulfilled His promise, and struck our enemies in the face with a contrary wind, wonderfully to our refreshment. Then, upon our parting from these three ships, we were brought to ask counsel of the Lord and the word was from Him:—"Cut through and steer your straightest course and mind nothing but Me;" unto which thing He much provoked us and caused us to meet together every day, and He Himself met with us, and manifested Himself largely unto us, so that by storms we were not prevented [from meeting] above three times in all our voyage. . . .

Thus it was all the voyage with the faithful, who were carried far above storms and tempests, that when the ship went either to the right hand or to the left, their hands joined all as one and did direct her way; so that we have seen and said, we see the Lord leading our vessel even as it were a man leading a horse by the head, we regarding neither latitude nor longitude, but kept to our Line, which was and is our Leader, Guide and Rule; but they that did failed.

Upon the last day of the Fifth Month [July] 1657, we made land. It was part of Long Island, far contrary to the expectations of the pilot. Furthermore, our drawing had been all the passage to keep to the southwards, until the evening before we made land, and then the word was:—"There is a lion in the way," unto which we gave obedience, and said:—"Let them steer northwards until the day following." And soon after the middle of the day there was a drawing to meet together before our usual time; and it was said that we may look abroad in the evening; and as we sat waiting upon the Lord they discovered the land. . . . Now to lay before you, in short, the largeness of the wisdom, will and power of God, thus, this creek led us in between the Dutch plantation and Long Island, where the movings of some Friends were unto, which otherwise had been very difficult for them to have gotten to. . . . In that creek came a shallop to meet us, taking us to be strangers, we making our way with our boat; and they spoke English and informed us and also guided us along.

The power of the Lord fell much upon us and an irresistible word came unto us; That the seed in America shall be as the sand of the sea; it was published in the ears of the brethren, which caused tears to break forth with fullness of joy; so that presently for these places some prepared themselves, who were Robert Hodgson, Richard Doudney, Sarah Gibbons, Mary Weatherhead and Dorothy Waugh, who the next day were put safely ashore into the Dutch plantation called New Amsterdam [afterwards New York].

Robert and I had several days before seen in a vision the vessel in great danger; the day following this it was fulfilled, there being a passage betwixt two lands, which is called by the name of Hell-gate; we lay very conveniently for a pilot, and into that place we came, and into it were forced, and over it were carried, which I never heard of any before that were: [there were] rocks many on both sides, so that I believe one yard's length would have endangered loss of both vessel and goods. Also there was a shoal of fish which pursued our vessel and followed her strangely and along close by our rudder, and in our meeting it was shown me, these fish are to thee a figure. Thus both the prayers of the churches proceed to the Lord for thee and the rest. Surely in our meeting did the thing run through me as oil and bid me much rejoice.

QUAKER LITERATURE DURING THE PAST YEAR.

Between forty and fifty publications by or about Friends have appeared during the past twelve months or so. Pride of place must, of course, be given to the new Part I of the Book of Discipline, "Christian Life, Faith and Thought," that unique volume of inspired experience which shows us again how the Spirit of God continues to speak through and to the souls of men. The measure in which this volume speaks to the condition of both seekers and finders today is shown by the fact that it has already achieved a circulation, both within and without the Society, in this country and America, of 17,000 copies. A great help in its study is the Outline for Study Circles issued by the Woodbrooke Extension Committee.

In the realm of Quaker history and biography there are three books that stand out particularly. These are the "Short History of Quakerism" (Swarthmore Press), into which Elizabeth B. Emmott has wonderfully succeeded in condensing the matter appearing in the first five volumes of the Standard Quaker History Series, and the "Ranccocas" edition of John Woolman's Journal. The preparation of this work has long been the labor of love of Amelia Mott Gummere, and the renewed interest of recent years in all that John Woolman said and wrote and did is stimulated by the fresh light that she throws upon his personality.

George Fox viewed from the psychological standpoint only is the subject of Rachel Knight's "The Founder of Quakerism," but while the book is unequal, our late Friend has opened up a wide and valuable sphere of investigation and study. The time has not yet arrived for the appearance of the book that we shall so much treasure on the life of W. C. Braithwaite; for the time being we have to be content with the "Recollections" of him (Friends' Bookshop), while we can renew our memories of him by being able to read the collection of his "Verses" and one of those characteristic addresses, "Inspired Leadership," reprinted by the Yorkshire 1905 Committee. Associated in our memories of W. C. Braithwaite because of their common interest in education is the "Life of Tom Bryan, the First Warden of Fircroft," by H. G. Wood and Arthur E. Ball, and to a lesser extent except to those who came into intimate contact with him, the "Life of J. T. Jabavu," one of the pioneers of Bantu education in South Africa.

Among the books which besides their interest to Friends themselves are of particular value in interpreting the Quaker message to the world at large we have had Carl Heith's Swarthmore Lecture—"Religion and Public Life," "Spiritual Energies in Daily Life," by Rufus M. Jones, and several new pamphlets published by the Yorkshire 1905 Committee, by the Home Mission Committee and the Friends' Tract Association. Edward Grubb's contribution on the Society of Friends in the symposium, "What the Churches Stand for" has been reprinted separately.

Such a volume as Ernest Unwin's "Religion and Biology" cannot fail, because of the writer's point of view, to convey to any reader the fact that he writes as a Friend. The same may be said of Henry T. Hodgkin's "Christian Revolution," which is the substance of the lectures he gave to the students of China, and is a valuable addition to the Quaker literature on social subjects. Dealing more specifically with these problems, we are again in debt to B. Seebom Rowntree for his essay, "Industrial Unrest and the Way Out," and a new edition of his standard book on Poverty. In "Social Thought in the Society of Friends" the War and Social Order Committee have brought some useful material up-to-date.

The Quaker interest in the question of Penal Reform has received a permanent contribution in "English Prisons Today," by Stephen Hobhouse and Fenner Brockway, which is a volume of really first-class importance and merit. The same permanent value attaches to John William Graham's history of the C. O. Movement—"Conscription and Conscience." Although the particular problem with which it deals is no longer before the public, the principles involved still have to be closely followed.

The additions to our literature for children continue "to make haste slowly," though the continued demand is obvious from the appearance of several new editions. First among the new books is Rufus Jones' "The Boy Jesus and His Companions," which appeared at Christmas, together with reissues of "St. Paul the Hero" and the "Story of George Fox" at the same price. Robert Bird's simple and beautiful story of the life of Christ, "Jesus, the Carpenter of Nazareth," has achieved the distinction of appearing in Nelson's Edinburgh Library Series, while after unavoidable, but no less regrettable delay, we have now available a new—the third edition—of Violet Hodgkin's classic, "The Book of Quaker Saints."

Fiction is represented by such books as "Ashton Hilliers," "The Walbury Case"—a first-class mystery story—and by Olaf Baker's "Dusty Star" while perhaps it is only fair for the sake of the uninitiated to include in this category T. Edmund Harvey's somewhat apocryphal lives of the saints, "Stolen Aureoles."

International subjects have been dealt with by Roger Soltan in his "French Parties and Politics," Charles Roden Buxton's "In a Russian Village," and Dr. Hodgkin's new book "China in the Family of Nations."

Miscellaneous and scientific literature is represented by such differing volumes as Rendel Harris' "The Pilgrim Press," by that cheering volume of quotations, "A Diary for the Thankfulhearted," compiled by our Friend, Mary Hodgkin, the long delayed publication of the experiences of Dr. Charles Edward Smith in the Arctic which his son has published under the title "From the Deep," and A. S. Eddington's "The Mathematical Theory of Relativity."

Among the several translations of Quaker literature that have appeared during the past year have been:—

Into German:—"An Alle Freunde" (Peace Pamphlet); "Calendar for 1923"; "Das Innere Licht," Adolf M. Schwindt; "Das Sakrament des Lebens," Joan M. Fry; "Vom Quakerium," H. Kuchendorfer; "Das Wesen des Quakeriums," Edward Kubb; "Die Christusbegeisterung der Ersten Jünger," Max Reich; "Die Vergegenwärtigung Gottes im Praktischen Leben," Brother Lawrence (Trans. Ernst Lorenz); "Der Dieb in Der Gerberet," L. Violet Hodgkin; "Die Weisse Feder"; "Ohne Falsch wie die Tauben," Maude Robinson; "Philadelphia Appeal" (Translation of); "Das Unter Starcken Fittiche," L. Violet Hodgkin; "Unser Wort Ist Unser Wachter"; "Vom Glauben der Quaker," Barclay Moon; "Zweifaches Suchen," Rufus M. Jones.

Into French:—"George Fox," Henri van Etten.

Into Chinese:—"A Faith to Live By," Guilelma Crosfield.

Into Danish:—"Quakerism," T. Corder Catchpool.

in their writings to endeavor to see life steadily and see it whole.

Notes on Mountmellick School. (Queen's County, Ireland.)

Annie Margaret Pike.

[We are glad to give space to this story of the educational interests of our dear Friends in North Ireland. We touch matters very close to the educational life of the Society of Friends when we mention Mountmellick and very close indeed to the interests of Quakerism when we turn back to the days of Wm. Edmondson, who was instrumental in planting the seed of the faith in Ireland. It was a grief to Friends everywhere, when the Mountmellick School, after a century's record of usefulness, had to be closed; but none, all sentiment aside, questions but that those closest to the problem knew best what should be done. In A. M. P.'s sketch we publish, we shall have a counterpart to the story of the early days of adventure at Westtown and other Friends' schools in America.—Eds.]

THE OLD SCHOOL GARDEN AT MOUNTMELICK.

Springtime and wind from the west,

And a thrill of life in the air;

Life in the gnarled old tree-trunks,

Life for a world and to spare.

Crocuses, purple and yellow,

With clusters of virginal white;

Shimmer of opening leaf-buds

Bathed in the morning's clear light.

Green of the ivy-clad wall,

The coolness of birch-bower's shade;

Hedgerow and meadow beyond,

Gleam where a rivulet strayed.

Jargon of sparrow and thrush,

Honey-bees drowsily humming;

Denizens blithesome or staid

Busily going and coming.

Sunshine through apple-tree boughs,

Or clouds in grey dullness o'erhead;

Sighs at the tedious tasks,

Smiles after lessons are said.

Friendships that blossom from seeds

Of the springtime's silent sowing,

On through the seasons that pass

Ever more deep-rooted growing.

Age hath no meaning for thee,

Garden where youth reigned supreme;

Old by the years thou hast known,

Young in each old scholar's dream.

—ANNIE MARGARET PIKE.

The Centenary of the Friends' School at Mountmellick was celebrated in 1886. The scholars had asked the poet Whittier to write a poem for the occasion, but age and feeble health prevented him from doing so. However, he sent a letter instead, which I quote in full:

AMESBURY, Mass., 26th Fourth Month, 1886.

TO ARABELLA PIM ROBINSON AND OTHERS OF MOUNTMELICK SCHOOL:—

My Dear Young Friends:—

I have received your invitation to write a poem for the Centennial of your school, and would gladly do so, but the years weigh heavily upon me, and illness admonishes me that

I must avoid as far as possible any engagement of the kind. I must therefore reluctantly forego the pleasure of complying with your request, and that of my dear and valued friends, Thomas Edmondson, and Hannah M. Wigham.

But I cannot let the occasion pass without expressing my interest in your school and its locality. I think William Edmondson, who might be called the St. Patrick of Quakerism, and who was one of the first to protest against Negro slavery in Virginia and the West Indies, lived near Mountmellick, and, perhaps, was buried in the lonely grave ground of Rosnallins.

I shall be glad to see any evidence of increasing care for education and culture among Friends. Ignorance has been called the mother of devotion; but it really is the mother of superstition, bigotry and uncharitableness. Friends should be the last people to fear knowledge. Their great distinctive doctrine of the Light within is safe from any danger from free enquiry, science, and criticism, for it is its own unmistakable evidence. Somewhat of the narrowness and austerity of Puritanism, which naturally enough adhered to the Society in the outset, may pass away, and can well be dispensed with, but the root principle will survive, and continue to bear the peaceable fruits of righteousness.

With every possible good wish for the prosperity of the ancient institution of learning in which you are pupils, and for your individual growth in the knowledge of whatsoever things are pure, and holy, and of good repute, and which lend grace and beauty to girlhood and womanhood,

I am, your sincere friend,

JOHN G. WHITTIER.

More than one hundred years previously the subject of the "education of the children of Friends in low circumstances" had been under consideration, and a committee consisting of twenty-two men Friends reported to the Six Weeks' Meeting of Men Friends of Leinster Province, held in Moate, the fourteenth of Eighth Month, 1784. They suggested that children in need of a proper education should be boarded in Friends' families to enable them to attend Friends' schools. This, however, was set aside in favor of the establishing of a Provincial school. A plan for so doing was to be laid before the next Quarterly Meeting. The committee acted with promptitude and as a result a report was made a little later in the same year to the Quarterly Meeting held at Edenderry. It stated "That no less than the sum of £5,000, or £300 annually, will suffice to establish and maintain the school proposed, so as to provide for the accommodation, maintenance, and clothing of twenty boys and twenty girls, in aid of a certain sum to be paid yearly for each." It was thought well to set about the work of collecting subscriptions at once.

An estimate of the probable yearly expenses was drawn up. What a change there has been in money values since those days. Here are a few of the items. I cannot give the whole list.

For dieting a boy or girl, at 2s. per week . . .	5	4	0
For paper and books . . . . .	0	5	0
Salary to a Friend and his wife as house-keepers . . . . .	40	0	0
Salary to a schoolmaster . . . . .	25	0	0
Salary to a schoolmistress . . . . .	15	0	0
Salary to two servant girls . . . . .	6	0	0
Salary to a servant boy . . . . .	5	0	0

The whole expenditure was estimated at £561: 5s.: od. per annum. The parents or the Monthly Meeting would pay the sum of £5 a year for each child, so that, after deducting the amount of fees, subscriptions would be needed for the £361: 5s.: od. that remained.

The intention of Friends was "that the children be carefully instructed in reading, writing, and arithmetic, also in the principles of truth, as professed by the people called Quakers, and that suitable seasons for retirement and reading the Scriptures be established in said school." It was also proposed that children under ten years of age should not be admitted, and that four years should be the limit for continuance there.

The school opened on the thirtieth of First Month, 1786, but as no "male teacher" had "offered," it began with girls only, under the charge of Deborah Butler as "teaching mistress."

It was placed in the care of a standing committee of forty-three Men Friends, but "as it was apprehended that the success of the institution might be considerably furthered by Women Friends taking on them a share of the care and government of it, especially where the youth of their own sex was concerned," a committee of thirty-five Women Friends was also appointed. Sixteen Mountmellick Friends formed the local committee and "two of each sex were expected to visit the school every week in rotation, to enquire into the children's improvement in learning and behaviour, inspect the provisions, and audit the accounts."

In Seventh Month, 1786, there were sixteen pupils, six of them being boys. The admission of the boys was made possible by the fact that a man teacher, by name John Taylor, had agreed to spend from two to four hours at the school daily to teach the children writing and spelling.

WHAT IS FAITH?

Faith is a word, which, like many another of deep meaning, has often been misused, and has come, through such misuse, to represent various ideas other than the original one.

We are no longer, I suppose, in danger of leading others to such a terrible misconception of its meaning as that of the lad who said: "Faith is believing something which you know is not true." Yet it might be well to get a clearer idea of what it does mean to us.

Perhaps the commonest mistake, and the one which has led to the greatest misunderstanding of various Biblical passages, is that of confusing Faith with mere intellectual assent to statements or dogmas. Faith means much more than this. True, it is founded on intellectual assent,—or rather upon intellectual conviction. Paul says:—"Without Faith it is impossible to please Him, for he that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is the Rewarder of them that diligently seek Him." Here, then, is the foundation of Faith—the modicum of belief necessary for the upbuilding of a true Faith. And this foundation is very important, and, like all foundations, should be very firmly laid. Is this the cause of the wreck of the faith of some people—that it was founded not on the rock of a real conviction, but on the sand of a mere intellectual assent to certain doctrines?—because, after all, in a nominally Christian country, it was the easiest thing to assent until storms of criticism or misfortune arose? Should we not examine thoroughly into the foundations of our Faith? Let us not be afraid to do so, thinking that it shews a lack of trust in God, rather does the opposite attitude shew lack of trust—as if God might fail us, after all.

But this is not all of Faith. Mere intellectual conviction can never "move mountains" or "subdue kingdoms, work righteousness, obtain promises, stop the mouths of lions, quench the violence of fire" or enable men to undergo "cruel mockings, scourgings" and innumerable other sufferings with patient endurance.

What, then, is Faith? The dictionary says:—"Belief or trust in the statement or word of another, such that we accept and act upon it in full assurance." Here we have the idea of trust added to that of belief, and that it seems to me is the "better part" of faith. If we truly trust in our Lord Jesus Christ, we shall act upon His word with full assurance. This is the conception of Faith so clearly set forth by James in his Epistle. "Even so, faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone. Yea, a man may say shew me thy faith without thy works and I will shew thee my faith by my works." What should we think of a man who said he had great faith in a certain doctor and yet refused to take his prescriptions?

Whittier says:—

We live by Faith; but Faith is not the slave
Of text and legend. Reason's voice and God's,
Nature's and Duty's never are at odds.
What asks our Father of His children save
Justice and mercy and humility,
A reasonable servitude of good deeds,
Pure living, tenderness to human needs,
Reverence and trust, and prayer for light to see
The Master's footprints in our daily ways?
No knotted scourge nor sacrificial knife,
But the calm beauty of an ordered life
Whose very breathing is unworded praise!
A life that stands, as all true lives have stood,
Firm-rooted in the faith that God is good."

"Firm-rooted in the faith that God is good." In these days this faith needs to be very firm-rooted. The fair-weather faith of the Psalmist when he said he had never seen the seed of the righteous begging bread, will not stand the storms of these days. Can we believe that none of the millions of starving men, women and children in Europe were of the "seed of the righteous," or that all those who have suffered untold agonies in recent years were "sinners above all others"? No, we need the faith of Job when he said, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust Him."

A Faith founded on a conviction that God is, and that He is good, and will reward them that diligently seek Him—a Faith that will trust in His goodness through all seeming contradictions, not by denying their existence, but by seeing through and beyond them. Is not this the Faith we need?

A CALL TO A SPIRITUAL HAGUE.

Before rebuilding the world, we must rebuild the Church, not to conform to the world, but to transform it, says a Modernist who is not so much of a Modernist as to be out of sympathy with the Fundamentalists, and who, instead of erecting another addition to the Church, would rather enlarge its roof to cover all. He suggests, therefore, that before we do anything else we ought to assemble at a great Hague spiritual convention and adopt these two fundamental principles: (I) "There are, it may be, so many different kinds of voices in the world, but not one of them is without significance." (II) "Finally, brethren, be courteous." On occasion the voices have been discordant, and not rarely courtesy has been forgotten. Yet it is with a fine display of optimism that Dr. Roland Cotton Smith, President of the Modern Churchmen's Union, formed last fall, views the problem of rebuilding the Church on the old foundation. The prospect, he says, is "unexpectedly and magnificently encouraging." In this time of questing for truth, of disagreement between the traditionalists and liberals, Dr. Smith's conclusions will be of interest to all who have been touched by the general spiritual disturbance. Writing in The Outlook at the special request of its editors, Dr. Smith tells us that he finds that men everywhere are trying to express life in terms of the spirit. The results are seen in art, despite occasional monstrosities; in literature, despite the filth and defiance of convention in some novels, and in the better understanding between science and religion. He repeats that there was never a time in the history of the world when the prospect was more promising, and that brings him to the question, What is the Church going to do about it?

In his travels Dr. Smith says he has "always found a universal agreement as to the amazing and appealing personality and divinity of Jesus Christ, the Son of God." He has met with "few young or aged priests who have lost faith in Him." On the contrary, he has "found a growing disposition to associate Jesus Christ with the whole of life—taking Him out of scholastic definition and placing Him and His cross a living, ever-present Being in the very centre of the modern life—and, like life, too elemental and universal for adequate definition." Indeed,

"These clergymen would all agree that man can see God in the face of Jesus Christ; that He has brought life and immortality to light; and that if Jesus Christ was followed and His life and teaching put in practice the world would be redeemed and the Kingdom of God established on earth, and whenever the experiment has been really tried, it has succeeded. And this wisdom and power which is Jesus Christ, the unique revelation of God, is in possession of the sons of men."

Thus far these ministers of God have been in agreement, and the writer bids us notice "the vast significance of the agreement." But here begins the separation—not Baptist against Episcopalian, or Methodist against Presbyterian—but on the one side Fundamentalists, and on the other, men who call themselves Modernists. They are "the same men who have opened their meeting with the same prayer, have sat around the same table, and are going forth from that room to their Master's work of bringing light and life to men." Why are they divided?

"The reason why these clergymen found themselves on different sides is because fifty years ago the Bible began to be examined critically, to see how it was made and to find out what it really said. This Bible, as we have seen, means everything; it is the record of the revelation of Jesus Christ, upon whom the hope of the world depends. The Fundamentalist said: 'You can not touch it. Leave it alone. You critics are going to destroy our Bible and the faith of good people. Do away with its authority, and you kill hope.'

"Now the Fundamentalists are right in saying that no hands shall hurt the Book where millions of men find life; they are right in saying that the men who examine it shall not destroy it. But the Modernists answer the Fundamentalists, and say: 'We have such faith in the light and life and spirit that we have found within the Bible that nothing can destroy it. Let us find out all about it; how it was written in the blood of men and in the blood of Jesus Christ; let us strike deep into the authority of the spirit of the Book.' And the Modernist also claims that his willingness to examine the Bible critically has been vindicated; for the men who have examined it have shown it to be a greater book than men dreamed of, with more authority than it ever had before.

"The Fundamentalist looks at the tree of life whereon hangs the fruit on which men live, and he says: 'Leave it alone, for there is the fruit which I and my children have tasted and found life.' And the Modernist says: 'Prune it. Cut off some of the branches, that it may grow taller; improve the soil, that it may become richer and bear finer and more abundant fruit.'"—From The Literary Digest.

THIS truth comes to us more and more the longer we live that on what field or in what uniform or with what aims we do our duty matters very little, or even what our duty is, great or small, splendid or obscure. Only to find our duty certainly and somewhere, or somehow, to do it faithfully makes us good, strong, happy and useful men, and tunes our lives into some feeble echo of the life of God.—PHILLIPS BROOKS.

CHURCH PEACE LETTER.

If one had been told a year ago, that by this spring there would have been issued over 300,000 of the Peace letters jointly by the two Philadelphia Yearly Meetings, he would have regarded the prediction as excessive; as a matter of fact, that number has been considerably exceeded and in this estimate we are not including China, Japan and the Scandinavian countries where it is expected large numbers will be used.

It may be of interest to summarize briefly the distribution. In this country many organizations, religious and otherwise, have co-operated in the distribution of the letters which in most cases were accompanied by differing sorts of covering letters, each adapted to special classes of people addressed.

The Church Peace Union was among the first of the Bodies to give its encouragement by offering to use 20,000 copies, utilizing a special list of Protestant ministers residing in different parts of this country.

The Y. M. C. A. used 2100 copies.

The Chautauqua Association kindly distributed about 1,000 of the letters.

The Fellowship of Reconciliation put 2600 in their Third Month, 1923, News Letter.

The Fellowship for a Christian Social Order sent 1,000 copies to their members.

The Philadelphia Church Federation through its Executive Secretary used 700.

We aimed to send a copy to the Clerk of every Monthly Meeting of Friends in the United States and Canada.

Labor Unions used approximately 1800 copies.

The Federated Press sent to members, 500 copies and 400 additional were sent to Labor papers.

It is expected that the National Council for Prevention of War will use 11,000 copies when its next bulletin is mailed.

One thousand or more have gone to Negroes in the Southern States and in Liberia, Africa.

Farmers' International Councils have used many copies for key men.

The Reformed Church has used over 2,000 copies and steps have been taken looking toward a rather wide distribution among other Protestant Bodies.

No accurate record has been kept as to large numbers used at Conferences of one sort or another. Many Bodies and many individuals have very kindly aided in distributing the letter, by securing its insertion in part or as a whole in newspapers, writing articles regarding it, etc.

English Friends were quick to estimate the value of the document and they asked for 5,000 copies which were sent to them as a start. It was soon decided to print an English edition which to Fourth Month 11, 1923, has been distributed nearly as follows:—

To Non-Friends 58,000; by Preparative Meetings 105,000, additional in launching campaign 17,000, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Ireland had sent to them 4,000.

The German translation approximates 45,000; the French edition 6,000.

An Arabic translation has been distributed in Syria.

In Germany many Catholics have taken a strong interest in distributing the letter and in having it printed in their papers.

Both at home and abroad there has been follow up work, which resulted in orders for more of the letters.

There is much yet to be done in stirring up interest among students in theological schools, Y. W. C. A., W. C. T. U. and other organizations.

Very many persons, church members and others, have been reached with our message; we can humbly trust that the seed sowing will result in rich fruitage by helping to stir the peoples of the world to greater efforts for peace.

We feel that Friends and others should press forward in a still larger distribution of this important document.

WM. B. HARVEY.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING

Concord Quarterly Meeting held on the 14th and 15th inst., was as usual an interesting occasion.

The session on Second-day afternoon was confined to Ministers and Elders, although there had been some thought that the Overseers of the Monthly Meetings would be asked to meet with them. For obvious reasons this was postponed, but such a meeting is arranged for the near future, when the pressure incident to other meetings may not be so great.

Two or more matters of importance were brought before the Meeting and referred to the general session on the following day. By Minutes produced from Westtown and Wilmington Monthly Meetings, the following Friends were nominated to the station of Elder—these nominations were confirmed—Frances E. Harvey, Edith F. Houghton, James F. Walker and Mary F. Balderston.

The general Meeting on Third-day was well attended. A few members of the Yearly Meeting Visitation Committee were present, they and others had acceptable vocal service.

Near the beginning of the Meeting an aged Friend offered prayer that our coming together might be blessed of the Lord and that our effort to worship Him might have His smile of approval. At the close of the one-and-three-quarter hour session the petition seemed to have been most graciously answered.

The business session in the afternoon, following the lunch hour, was characterized by many items of business, but of chief interest were these three:—Carroll T. Brown and wife under concern had made a four-days' visit to the groups of Westtown girls now attending at New England colleges. C. T. B. gave an account of the visit, telling us what a warm welcome they had received. The visit included Connecticut and Wheaton Colleges, groups of Friends at Cambridge, Wellesley, Smith and Holyoke. It is probable that no record similar to that made by the Clerk on this occasion was ever entered on the books of Concord Quarterly Meeting before.

The other items alluded to were a full and suggestive report of the Quarterly Meeting Visitation Committee and a Minute from Wilmington, asking that the suggestion go forward to the Yearly Meeting that a rule be adopted whereby that body might have the major part of its Committees nominated by a standing Committee on nominations.

The plan suggested by Wilmington was well worked out in detail in the report, the rights of small meetings were preserved and the overloading of certain individuals with too many appointments was likely to be prevented, far more at least than by our present arrangement.

It was contemplated that the report would reach the Yearly Meeting next spring, so a small Committee was appointed to give it careful consideration during the interval, to report probably next Eighth Month.

CALN QUARTERLY MEETING.

Caln Quarterly Meeting, which convened Fifth Month 18th, was smaller than sometimes, notwithstanding quite a number of visiting Friends were present, including several recorded Ministers from other Quarterly Meetings, whose ministry was most helpful and strengthening.

In the business meeting, after the Representatives were called and the Minutes of last meeting were read, a report of the Managers of the Friends' Arch Street Centre was listened to with much interest. We heard with regret of the death of four of the Managers since last report.

Portions of the extracts from the Minutes of the Yearly Meeting were read.

A concern was expressed by one of the members that the change in the wording of the Fifth Query should be brought to the attention of our younger members especially, and it was directed that the Clerks of the Monthly Meetings should furnish each member with a copy of the Query as it now reads.

Mention was made that a Conference would be held the next afternoon and evening in the meeting-house, to which all were invited to come and bring their friends.

After expressions of appreciation for the company and services of the visitors, the meeting closed and we adjourned to the dining-room, where we enjoyed a hot lunch before leaving for our various homes.

TUNESASSA.

It was my privilege recently to spend a part of a day at Tunesassa and to note with interest and satisfaction the substantial improvements which have been made to the physical appearance of the buildings and farm in the last few years. There is room for still further improvement, but the well-painted school building, the attractive cottage occupied by Henry B. Leeds and his family, the repaired farm-house, the new electric light plant, the much improved boys' sitting-room and dormitory surely give one an impression of the School property quite different from that of a few years ago.

The generous contributions of Friends throughout the Yearly Meeting have made these things possible, and it is right that they should know how much their help is appreciated both by the Committee charged with the responsibility for the School and by the devoted band of workers who daily bear the administrative cares.

Better yet would these generous Friends understand the meaning of their gifts if they would visit Tunesassa and see for themselves.

I said it was my privilege to visit Tunesassa.

It is a privilege to look out upon the lordly hills which surround the School buildings and to see the patient, self-sacrificing care and effort of those who are carrying on the School, reflected in the smiling faces of happy Indian boys and girls.

There is need of good buildings and proper equipment, but they are only means to an end. There is far more satisfaction in a voluntary remark recently made by the minister of another religious denomination on one of the Indian reservations from which children came to our School—"The devoted workers of my Church are the product of the Friends' School."

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

BIG OWL WAITS.—It was the dead of winter in the Northland and, since there was but little to eat, the Big Owl was hungry. "If I could only get that white rabbit, I'd make a good meal," he kept sighing day after day.

White Rabbit, however, did not want Big Owl to get him. He dreamed of better things than being picked to pieces by Big Owl. So only once, of late, had Big Owl seen him. That was when White Rabbit had crawled up on a grey log from which the snow had drifted, to eat a bit of the bark. It was indeed dry food, but he took the risk of being seen; because he, too, was hungry. Big Owl had caught a glimpse of his white body outlined against the grey of the log and had made a great swoop.

It it had not been that White Rabbit saw his shadow, it would have been the last day for him. But when he saw the great dark spot moving on the snow, he jumped, huddling down in the soft snow. Thus it was that Big Owl did not find him, though he waited and waited for White Rabbit to move. For it was very difficult to see White Rabbit in the snow; in fact, nature had made him white so he might be protected against his enemies.

"But I'll get White Rabbit yet," Big Owl had said on that occasion, after he had waited for long minutes and had at last given up. "Wait until spring comes. Just wait until the snow leaves the ground. Then I can see White Rabbit!"

But now it was the dead of winter and Big Owl was wishing for a good breakfast, from the tender limbs of White Rabbit. White Rabbit was wary, however, and kept well out of the way of Big Owl. So the winter wore on; and both Big Owl and White Rabbit grew thin with fasting. There was very little for either of them to eat; but Big Owl fared worse than White Rabbit, for the latter had a knack of nibbling bark and Big Owl did not.

It was with a great deal of pleasure, then, that Big Owl at the close of winter hovered near the home of White Rabbit, waiting for the snow to melt. He was extremely hungry now; and he knew that he could catch a white rabbit when the snow wasn't there to protect him. "I'll get him now," whispered Big Owl one day in early spring as he staved near the place where he had last seen White Rabbit. "The ground is grey and brown now, and I can see him," he went on, snapping together his hungry jaws.

But just as he said these words, he saw a movement of grey and brown. "It's a rabbit!" he said to himself. "I'll go for him," he said, as he started to make a swoop. But the animal had stopped; and for the life of him Big Owl could no longer see him against the grey and brown earth. "Never mind. If he doesn't move so I can see him, I'll get the white one, any way."

He didn't, though. He watched all spring and all summer for White Rabbit. But, though he grew fat eating bugs and mice and other delicacies, White Rabbit was safe from him. For White Rabbit was no longer white! With the passing of the snow his fur had changed from white to a brownish grey. The grey and brown movement that Big Owl had seen was formerly White Rabbit! So it was that White Rabbit changed his coat to grey and brown. So it is that Big Owl still waits for White Rabbit.—J. ARTHUR DUNN, in The Presbyterian.

WHAT FRIENDS ARE DOING FOR POLAND'S REFUGEES.

(Annual Report of Refugee Relief Department of Friends' Relief Mission in Poland.)

The needs of the repatriants during the past year have necessitated two forms of relief. Coming, as they did for the most part, with practically no resources of their own, often ill, and nearly always weak and depressed, the necessities of daily life were their first obvious need. The mere satisfaction of this need, however, was in itself, ephemeral, and might have left the repatriant, after six months or a year, in almost as hopeless a condition as on his first arrival.

The whole of the peasant's potential wealth lies in his land—and the land of the repatriant had not been cultivated for six or seven years; he had no means of cultivating it, no live-stock; and, in many cases, no home. Thirty-nine thousand three hundred and twenty-nine houses and 95,314 barns and stables still await reconstruction in the Polesie Wojewodztwo alone.

We have endeavored, therefore, in our work both to provide for the repatriant some means of daily life, without which he would have died on his arrival from Russia, and also to give him the means of cultivating his land, without which he might have starved when we had gone.

EMERGENCY RELIEF.

Each family returning from Russia to any of the areas in which we were working has received a free ration of different kinds of foodstuffs, usually calculated to last for one week, but varying in individual cases, particularly in the case of underfed children. This helped to carry him over what was, in many ways, the most depressing part of the repatriant's experience—the return after years of absence to a ruined home.

This ration had from the necessity of the case to be distributed free, but, after the first week, each family was given the opportunity of earning its living by means of our industry scheme.

The essence of this scheme consisted in supplying flax and wool to the peasants for spinning and weaving in their own homes. They were paid for the work at rates which enabled them to live, and a very serviceable heavy cloth was produced of great value for winter clothing.

In Tenth Month the whole amount of this cloth in our possession, 24,000 metres, was sold to specially selected families at purely nominal prices. Since then arrangements have been made to sell this cloth at cost price to the Ministry of Social Care for use in orphanages. Fancy weaving in colors, and embroidering have also been introduced in these districts where this could be done satisfactorily. The embroidery has been sold, chiefly in England and America, and this branch of the work has been self-supporting.

Some idea of the immediate effect of this form of relief may be gained from a consideration of the fact that we have paid in wages over 70,000,000 marks and it has had its reconstructive side also; we have supplied seventy-one spinning-wheels and a number of looms, and are taking steps to establish the work upon a permanent basis.

In this way we supplied food to the neediest of the repatriants in a manner which had the chief merit of avoiding the pauperization of the districts in which we are working.

We also attempted medical relief. Throughout the year we have supplied drugs and equipment to various hospitals and orphanages and at Bereza Kartuska we completely equipped an epidemic hospital of sixteen beds. In each outpost we had at least one trained nurse who attempted direct medical relief in the cases which came under our personal notice and clinics have been run successfully. During the early part of the year, however, it was quite impossible for us to attempt to cope with the typhus which was then very prevalent. The most that we could do was to provide sick rations for those who had passed the crisis of the illness to help them to regain their strength.

RECONSTRUCTION WORK.

While providing by these means for the more immediate needs of the repatriants we have carried out two schemes of work of a definitely reconstructive nature.

In Eleventh Month, 1921, the 1000 horses loaned to us by the Army were distributed among the peasants. This did not prove a satisfactory method of relief, and early in 1922 we called them in and formed them into columns, 18 in number, each from 20 to 30 strong, organized for work under our own supervision.

The Government had granted timber to the peasants whose homes had been destroyed by act of war in lots of from 20 to 30 cubic metres, but many of the peasants had no means of transporting the timber from the forest to their villages. We organized them into groups for felling and transporting the timber, using our horses for the latter purpose, and in this manner we have hauled 9203 cubic metres from the forests to the villages and 614 to the railway.

This timber was hauled over an average distance of 16 kilometres (ten miles) and proved to be a very difficult business owing chiefly to the weather conditions which turned many of the roads into swamps. The construction of houses was an even more difficult matter. During the year we sold at a nominal price 330 ripping saws and 1215 cross-cut saws and in Second Month, 1923, set up a portable saw-mill in Kobryn. A second saw-mill has been sent from America for Drohiczyn. During the summer a distribution of planks, glass, and door and window fittings was carried out in Bereza which put into repair 700 houses,—a piece of work of the utmost value in view of the prevalence of typhus in this district.

The Housing Reconstruction has developed beyond our expectations, for the horse columns were originally organized with a view to ploughing. This has in fact been our most important piece of work. If it was necessary for the repatriant to receive help in rebuilding his house, it was even more vital that he should have some means to plough the land in which lay his only means of livelihood. This land has been in most cases uncultivated for six or seven years and was covered with a crop of young birch trees. The repatriant himself possessed neither horses nor plough.

We have ploughed steadily from the middle of Third Month to the middle of Tenth Month, ploughing when it was too late to sow in order to get the land into better condition for 1923. Altogether we have covered 21,011 acres for 12,500 families, the average persons per family being between three and four.

During the year we have sold at nominal prices 17,650 spades, 5358 scythes, 4956 sickles and a number of ploughs, hoes, rakes, etc. Seven hundred lambs were also sold to peasants who possessed no other livestock.

About seven-eighths of the land ploughed in the spring was seeded with potatoes, barley, oats and buckwheat by the Mission, and an arrangement was made that the peasants receiving seed should repay the price to the Government within one year. Eighteen thousand packets of garden seeds were also distributed and an agricultural show for exhibition of the products was held at Holoby, Eighth Month 15th.

All the land ploughed during the autumn was seeded with rye, the peasants being given a three-years' credit. This seed (more than 400,000 kilos) was purchased by the Mission, but distributed by the Government, and the Mission received a refund of a proportion of its expenditure from the Government.

The number of refugee families who returned during the past year to their localities where we have now worked is 6,500.

The larger number of refugees expected by the Government have not yet arrived, but it is reported that 200,000 are now on their way, some having already arrived at Minsk, and may be expected to arrive in Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Months.

Head of the Refugee Relief Department.

TO CALIFORNIA FRIENDS.

George Tester, a licensed nursery and seed-man, conducting his business at 1098 Breese Avenue, Pasadena, California, has made a number of donations of seeds to the American Friends' Service Committee. He has just written that he has a quantity of seeds suitable for planting in Russia, which he would like to furnish the Service Committee if interested persons would contribute $15 toward the expenses. A contribution may be sent direct to George Tester, and any amount in excess of that required in connection with this particular offer will be forwarded to the office of the Service Committee in Philadelphia.

SHIPMENTS received for week ending Fifth Month 19, 1923—55 boxes and packages.

Cash contributions for the same period—$3,466.02.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

A NEW account of Quakers in Germantown has just been published. It is written by Horace Mather Lippincott and is called "An Account of the People Called Quakers in Germantown, Philadelphia." The author states that "this account has been made possible by access to the records of both meetings of Friends in Germantown, and by the assistance of Thomas H. Shoemaker, Charles F. Jenkins, George K. Johnson, Joseph H. Haines, Thomas Wistar and Samuel Mason."

ENCOURAGED by the success of former ventures, the League of Nations Union, in co-operation with the American School Citizenship League, organized last year a world essay contest open to students of all countries. The prize-winners included American, German, and English students. The subjects selected for this year are: "A World Educational Organization to Promote International Good-will," for Junior students, and "The Achievements of Civilization and How to Organize Them for World Comity," for senior students.—The Friend [London].

THE PLAIN LANGUAGE.—To the Editor:—Several weeks ago, appeared in The Intelligencer an article in which the writer thought "the use of 'thee' is a custom which causes outsiders visiting our Society to feel like strangers in a foreign land." I find it to be quite the contrary. Having spent some time in hotels and boarding houses, strangers would often say, "How fascinating to hear you say 'thee'." Others have said, "Won't you please say 'thee' to me, it is so sweet. I love it," etc., and in no case have intelligent and cultivated people been otherwise than attracted by it.

Can one imagine an angry quarrel with the use of "thee?" It would be much like the two children at play when one became incensed at something, and said to the other, "O, thee, little you thee!"

The writer asks, "Why is the Society becoming yearly weaker?" It seems to me just because of those who want change after change until the fabric grows weaker and weaker, instead of each member living up to every requirement that constitutes a Friend, by being true to our birthright. How many of us live the Advices? or are mindful of the Queries? Or how many are willing to give themselves to the spiritual support of our Meetings? Let each be true to himself and the use of "thee" will serve as a recommendation among strangers. I knew of two Friends who did not use it in addressing each other, and who sat opposite a young man at table on an ocean steamer, and met in several places abroad. On their return one went to Buck Hill Falls and was surprised to meet the same young man whom she found was a member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Had they used "thee" when conversing on the steamer it would have been an introduction that might have proved profitable to each. If we are a "peculiar people" of 250 years, the world today is holding us in high esteem when one of its ministers can say, "The Quakers are the only Christians in the world."

RATES for the Summer School at Haverford College, Sixth Month 18-25th. There will be no charge for tuition. Board and lodging will be furnished by Haverford College at the following rates:—$15.00 for the week; $3.00 per day; $1.00 lodging per night; breakfast $50; lunch $.75; dinner $1.00.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING by the most recent count comprises 388 meetings. It is at once seen that some of these must be very small. Three hundred and eighty-one new members were recorded in 1921. In Yorkshire Quarterly Meeting, where there are fifty subordinate meetings, only thirty-eight joined through conviction during 1922. There was an actual net decrease for that year of thirty-five.

Referring to the numerical importance of the Yearly Meeting, a Friend recently said that there was plenty of room for expansion, as there is only one Friend to every 1130 acres of land in England.

On the 3rd instant, the historic site of Quaker interests in London (Devonshire House premises) was offered at auction sale. The first offer was £100,000—other bids were made, but the property was withdrawn at £230,000, less than one-and-a-quarter million of dollars at the present rate of exchange. At the date of writing a sale may have been made.

At the opening of the auction, the auctioneer gave an interesting description of the property, referring to it as one of the finest in the City of London. He also spoke of its peculiar historical interest and expressed the hope that in the hands of its new owner it would serve as useful a purpose as it had done in the hands of the Society of Friends, who had been in possession of part of it for nearly three hundred years. He referred to the "enormous value" of the frontage in Bishops-

In this month's issue of the Atlantic Monthly, there are two papers of unusual interest to Friends. Both are founded on the "Doctrine of No Compromise." One is by Edward Thomas, a New York Friend, son of the late Professor Allen C. Thomas of Haverford, the other by Edward Richards of New York. E. R. describes his experiences during the war in West Persia, alluded to as "the most dangerous and disagreeable part of the world." He is an out and out pacifist and had a wonderful opportunity to put to a practical test the supposititious cases that the militarist always argues from when he meets a pacifist. E. R. says: "The theoretical answers I uttered in debate in America proved workable in practice nearly nine thousand miles away among wild, uncivilized and even drunken people." Copies of this essay may be had by addressing Peace Committee, 302 Arch Street.

Two members of Homewood Friends of Baltimore some weeks ago gave a supper to some seventy prominent people, ministers, educators and business men. The supper was arranged by the Peace Committee in co-operation with the Federated Churches of Baltimore, for the purpose of arousing and educating public opinion in regard to International Friendship and Peace. Fred. B. Smith, a Y. M. C. A. man, who was one of the principal speakers, had been visiting and holding meetings in some twenty-six different countries, in which he said he had been everywhere received with open arms because the idea got abroad that he came in the interests of international friendship. He was everywhere told America could insure peace if she only would—that it was she who held the key to the future.

In announcing the fact that Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, High Commissioner for Russian Relief for the League of Nations, is opening an office in New York City and establishing a service of relief drafts and packages which will replace that suspended by the American Relief Administration, The Nation for Fourth Month 11th says: "Dr. Nansen's gallant and uncompromising non-political work for Russian relief has, with that of the Quakers, been one of the brightest chapters in the history of these dark post-war years."

The following, though rather belated, will interest those of our readers who have not followed our friend Alfred C. Elkinton in his goings to the Far East. The original appears in The Australian Friend, which has just made reference to the recent departure of Wm. C. Allen and wife. A. C. E. and wife at the present writing have reached their California home.

Now other American Friends are with us, members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, bearing the honored name of Elkinton—Alfred C. and Anna Elkinton.

Alfred C. Elkinton is a son of the late Joseph S. Elkinton who spent himself for the Doukhobors, and the brother of Joseph Elkinton recently deceased, who may be said to have given his life in the cause of suffering and distress in Europe. Alfred C. Elkinton is here on private business, but he, too, makes himself an ambassador for peace wherever he goes, and his present journey with his wife has included Hawaii, Japan, Korea, China and Manila.

In Sydney, as we write, it is our Friends' intention to leave for Melbourne by the Zealandia, later to join the Maunganui in New Zealand for return to their home in Berkeley, Cal.

DR. RENDEL HARRIS, of England, and his party who are doing research work among monastic records in Egypt were granted permission to photograph by the authorities at St. Catherine's Convent on Mount Sinai, through the receipt of a telegram brought by a messenger across the desert from the Archbishop of Cairo, saying, "Everything committed to my friend Rendel Harris." The library being closed one day, they learned that it was for the purpose of celebrating the memory of St. Chrysostom, the ex-Kaiser, and Dr. Rendel Harris, the latter of whom was on that day commemorating his seventy-first birthday. Rather a striking triumvirate of saints of which our distinguished Quaker found himself a member!—From The American Friend.

NOTICES.

ALL of the members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting are cordially invited to the next conference on Evangelism, to be held on Second-day, Sixth Month 4, 1923, from 4 P. M. to 8:45 P. M., at 304 Arch Street. The proposed program includes a message from our friend Alfred C. Garrett and one from our friend Max I. Reich.

For the Committee.

A MEETING for Divine Worship will be held at Parkerville, First-day afternoon, Sixth Month 3rd, at 2:45 Standard Time. Friends expecting to attend and having no means of conveyance should address Norris G. Temple, Pocopson, Pa. The trolley leaving West Chester at two o'clock will be met at Barnard Station.

FRIENDS' SUMMER SCHOOL.—Arrangements for the Friends' Summer School at Haverford College, Sixth Month 18-25th, are nearing completion. Charles Clayton Morrison, editor of the Christian Century, will give a series of addresses on the vital emphasis in the Christian message. Shailer Mathews, of Chicago University, will give two addresses on "Educational Evangelism." President C. K. Edmunds, of Canton Christian College, will give an address on the problems of the Far East.

At 9:20 each morning, there will be three Bible classes: "The Way of Christ," led by Alexander C. Purdy, of Hartford Theological Seminary; "Varieties of Religion in the New Testament," by Henry J. Cadbury; and "The Book of Revelation," by Elbert Russell, of Woolman School. At the same hour there will be a class of methods of religious education (leaders yet to be chosen).

Single addresses are to be given by Cedric Long, Wilbur K. Thomas, Walter C. Woodward, Elbert Russell, and Rufus M. Jones.

Daily conferences are to be held on such topics as: The Quaker Message, The Quaker Messengers, Spreading the Quaker Message, Home Service, and the Meeting for Worship.

Other speakers and leaders of the conferences are yet to be announced.

For additional information or for applications for accommodations address Friends' Summer School, Haverford College, Haverford, Pa.

AN appointed Meeting for Worship will be held at Wilgus Hall, Hatboro, First-day afternoon, Sixth Month 3rd, at 3 o'clock (Daylight Saving Time), to which a cordial invitation is extended.

THE PRAYER OF LIFE.

Father, hear the prayer we offer!
Not for ease that prayer shall be,
But for strength, that we may ever
Live our lives courageously.

Not for ever in green pastures
Do we ask our way to be;
But the steep and rugged pathway
May we tread rejoicingly.

Not for ever by still waters
Would we idly quiet stay;
But would smite the living fountains
From the rocks along our way.

Be our strength in hours of weakness,
In our wanderings be our guide;
Through endeavor, failure, danger,
Father, be Thou at our side.

ON RECORDING MINISTERS.

If one were not otherwise informed, it would be easy to believe that there is an agreed concord of action between London and Philadelphia in the consideration of fundamental points of principle and practice in the Society of Friends. Thus, a short time ago, birthright membership claimed the attention of meetings and conferences on both sides; now the outstanding subject is the vocal ministry and especially the question of recording ministers. May it not be true that this recurring challenge of fundamentals in Quakerism is a constitutional characteristic, and is indicative of the stirrings of life in the Society? Save as each generation works out for itself its own convictions, and finds new vehicles of expression or new confirmation of old forms of expression for these convictions, there seems no alternative but a dead traditionalism. Sometimes the process of challenge threatens disruption; of late the outcome has been toward stability, and an actual re-affirmation of long cherished practices. It brings to light the hidden life that tradition does so often conceal. How much better we all understand the basis of membership for the discussions of the past two years! Much the same outcome is now promised as regards the consideration of vocal ministry and the recording of ministers. On the English side this consideration has been summarized in The Friend (London) and in three articles in The Quarterly Examiner for Fourth Month. Without attempting any review of the field as thus presented, two or three outstanding points of the consideration may have a service with us at this time.

Herbert H. Catford who writes the first article makes this quotation from an editorial in The Young Quaker of Third Month, 1923: "The practice (of recording) is contrary to the true genius and spirit of the Society, which is a free spiritual community where all may be called upon to minister when the message is given them." This statement is somewhat typical of the reasoning against recording. Why and how the "freedom of the community" is hampered is left to one's imagination. But is there not a serious confusion also between the genius of Quakerism and the genius of the Society in this and in similar statements? Is not the very basis of recording ministers the fact that the Society can reach a group judgment, useful to it and to each member who participates, spiritually, in forming it?

This group functioning, this "solemn association of the church with the service" (of vocal ministry) does awaken and keep "active the interest of large groups of members in that service." These words are quoted from the article contributed to the Examiner by T. Edmund Harvey. It makes full admission of the imperfections brought into the service of vocal ministry by fallible human nature, but points out that there have been and probably always will be, even in our free communities, ministers to whom the call "is the main call of a life, the work for which everything else must be put aside, which demands the dedication of thought and the sacrifice of other interests, legitimate and praiseworthy in themselves though they may be." For meetings to deny themselves the privilege of recording gifts of this nature would seem much like abrogating one of their highest spiritual functions. Let us have as much ministry as is possible under right ordering from those to whom the call is but occasional and to whom it may come as something of a surprise. Let us recognize that fixed arrangements, however simple, and that recorded ministers, however gifted, may produce results that are at times formal and lifeless. But let us ask how much more responsible for this we may be than those who have more publicly surrendered themselves to vocal service. Each failure of ours to contribute our rightful share to a meeting is undoubtedly a part of the failure of the meeting as a whole. Herbert H. Catford in the article mentioned above has given needed emphasis to these functions of the meeting in the spiritual service of evangelization. No apology is needed for liberal quotation of his words: "The task before us will not be accomplished by big campaigns, or great publicity of any kind, but by the far more difficult path of the re-dedication of ourselves to Christ. A. Barratt Brown has recently suggested that all of us need frequently to pass through an experience something like re-conversion: to get back to certain things that once seemed so wonderful. We need to recover that feeling of wonder and self-abasement, united with intimacy, which comes upon us as we realize something of the depth of the love of God; that He loves me and gave Himself for me.

"The work will be done mainly through our Meetings for Worship. These meetings form our special contribution to the Christian Church, and a living Meeting for Worship has an attractive power beyond that of any other gathering. . . .

"Each of our meetings must become a living centre, with a deeply baptized ministry: a centre where Quakerism is set forth, not as something added on to, or distinct from, Christianity, but as a way of life, an interpretation of the message of Jesus Christ to our day and generation. Once again our

Have We A Right To Be Optimists, Today?

We know the desperate nature of the message that the prophets of Israel had to deliver to their people. Think for a moment of Jeremiah's times. A great war cloud hung over the world. Military power ruled the nations with a ruthlessness and a barbarity that seemed to deny the possibility of a moral power in the universe. For years the Assyrian had harried the lands, and made progress in peaceful civilization impossible. When its power was overthrown, the Babylonian followed much the same policy. Jeremiah, looking with see's eyes into the future, knew that his own people would eventually fall before their terrific onslaught. He saw that Jerusalem—habitation of Jehovah—must be destroyed, and that its people—chosen of God to keep alive His worship in the world—must be taken captive to a far land, and bow there beneath the heathen yoke. Jeremiah felt the injustices involved in this. The conquering nations were not more righteous than Israel. They worshipped gods of wood and stone, nor did they obey the moral law. How could it be reconciled with a belief in a righteous, all-powerful God? "Righteous art thou, O Lord, when I plead with thee, yet let me talk with thee of thy judgments. Wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper? Wherefore are all they happy that deal very treacherously? Thou hast planted them, yea, they have taken root; they grow, yea, they bring forth fruit; thou art near in their mouth, but far from their reins."

But it was not the destruction of the national existence of his country, nor the razing of the walls of its sanctuary that weighed most upon Jeremiah. When he considered the social and moral state of his own people, there was little to comfort him. The upper classes exploited the lower and lived lives of luxury and carelessness. All classes alike had fallen into idolatry, and a religious cultus which sacrificed the chastity of the women. They had ceased to regard Jehovah who had led them through the wilderness and into the Promised Land, or if they regarded Him at all, it was only to mock Him with the performance of meaningless rites. His "Holy Experiment" seemed to have failed completely. Jeremiah's keen spiritual perception was tortured as he considered this state of things. He tried to retire from public responsibilities, but God's voice in his heart was as a burning fire, and he could not. Alone he stood before the people. There was no group of friends back of him to say God's speed, nor was there an organized public sentiment to hold up his hands. He pleaded passionately with the people to give up their sinful lives and to return to Jehovah, but they would not hear him. We do not have a single instance of his having influenced for good the course of events in that unhappy time. It seemed as though his heart must break at times, but struggle and suffer as he did, meetings must recover that power of lifting up men and women described by Robert Barclay: "When I came into the silent assemblies of God's people, I felt a secret power among them, which touched my heart; and as I gave way unto it I found the evil weakening in me and the good raised up." Once more our hearts must go out to the world outside, to men and women who are restless and weary, and invite them to share with us the messages that our Father is waiting to send to His children."

Any consideration or discussion that brings individuals or the Society to conclusions like this must be recognized as helpful in the extreme. That spirit seems to have inspired Friends overseas and we can desire nothing better than that the same spirit shall be manifest on this side as the consideration proceeds.

J. HENRY BARTLETT.

TUCKERTON, N. J.

he never turned his back on the message that had been given him to deliver.

In our day, too, there are prophets who tell us that our present civilization is on the brink of ruin. There is little of cheer to either hearer or bearer in their message. A gradual return down the long road up which mankind has laboriously traveled through the years is now held before us as a likely possibility. And for the same old reason—national sin, a visitation of the righteous indignation of God. If this is true, how is there room for optimism among thoughtful people? It can rest, I believe, upon only one foundation, the belief that God is, and again that God is working. That foundation held up Jeremiah's courage to the end. He never lost that faith. And so he could look through the distresses of the present time, and see a society to come, in which all the good of the ages would be gathered up into a mighty whole, before which evil must be abashed. God will not let fall to the ground anything that we may do now in His name. Some day in His providence it will come to fruit. The catastrophe of any hour is not the end; it is only a phase in the process which must finally emerge in a Divine consummation. But let Jeremiah tell us in his own words:—

"For I have satiated the weary soul, and I have replenished every sorrowful soul."

"For I am with thee, saith the Lord, to save thee."

"For I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith the Lord."

"And ye shall be my people, and I will be your God."

"Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love,—again I will build thee, and thou shalt be built."

"I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters in a straight way, wherein they shall not stumble, for I am a father to Israel."

"Their soul shall be as a watered garden, and they shall not sorrow any more at all."

"Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel. I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God, and they shall be my people. And they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord; for they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord. For I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more."

No, in spite of all, Jeremiah was no pessimist.

HENRY ARTHUR HALL.

When soon after our winter vacation week reached us, that H. Arthur Hall, beloved teacher at one time at Olney, had passed away in a Philadelphia hospital, the loss felt by many of us seemed irreparable. We had known him here both as pupil and teacher, and in his quiet way he had grown so into our lives that, while he had gone to other fields of work, yet his influence was a very vital factor with us, as he always kept closely in touch with the workings of the school.

He was born in Iowa and his earlier years were spent there. He first came here from that State and spent a year as a student at Olney before the fire. It was after that winter that he went with his parents to Philadelphia to live and attended West-town School where he graduated. He was always rather remarkable in his thoughtfulness for others and the recollections that some of us have of him is that spirit of thoughtfulness that was so manifestly a part of his career. He had his ambitions to become a physician, but poor eyesight and rather poor health interrupted that career and after two years in Jefferson Medical School he had to give it up. One year was spent here as teacher and then in the fall of 1918 he returned to have the entire charge of the boys and was especially successful in instilling into the minds of many of his students his own spirit of thoughtfulness and politeness of character. There are many whose lives he thus touched who will remember him with love and who have been greatly influenced by his character. He was especially good with boys who felt that they were not understood and he was enabled to get them to see his point of view, and so opened up to them the beautiful ideas of right living.

The writer, in thinking about him and what seems to us his untimely death, recalls to memory a talk or reading he once gave the school, or may be only the boys; in which he spoke of the story of the box of precious ointment with which our Saviour was anointed that seemed to onlookers as a waste but that after all it was not too big a price to pay for love of the Redeemer. So he compared it to the lives that are called early and seemed untimely, that after all they, too, were like the precious ointment, broken for the love of Christ and that anything of the kind could not be considered wasted or incomplete; and so we today seem to see in his whole life an illustration of this beautiful thought that he himself had used in his talk to the school.

It is such lives that help to make all life more complete and brighten the waste places of our existence.

RESISTANT Versus CONSTRUCTIVE ENERGY.

After Jeremiah was compelled to go to Egypt with the remnant of the Jewish people in 586 B. C., he reproached the people for their wrong religious practices, ascribing their calamities to that cause. The people turned upon him in anger and retorted that it was when they had worshipped foreign gods that they had attained to the highest prosperity.

Undoubtedly both Jeremiah and the discouraged, disheartened exiles had arguments and events in mind which apparently substantiated their premises. The people had prospered under Manasseh and Amon, but in their worship of the material during those reigns were they not undermining their deeper resources, their more dependable qualities? Did they not show in the episode of Josiah's offensive against the Egyptian Pharaoh that their faith was still in the arms of war rather than in the quiet confidence in God which Isaiah had counseled? Though they had ceased to make the state religion that of burning incense to the queen of heaven they had not outgrown the materialistic spirit back of the old religion; Yahweh's nature was similar to that of the heathen gods. From our later perspective it appears that Josiah courted disaster in placing himself in the path of Necho's great army, which would otherwise almost certainly have passed by, intent on its part in the downfall of Assyria, without molesting little Judah.

In the same period we are given evidence of the effect of war on a large nation. It eventually proved the undoing of Assyria. Her best men were killed. The less virile people were left to propagate mankind and carry on civilization. Material wealth was exhausted. Ideals suffered. If the little nation of Judah had attended to its own affairs and exerted its energies in the development of an inward life, might it not have escaped all the hardships and sorrows of exile?

We are frequently confronted with the same problem in our everyday life. Is it best to adjust one's self to unfavorable circumstances? Should we be passively reconciled to hard knocks and apparent injustices? Or should we resist the agents which seem to mar our comfort? Should our method be the active fight against an evil or the much slower process of developing an inner life which shall ultimately overcome that evil? Our best answer to the problem seems to be found in Christ's and Paul's teachings: "Resist not evil, but overcome evil with good." And this, after all, is far from passive, bovine reconciliation to injustice and oppression; it presents a wide field for energetic action, whereas resistance to evil involves the sapping of our energies in hatred and vindictive actions.

THE BIBLE.

In the course of an interesting article in the New York Literary Review, William Lyon Phelps of Yale University says that for twenty years he has advocated that entrance examinations in English for all American colleges should include the authorized version of the Bible as part of the required reading. He says that the only objection to such a step is that it might make many of the students hate it for the rest of their lives. But he thinks it is better to run this chance than to leave young people in dense ignorance of the greatest of all books.

Professor Phelps also draws attention to the report of the departmental committee appointed by the president of the British Board of Education to enquire into the position of English in the educational system of England. This was a very important committee which comprised some of the most eminent literary men in Great Britain. They sat for forty-two days and received evidence from 102 witnesses. In their report, practically every aspect of the subject is discussed, with specific recommendations for the improvement of the methods of teaching English. The final section of the report is devoted to the "reading of the Bible." After facing the difficulties inherent in this problem, the recommendation is as follows: "We desire that in all the schools of the country, elementary as well as secondary, the reading of the Bible should not be confined to the time set apart for religious instruction, but that its claim upon the time devoted to English studies should also be recognized."

It is evident from his article that Dr. Phelps is aware of the lamentable ignorance of the Scriptures which is prevalent in the United States. That ignorance is also widely existent among the people of Canada. Regarded merely from an educational and literary point of view, this is a serious matter, since in the preservation of some sort of standard of good English the Bible is one of the most important and authoritative. The King James version should be absorbed by everybody who aspires to instruct his fellows either by writing or speaking, and it has enabled many a man otherwise but poorly educated to acquire an effective ability in the use of the language such as could not be obtained from any other source. It is to be lamented that even among modern preachers, there is a tendency to depart from the inspirational influence of the Bible both in language and idea, so that much slipshod eloquence is heard from pulpits. Not only is this the case, but a thorough knowledge of the Bible is not always considered so necessary for aspiring preachers as a facile flow of speech.

Whatever may be the judgment as to the inspiration of the Bible it may be affirmed that it is "the foundation of English literature and of everything that goes by the name of Anglo-

Saxon civilization: everything that is best in our social and spiritual life comes from the Bible." In these words Dr. Phelps states his matured opinion. Thus while the idea that every word and syllable of the Scriptures is the direct word of God and of equal authority with the rest, has in a large measure passed away, the bibliolatriy of the past being superseded by more intelligent conceptions, nothing can dim the glory of this incomparable collection of ancient literature. The religious ideals of one age require to be translated into the religious ideas of another. The Hebrew prophets and psalmists sometimes present to us an imperfect and partial conception of the Divine nature compared with that which is afforded by the later light of Christianity. We know that God is not sitting, as He is represented in some pictures, on the circle of the heavens, but that His temple is in the heart of man; we know that He is not the God of one nation only, as some of the writers of the Bible thought, but of all mankind. Our Christian conscience revolts against some things which the Biblical writers regarded as foregone conclusions. But this does not affect the solid worth of the volume as the greatest piece of literature that has been given to mankind. In concluding his interesting article, Professor Phelps gives a practical prescription: Three chapters each week day, five chapters on the Sabbath, and the whole Bible will be read through in one year. —From The Province, Vancouver, B. C.

A LETTER FROM INDIA.

If we have been unable to visit Nowgong, where the Ohio Friends have a very flourishing mission work, and have also failed to see Hoshangabad, where the British Friends have been at work, both of which places were considerably off our route, we have come into touch with other Friends elsewhere. I have already written of how through a clipping from THE FRIEND I learned of Jos. Taylor's presence in Calcutta, with whom we spent a very pleasant evening, dining with him and his wife and another Friend, from Ireland, who is in business in the city. They are very active in good works through their little Settlement in a thickly populated section. Through them I learned of Friends in Madras. On our way to Nuwara Eliya from Kandy, Ceylon, in the little bit of a narrow gauge railway carriage climbing the last 2000 of the 6100 feet we had to attain, in conversation with a lady I learned of the presence of H. T. Roper and his wife in the town of our destination. We met him at the railway station and the next morning he took us through a tea estate and showed us how the green leaves are cured before shipped to America. The highest tea, that grown at the highest altitude, brings the highest prices by virtue of its being of the highest quality; I purchased 5 pounds for $5.00 a pound, U. S. gold. It will cost about $1.00 by the time it is in Germantown, probably. The "fannings" or "dust" is just as good practically, only it does not command the best trade so sells on the plantation for about $.40 gold. Friend Roper had been doing missionary work under British Friends, but when they gave up their work in Ceylon, he went over to an independent mission under which he is now engaged.

In Madras we stayed with the Hermans, he being the Y. M. C. A. Secretary there. We arrived early First-day morning and soon after had our "chotohazari," or "early breakfast," the regular one coming at 11, 11.30 or 12 o'clock and the only reason for thinking it is breakfast so far as I can see is that sometimes cereal is served. Reginald Dann, who is most pleasantly remembered, doubtless, with his wife, by many Philadelphians, as it is but recently that they were in our home city, came for us in his "Henry" and took us to his home for 9.30 o'clock meeting. Others making up our group were Dr. F. H. Graveley, the Curator of the Madras Museum, and who the next day showed us over it, pointing out many most interesting things of archeological value, etc., H. G. and Emily Jackson, he being an engineer in the Government's Department of Public Works, Edward Barnes, Professor of Chemistry in Madras Christian University, and William Hindle and his wife, the latter two being not Friends, but interested in meeting with them and engaged in the city Y. M. C. A. work. Dr. Graveley spoke to us on the Hindu's three ways of attaining salvation, the way of knowledge, the way of devotion and the way of works, pointing out how in Jesus Christ we found these three most supremely well exemplified and combined most perfectly. Emily Jackson followed him by observing how we of the West were always so eager to be doing something, and that we could learn a lesson from the religious devotion of the East, remembering that before we can successfully do we must first be.

The renewal of Friendly fellowship was very refreshing. We returned to the Hermans for breakfast, to which Arthur Davies, the Principal of the Law College, had been invited. He was most interesting as he told us of some of his experiences in India. In the afternoon Reginald Dann and his wife drove us around the city, which is widely spread out over a large area. If these Indian cities have nothing else to boast of, but they have of course much else, they can well give us lessons on the use of space in developing their building. Reginald Dann is the "City Planner" for the whole Madras Presidency, so he has "some program" to work out.

From Madras we came straight through to Bombay, two nights and a day, during which latter the atmosphere in our carriage suffered much from fever, the only thermometer I had with me being a fever thermometer, but it registered nobly 105½°. But we did not suffer, so it was all right. Our trip to Ceylon registered 896 miles going by sea and 1500 all but 17 miles returning by rail.

Seeing Murray and Elizabeth Brooks at Colombo was the nicest part of the three weeks away. Their home is right by the sea. Murray is engaged in erecting a fine new Y. M. C. A. building which bids fair to put his work on a much more substantial basis and to give him ample and sufficient tools with which to work.

BENJAMIN WEST AND HIS CONNECTION WITH THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

EDITOR OF THE FRIEND:—

Dear Sir:—My attention has been called to an article in THE FRIEND on this subject. Allow me to say there is no documentary evidence that Benjamin West was ever a member of the Society. By this is meant a birthright member.

His proclivities and early associations were essentially "Friendly" as may be inferred from the following item. In a book published in London a few years ago, entitled "A Book for a Rainy Day," West is quoted as saying: "I was once a Quaker, and have never left their principles." By this it may be understood that he was a Quaker in sentiment, nothing more.

What are the facts in the case?

Benjamin West's father, John West, was a member of the Society in England, but was disowned by his meeting, for what cause is not known. He was married in England, and emigrated to Pennsylvania, with his brothers, William and Thomas, leaving his wife there, and an infant child, a son Thomas. Soon afterward his wife died.

The three brothers settled in Chester County.

John West took up his abode in Springfield, and there he married Sarah Pearson. She was a member of the Society of Friends, but was disowned before her marriage.

They had nine children, and of course, according to Quaker usage, were not members of meeting, as their parents were not members.

Sarah West, the mother, died in 1756, aged fifty-nine years. It is not known that she was reinstated as a member of meeting.

John, the father, applied for membership later, and was received. He returned to England, lived with his son, Thomas, the child of his first wife. He died there, Tenth Month 5, 1776. One of Benjamin West's brothers, William, died Twelfth Month 6, 1808, aged eighty-four years. He was a noted agriculturist, and served five years in the Legislature. He applied for membership in the Society in 1752, and was duly received. It is safe to assume, under these conditions, he was not a birthright member.

In the summer of 1758, Brigadier General Forbes captured Fort Duquesne, now Pittsburgh. Its name was then changed to Fort Pitt. Before leaving Fort Pitt, the General made a determined effort to secure the remains of Sir Peter Halket, who fell at Braddock's defeat in 1755.

Among the military who accompanied the searching expedition was a company of Pennsylvania Rifles, commanded by Captain West, a brother of Benjamin West, the Painter.

There is not much evidence of Quakerism in this incident.

Of the nine children of John and Sarah West, as far as known, five were boys and four girls. Which of the boys became Captain of the "Rifles" does not appear. William alone appears as having joined the Friends. Whether the others became members is not known. Perhaps some of their descendants may know, if living, or possibly some Meeting Records.

For further particulars see The Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography for 1908 and 1921.

Notes on Mountmellick School. (Queen's County, Ireland.)

Annie Margaret Pike.

At the beginning of the following year, 1787, William Leadbeater, "a young man who had been for some time under conviction, found his mind drawn to offer himself as teaching master; Friends having enquired into his motives and qualifications, apprehended it safe to make trial of him, and he accordingly entered upon his duties at a salary of £25 per annum."

About this time a report of the Committee contains the following:—"On taking a review of the children of the school, we are agreeably affected with the orderly appearance they make, and the commendable improvement evident on them." Visiting Friends from outside the province of Leinster shared this opinion, it seems, for two of them offered a donation of $30, but wished to remain anonymous.

Extravagance and careless management in household affairs were discouraged. Forethought as to when to lay in supplies, such as wheat for bread, or fuel for winter use, was to be practiced. The unnecessary use of sugar was to be avoided.

It is interesting to note the dietary.

For Breakfast and Supper:—Either bread and milk, potatoes and milk, flummery and milk, strabout and milk, or bread and milk pottage, according to the different seasons of the year.

Dinner:—First-day:—Bread and broth in winter, either bread and cheese, or potatoes and cheese, and beer in summer. Second and Third-days:—Boiled or roast meat and vegetables for one table, and pudding or suet dumpling for the other, and beer. Fourth and Sixth-days:—Potatoes and either milk or butter. Fifth and Seventh-days:—Meat and vegetables for both tables in winter, pudding in the summer, and beer.

Strabout is oatmeal porridge, according to Chambers' English Dictionary.

Wooden trenchers were in use for the twenty years that followed the opening of the school.

Here are a few extracts from the clothing lists:—"For girls— one cloak (not silk), four caps, with strings, four chequer aprons with bibs. For boys—two coats, two night-caps, one hat, broad brimmed probably. Careful directions were given as to the marking of the garments:—"coats withinside, under the collar; hats or bonnets, withinside the head; shoes, withinside the soal."

The present writer still keeps a small "chequer" apron made at the time of the Centenary on the model of those worn by the girls of a hundred years before. The little muslin cap with strings of white sarsenet ribbon, alas, is lost. These with a high waisted frock of drab-colored stuff, and a neatly folded kerchief for the shoulders, were worn by her when, as "Dinah," she impersonated a Mountmellick school-girl of 1786 at the Centenary Celebrations.

But that is a digression.

At various times the desirability of simplicity in the children's clothing was impressed on the parents, as the two following quotations show.

" . . . It is pressingly and tenderly recommended to those who have the care of children to be careful in this respect —being persuaded that the seeds of vanity, thus early sown in the minds of the dear youth, are often not easily eradicated; but too often assist in fitting them for society altogether improper for them to associate with—thus as it were giving them wings to fly away, not only from the care of the society, but of their tender but perhaps too indulgent parents." The second quotation expressed the desire of Women Friends that parents should supply the children with clothing "in a simple form, not complying with the fashions of the day, but suitable to our profession of simplicity and plainness."

An extract from an educational report of 1796 throws much light on the curriculum and methods of the time.

"The children are divided into three classes: the first comprises the best readers, the second the next best readers, and the third those beginning to read; each class is of both sexes; a lesson is read to every class; and to prevent any idea of one sex being preferred to another for instruction, the males read first one day, and the females first the next day, and so alternately—the different sexes, though of the same class, do not read together, but each in succession by themselves, and by this arrangement the worst readers have sufficient opportunity, if they will make use of it, to get the lesson whilst the rest are reading, and be thereby the sooner ready to go to write and cipher. The getting arithmetical tables and notes, repeating and having them explained, getting their spelling lesson against next morning, and examining the business of the day, occupies the remainder of the fore and afternoon. Spelling individually is the first daily business of the school; those who think they have it best come up and are heard first, without distinction of age or sex; the words each misses are marked in their spelling books, and a register of them kept to prevent erasures, and on Seventh-day evening, before they are allowed to play, they must spell off all the words missed through the week, or be debarred from play for that evening. The children of both sexes spell in one general class on Fourth and Seventh-days."

I find a reference to the school books in use, and note a few of those bought between the years 1791 and 1805, such as:—Anthony Benezet's Spelling Book, Walker's Geography, Extracts and Original Anecdotes, Lindley Murray's English Reader, Lindley Murray's Grammar and Exercises.

As originally established the school was for the children of Friends "in low circumstances," but by the time 1806 was reached, it was found that there were not enough pupils answering to that description to do more than half fill it. Consequently it was decided that all Friends' children in Leinster Province should be eligible when they were of school age. The annual charge for those in "easy or affluent" circumstances was set at £20 (twenty pounds), or "at the average cost," the lower rate remained at £10, to which it had some time before been raised from the original £5. From twenty-three at the time, the numbers rose to sixty at the end of seven years.

In 1821 a larger building was completed.

Some chestnut trees were planted in the front garden. In the course of time they attained to fine proportions. In my school-days it was the custom with the more romantically inclined of the pupils to write "Chestnut Hall" as a heading to their letters, instead of "Friends' Provincial School." When the authorities became aware of it, it was stopped, as being a flight of fancy.

The year 1827 was, we must suppose, a lean year. The use of beer was discontinued and other economies recommended.

Possibly the admonitions were taken too literally. Be that as it may, the boys were so dissatisfied with the food, that they organized an outcry one dinner-time, and were more than severely punished. Many Friends discontinued their subscriptions as a protest against the general state of affairs in the school.

Thrashing was the order of the day, the necessary switches being cut from the bush of butcher's broom in the garden. Nearly fifty years afterwards the bush was still flourishing, but at that later time it served an ornamental purpose only, except that the flat leaf-like branchlets were sometimes used in the botany class to show the curious stalkless nature of the inconspicuous flowers growing upon them.

A scholar of the late eighteen-thirties has left on record a description of one of the masters, Samuel Prescott Dole, an American. "He was Saul-like in stature; he had travelled through a great part of Europe on foot, teaching now and then, as money got scarce. I can see him now as he arrived in the school-room, all bone, about six feet four inches high, his knapsack on his back, with the nails protruding at each side from the soles of his boots as he walked. He left his box in the canal stores. In a few days he borrowed the school wheel-barrow, took it down to the store, filled it with luggage, and wheeled it the whole length of the street, to where the present court-house stands, much to the merriment of the town. He was a great believer in the use of cold water on his person, and it was said that the pump opposite where he lodged had a severe ordeal to undergo in supplying him. He was about the greatest disciplinarian we had. No rod, all firmness. When a boy was not what he should be, he took him under his special charge—out of school. Whether in the playground or out walking, there was the culprit, about three yards ahead of him, moving as he moved, even when he went to his lodging, until the discipline had the desired effect."

This "No rod" system surely was much superior to the one requiring inroads on the bush of butcher's broom.

A PRAYER FOR THE WORLD.

Look, Lord, in pity on the nations' need,
For Thou dost see, with perfect sight and true,
The world o'ersworn with selfishness. It needs
Not heavenly grace distilled as evening's dew;
Thy sacrificial love seems all forgot
And man's tempestuous nature swift and hot.

Bring Thou Thy strength and beauty to Thy saints;
Enrobe them with Thy righteousness and power
To face and struggle with the world's sad plights,
When men are shrinking in this fateful hour.
Oh, may they stand for righteousness and peace!
Oh, may this tide of wrong forever cease!

Lead on Thy saints against the rule of sin
Till hate be overwhelmed with brotherhood;
And man shall rise in strong desire to win
Thy likeness true, and seek his brother's good;
Till Thy great gift of peace descend on men
And earth proclaim a lasting fond Amen.

ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE.

A DEPARTMENT CONDUCTED BY JOHN T. EMLÉN.

[The following have been taken from magazines and are, I think, better than any original material I could prepare, touching on the interests represented in the selections.—JOHN T. EMLÉN.]

THE RURAL SCHOOL MOVEMENT AMONG NEGROES.

During the last eight years fourteen hundred "Rosewald Schools" for Negroes have been built in rural districts of fourteen Southern States.

These represent a total investment of nearly five million dollars. Nine hundred of the schools are of the one or two-teacher type, built at relatively small average outlay. But fifty of them cost $10,000 or more apiece, in one case the expenditure being $104,000.

As now administered each school is located upon a good-sized plot of ground, the minimum requirement being two acres.

A fundamental condition of aid, from the beginning, has been that the Negroes, either by themselves, from white friends or from public funds, should provide an amount equal to, or larger than, that furnished by Julius Rosewald. As the plan has worked out, the Negroes have raised $1,250,000; interested white people have contributed directly $300,000, and, indirectly, have co-operated in public expenditures of $2,175,000; and Julius Rosewald has given $1,000,000.

This notable educational movement grew out of the thought of Dr. Booker T. Washington. One of his earliest convictions was that the Negro rural schools must be improved.—From The Crisis.

JULIUS ROSENWALD AND THE Y. M. C. A.

Julius Rosewald for twelve years has been helping city Negroes secure Y. M. C. A. buildings, and country Negroes school-houses. Stimulated by his sympathy and offers of money, white and colored people working side by side have provided fourteen "Y" buildings. These cost $2,170,000 and serve a Negro urban population of 1,000,000.

While the bulk of Julius Rosewald's contribution to the "Y" and school work was his inspiration and encouragement of others, in the measurable form of cash he gave $1,350,000 or about 19 per cent. of the total or more than $7,000,000 thus far expended. "This great movement in behalf of a race has only begun. The "Y" and the school-house campaigns are still going on, the latter in increasing volume.

Julius Rosewald offered in 1910, $25,000 to any city in the United States that would raise by popular subscription at least $75,000 additional.

The offer was made through the Y. M. C. A. so that a permanent organization would direct and oversee the campaigns and construction and, by advice gained from experience, would guide the activities and maintenance of the buildings.

By 1920 thirteen buildings had been provided, all but one (in Pittsburgh) completed. For good measure, a fourteenth building outside the limits of his offer, but for which he contributed $25,000, had been completed in New York City for colored women and girls. The cities securing buildings are:—Atlanta, Cincinnati, New York, Baltimore, Columbus, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Brooklyn, Indianapolis, Kansas City, Washington and Chicago.

Each building contains dormitories, housing from fifty to two hundred. This equipment permits men and boys to use their leisure hours in ways that are pleasant and attractive, while at the same time contributing to physical, mental and moral welfare.

With the ten-year campaign completed, other cities desired buildings. The war-time migration of Southern Negroes to Northern industrial centres caused changed conditions which led him in 1920 to make a second offer, also through the Y. M. C. A. He proposed to give $25,000 to any city that would raise not less than $125,000 additional, the increased amount being necessitated by rising building costs. This offer specified that each building must contain separate quarters for men and boys, standard gymnasium, swimming pool, class and club-rooms, restaurant and not fewer than fifty dormitory rooms.

The cities whose interest influenced him to make the second offer are Akron, O.; Dayton, O.; Detroit; Jersey City; Augusta, Ga.; Montclair, N. J.; Atlantic City; Orange, N. J.; Los Angeles, Nashville and Chicago for a second building. Some of these cities already have secured building sites.

By request he extended his offer to include another building for colored women and girls, this one in Philadelphia. Construction on it has already begun.—From The Crisis.

For this excess a number of reasons are assigned: New York's Negro population includes a large number of West Indians, who, though perhaps just as hearty as any other persons, when they leave home must habituate themselves to a more rigorous climate. Much the same adjustment is required of the thousands of Negroes from the South.—From Opportunity.

CO-OPERATION BETWEEN URBAN AND RURAL COMMUNITIES.

Monroe N. Work, Director of Research and Records at Tuskegee Institute, gives the following interesting comment on recent Negro migration from country to city:

"The past thirty years have witnessed the greatest growth in urban population which the nation has experienced. In the period from 1890 to 1920, the increase of the rural population of the country was a little more than eleven millions. At the same time there was an increase in urban population of over thirty millions; in other words, for each person added to the rural population, three were added to the urban population.

"When the Negro population of the country is considered, it is found that in the past thirty years, there was an increase in the rural population of 896,124. The increase in the Negro urban population for the same period was 2,078,331; that is, for every one person added to the Negro rural population, two were added to the Negro urban population.

"The larger part of the increase in Negro urban population has been due to migration. This migration has been national and not sectional. The migration from the rural districts of the South directly to the cities of the North has not been as great as the movement from country districts to cities; even the migration of 1916-1920 was, for the major part, a movement of Negroes from the country districts to cities. This included for the most part, migration to the North from cities of the South and migration from country districts of the South into Southern cities to replace those who went North.

"The growth in Negro urban population is of great importance to the Negro. On the debit or loss side of the ledger account we can place the tremendous cost of life, health and of morals which this movement from rural to urban centres has entailed upon the race.

"On the credit side of the ledger we are able to place a number of gains; one of the most important of these is that it is a distinct advantage to have a considerable proportion of the Negroes of the nation living in urban centres. It is in the cities that leadership of the race is developed. On the other hand, it is true that the bulk of the Negroes will probably continue in the rural districts. Although this may be true, it is a distinct advantage, nevertheless, to have a large part of them living in cities. This general distribution of Negroes in urban and rural centres enables them to diversify their occupations and have all the activities, industrial, personal, professional and trade, which belong to a normal and well-rounded group.

"Until recent years, the rural dweller, especially in the South, lived more or less in isolation without any easy and rapid means of communication with urban centres. The establishing of rural free delivery mail routes, the extension of the telephone to the country and the building of good roads, are among the chief agencies which have brought the town into closer touch with the country. In fact, easy and rapid means of communication between towns and country is resulting in urban conditions being brought into the country, particularly the problems of urban welfare. It has been said there is no vice, no immorality of the city which, at the present day, is not found to a greater or lesser degree in the country districts.

"There is no group in our composite American population in which there is so close relation between urban and rural elements as is true of the Negro. So general has been the movement of Negroes from rural districts to the city that by far the greater number of those living in urban centres have relatives or acquaintances in the rural sections. What affects the Negro in the rural districts reacts on those dwelling in cities; what affects those dwelling in cities likewise reacts upon those dwelling in the country districts.

"Family conditions differ. There are in the rural districts forces which operate to a considerable extent to maintain the family unit. This is generally true with reference to a Negro family on a plantation. All the members of the family are usually engaged in the same sort of occupation. Planters endeavor to have tenant families with large numbers of children, in order to have the advantage of the labor of the entire family. Although the family unit on the plantation may be maintained, the problems of morality, of health, of sanitation, poverty, crime, and especially of recreation and education are very inadequately met. When this rural family migrates to the city, new forces begin to operate; the tendency is for various members of the family to engage in various kinds of occupation; each is probably working for a different employer; this tends toward the disintegration of the family.

"The Negro child having been neglected in the rural districts, goes into the city with a handicap of ignorance and of inefficiency with which the urban welfare workers must contend. It would be of great advantage if there were a more adequate co-operation between the town and the open country with reference to education, so that the town would not be handicapped with the problem of handling the ignorant which is thrust upon it by the country."—From Opportunity.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

A SOUTH AMERICAN BREAKFAST.—The average American's breakfast is no mean meal with its fruit, cereal, eggs, toast, and coffee, and yet it is not as elaborate as the morning meal of an Englishman, who likes some fish or meat (or both) as well as the above mentioned dishes. It is the Latin peoples who eat sparingly in the morning, and the poor among them live on a slender diet day in and day out. In "A Child's Day in South America," Mary F. Sweney describes a typical coffee-breakfast:

"Carmelita, run and see if the lechero is coming. He is very late." The lechero is the milkman. How can one have coffee-breakfast without milk?

So Carmelita ran to the door of the courtyard and came back calling, "Yes, there he is, just turning the corner."

She caught up the sauceman, her mother gave her a ten-cent nickel, and Carmelita went to the street door. Her little brother, Manuelito, went, too, for he wished to see the cows.

There was the milkman with his soft red cap on his head. There were the three cows and with every cow was her calf and every calf had a leather bag tied over its nose and mouth. There were breathing-holes in the bags, but not one drop of milk could the hungry calf get till the milkman took off the nose-bag.

"Oh!" said Manuelito, "see that little new calf. It can hardly walk. This is the first time it has come." The little new calf had a little new nose-bag, and about its neck was a strong cord. The other end of the long cord was tied to the tail of the mother-cow. That was so the little new calf should learn to follow the cow and not stray away and get lost.

The milkman took the sauceman from Carmelita and sat down on his heels beside the big, red cow, and milked right into the sauceman. He milked fast till the pan looked nearly full of white, foamy milk. Then he gave it to Carmelita, tucked the ten-cent nickel into the pocket of his leather belt and went driving his cows to the door of the next customer. And the baby calf went wabbling along, tied to the tail of the mother-cow.

When Carmelita took the sauceman in her mother said, "What a small quart of milk! It is half froth. Now, run and buy the bread."

So Carmelita ran to the baker's with a ten-cent nickel and a clean napkin and brought back six little crusty rolls. Of course, Manuelito went, too, and the baker gave him a tiny sweet cracker which Manuelito called "la yapa." When they came back the coffee was ready, and the sauceman was on the red coals in the brazier just outside the door, so the milk was almost hot.

The mother took a bowl and put in plenty of coffee and a little milk and gave it with a crusty roll to the father, who sat on a box inside the room and ate his breakfast. She put plenty of milk and a little coffee into two little bowls and gave them to Carmelita and Manuelito with two of the crusty rolls, and they sat on the doorstep with the bowls on the floor beside them. The mother took a bowl with her share of the coffee and the milk and a crusty roll and she sat on the foot of the bed, for there were no chairs, and they all had breakfast.

Of the group of English Young Friends who are to visit in America this summer the following are named: Howard Diamond (editor of the Young Quaker), E. Roy Calvert (a London Friend), Winifred Cramp, who is now working in Berlin, M. Christine Graham (of Birmingham), Gerald Littleboy (Secretary of the Y. F. Committee). Probably two or three others will sail with the second party and all will arrive in Seventh Month and attend the Y. F. Conferences and in other ways mingle with Friends in America.

THE FUTURE OF FRIENDS' SERVICE IN POLAND.

About the end of last month the main work of the Friends' Relief and Reconstruction Mission in Poland came to a close. Feeling that those of the Polish refugees whom it was possible for the Mission to help had either been placed in a position in which they could help themselves, or else that the further help which they required was of a kind which a foreign relief mission could not render, the Mission considered that the time had come when it could fittingly bring to a close its agricultural reconstruction work, and its work of feeding and medical relief.

There are, however, certain phases of the work which the Mission did not feel could be brought to a close at the present time. The extent to which these will be continued depends upon the amount of contributions which can be obtained for the purpose of their continuance during the coming year. The Mission has, therefore, outlined both a minimum and maximum program for the completion of this work.

The minimum program embraces several small pieces of work which the Mission had previously undertaken, and which it felt committed to finish before closing down. These include the continuance, at least through the summer, of home industry work in four centres where the refugee women need the funds which they obtain from this work in order to help to get their families on a self-supporting basis once more; timber-hauling for housing reconstruction in one district until Fourth Month 31st, and the continued operation of the Mission sawmills until the same date. The cost of completing this minimum program is estimated at $10,000.

The maximum program provides for the completion of the work outlined as the minimum program, and in addition provides for the continuation of a hauling column of 200 horses in the Vilno district throughout the coming winter; for the working of the two sawmills for an additional ten months, as there has already been sufficient timber hauled by the Mission in the two outposts where the sawmills are located to keep them occupied during this period; and for the establishment of an orphanage and training school for workers among children.

It is recommended that the timber-hauling scheme be carried on with the object of hauling timber for 1,000 houses. This would require 200 horses working until Fourth Month, 1924. The Executive Committee of the Mission gives its reasons for making this recommendation as follows:

"1. Although the districts in which the Mission has worked may be regarded as having received the minimum amount of help necessary to enable them to help themselves, the difficulties attending housing reconstruction remain unsolved. A peasant has to become very rich indeed before he can afford to transport thirty cubic metres of timber a distance of fifty kilometres and bear the additional expense of building a house with it. In effect, the government grant of timber to repatriants whose houses have been destroyed during the war remains in certain districts a dead letter, owing to the inability of the peasants to transport the timber. This is the condition of things in that part of the Vilno district in which the Mission proposes to continue this work.

"2. In practically all the other outposts in which the Mission has worked, it has already given very substantial help in housing reconstruction. Although every peasant has not yet a house of his own, enough timber has been hauled to build a sufficient number of houses to prevent undue crowding during the winter months. Thus the emergency need has been met. In Vilno, however, little or no housing reconstruction has yet been undertaken, and the need is still intense. People are still living in dugouts and shelters, which are not only overcrowded, but which in themselves are of a disease breeding nature.

"3. We have received many requests from both government officials and individual peasants to continue our work there. Not only this, but the local officials have given the heartiest co-operation, appointing a special liaison officer between the Ministry of Reconstruction and the Mission. There is no difficulty in obtaining all the timber we need, and in addition the Ministry of Reconstruction has supplied bricks, glass and sawn planks and is willing to continue to do so. In Warsaw also, the need for reconstruction in the Vilno district is appreciated and the Finance Minister is willing to grant credit for it. For these reasons it has been decided to recommend the continuation of the timber-hauling there."

The above plan does not include any provision for helping the peasants to saw into planks the timber which is hauled. The advisability of making such a provision will be later considered. If undertaken, the sawing mill will require additional funds, as it has not been included in the work for which the present maximum budget has been drawn up.

Investigations are now being made in regard to the possibility of starting a model orphanage and training school for workers among children, in accordance with the request of the repatriants committee. The representatives of the American Junior Red Cross are much interested in this suggestion, and are prepared to try to promote the collection of money for such a scheme. The suggestion for the orphanage, which will not be large, is that it be on the cottage system, the children being mainly those owning land for whom a farm training would be very desirable. The scheme would include an attempt to provide for the care of the orphans' land until they themselves were able to take possession of it. The training scheme would aim at preparing workers for conducting the orphanages at present in existence by more enlightened methods, and at developing as soon as possible a boarding-out scheme by which the orphans would be given a home environment.

The Ministry of Social Care appears most anxious to promote these schemes, and to co-operate in every way in loaning buildings, etc.; but probably little financial help could be expected, as the whole orphan problem in Poland is so overpowering and such a strain upon the government's resources.

The total amount required for carrying out the maximum program would be $50,000.

The very definite proposals made by the Polish Mission for rendering these final services to those who suffered so deeply from the war, should meet with an equally definite response in America. Twenty-five dollars will haul timber enough to build a house for a refugee family that is now living in one of the Vilno dugouts. Twenty-five hundred dollars will provide for the establishment of the proposed model training school and orphanage. When comparatively small amounts are able to accomplish such very great service to those in need, shall not Friends endeavor to add the maximum program in Poland to the list of their already great achievements in service? Every contribution, however small, if sent to the American Friends' Service Committee, 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., and marked "For Poland," will help to make this additional achievement possible.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

EARLHAM COLLEGE has recently received a gift of $25,000 from Sarah J. Swift, of Worcester, Mass. The money is to be added to the Endowment Fund.

The Chicago Evening Post, in urging upon its readers the wisdom of adding to their shelves "at least one new book which will help you to a better understanding and higher appreciation of the things that make for inner peace and spiritual enrichment," recommended four books especially.

One of these was Rufus M. Jones's "Spiritual Energies in Daily Life."

A REVIEW of "The Journal and Essays of John Woolman," by Amelia Mott Gummere, written by Henry J. Cadbury, appears in the Spring Book Section of The Nation. This book is creating a great deal of interest among people outside the Society of Friends.

The Nation for Third Month 21st contains a fine article on "Is America Anti-Semitic?" by Lewis S. Gannett, which every Friend should read. He sums it up by saying, "We have talked about the melting-pot, but have been unwilling to plunge into it ourselves. If we really want an America that is truly a meeting-place and mingling-place for the cultures of the world the first step must be a change in our Anglo-Saxon attitude. It is not so much anti-Semitism, Christian theology, or Jewish traits that stand in the way as the smug Anglo-Saxon tradition of exclusiveness and self-sufficiency."

"Tokyo.—In the school histories, all militaristic ideas have been eliminated and lessons introduced to teach children a friendly understanding of foreign lands. The history is made up of bibliographies. Of 4,000 men whose life stories are told, 50 belong to foreign lands and include Washington, Lincoln, Edison, Marconi and Watt. The Washington Arms Conference results are described as they affect Japan and her part in insuring peace in the Pacific."—Detroit News.

The rose "America," which won for E. Gurney Hill, the rose grower of Richmond, Indiana, the gold medal from the American Rose Society, at Cincinnati, Ohio, last winter, won two medals in the International Flower Show at New York City this spring. It was considered the best new rose grown during the past year.

The Baptist Times (English) has had a correspondence on the subject of women ministers. It is interesting to Friends to note that Mackenzie Bell, a Presbyterian, in the final letter expressed the opinion that on one point all must agree, "that is, that not even the Bible, not even the Church is the supreme rule of Christian conduct. It is the witness of the Holy Ghost who 'guides into all truth.' For more than 250 years the Society of Friends has stood for purity of religion, and has 'turned many to righteousness,' and they have always possessed the ministry of women."

MEMORIALS OF GEORGE FOX.—The tercentenary of George Fox's birth occurs next year. He says in his journal—I was born in the month called July in Fenny Drayton, etc. Who can give us the exact date of his birth? It is but natural that conversations during the coming months with this as the centre of interest will refresh and inform many minds concerning George Fox's biography. The following, addressed to The Friend (London) is appropriate in this connection:—

A little group of Friends and others gathered today in a room in the town from which I write for a time of worship. Of these one was Jewell M. Pfaltz, of Flushing, New York. In conversation afterward, she mentioned with pride how George Fox organized his campaign in the States from Flushing, and how the treasure of Friends there is the great granite rock from which he preached to the multitudes. Visitors from all parts come to see that historic rock. When I suggested it should be presented to England in connection with the Tercentenary, she nearly cabled over to set a force of police about it.

For what have we in our country to show to our children, friends and visitors, to express to the eye that rugged, tremendous character? The only accessible one is a dingy stone, of ugly form, looking derelict in a smoke-begrimed semi-private open space. This marks where our Society's hero is buried. However much Friends may protest against man-worship, and declare that it is the message and not the messenger that we esteem, is it not a fact that at our meetings for worship, and still more in our writings or meetings for propaganda the name of George Fox, the man, is constantly on our lips: what he said, what he did, how he suffered, how he rose above it all? Personality is the greatest influence in the world, and the message that Fox delivered we receive and understand largely because we see how the words of Jesus came home to him and operated in his life.

And yet we do not make half as much of him as we ought. The thrilling incidents of his life, his determination not to be set aside in his search for Christ by the good and respectable people around him, his encounters with brutal ruffians, set on by the "professors," his endurance of the unnameable horrors of the prisons to which the law of the land condemned him, his majestic and essentially courteous audiences with Cromwell still wait to be set before us and our youth in books that would vastly surpass any heroes of fiction. Rufus Jones has just helped us by his new volume, but reading it through I still felt that the veil had not quite been lifted from the immense energy and virility of Fox.

As I visited Bunhill regularly for many years, it has long been my earnest wish to see that paltry tomb-stone replaced by a great granite rock, of massive proportions but as far as possible of natural form. It might perhaps be furnished with a bronze medallion sculptured after the fashion of the fine burst that is treasured in the Library of Devonshire House. The Tercentenary now offers a unique opportunity to rectify this misprision of our duty.

At one time possibly it was considered that beauty was barely compatible with virtue, that outward grace was likely to distract the mind from inward goodness, but latterly we have abandoned that sort of idea. Let Friends be consistent. When the new Devonshire House is built we may take it that the architect will be expected to introduce grace and form into his building as well as simplicity. Our own meeting-house is often spoken of as charming; it is also regarded by those who gather there as very conducive to fellowship. Penn's tomb-stone is small—but his memorial is in the whole setting of "Jordans" with its beautiful beech trees, and the total effect is beyond words beautiful.

It ought not to be beyond our capacity to raise a visible memorial combining simplicity with a sense of power, worthy of our great leader, and evoking from us the cry, "Thank God for George Fox."

E. CLAUDE TAYLOR.

The Editor adds:—Our Friend appears to have overlooked the "Preacher's Cliff," the rock at Pardshaw Craig, Cumberland, from which George Fox addressed large gatherings: it is at least as accessible to English Friends as the Flushing rock is to the average American Friend. There is also Pendle Hill, from which the Lord showed him "in what places He had a great people to be gathered."

THE PASTORAL ELEMENT.

Concord Quarterly Meeting has had under appointment for many years a Visitation Committee of about twenty members. The personnel of the Committee changes every two years. During the period of their appointment each member expects to visit each of the several meetings in the Quarter at least two, and in some cases, three times.

Every two months the Committee as a whole plans to attend one of the meetings in the morning and in the afternoon to hold a two hours' session for the consideration of the interests of the Meetings. These are always open to Friends generally, and have been occasions when great liberty has been exercised in a kindly discussion of Meeting problems.

The report alluded to in the leading article of this issue was read at one of these Committee meetings and is a fair indication of the problems that are considered. The editors of THE FRIEND had no conspicuous part in the preparation of the subjoined report.

It is not a difficult question to answer, and it is one often asked—Why were the Friends of the eighteenth century so absolutely unfitted to the task that conditions of that time offered them? Why did John Wesley as a religious reformer and enthusiast win out, while the descendants of the seventeenth century Friends failed signally to rise to the opportunities of their day?

The answers that will be given us will vary to suit the mental bent of those who speak, but they will all be virtually reducible to this fact, that during the three generations that span the gap between Fox and Wesley, the Friends had so greatly lessened their efforts as an evangelizing body, that the demand of the day that called to them no less insistently than it had called to Fox, received but scant notice from them. We were husbanding our strength to preserve what little life we still had and were not equal to the great effort that the opportunity seemed to offer us.

There is probably no more striking incident that confirms this statement than that which is witnessed to by the religious labors in this country of Samuel Fothergill.

He traveled thousands of miles up and down the Atlantic border, visited sometimes by the week in the villages where there were Friendly settlements, not satisfied and comfortable with what he had done he revisited some of the places, and in some special cases once only did not suffice.

If we contrast the visible fruits which came from his Gospel labors in America, with those that sprang from the preaching of Fox and Wesley, we shall find in the first case few converts to the preaching, while in the other case they will be counted by many hundreds.

George Fox's gift at organization was second only to his power as a teacher and converter. His preaching won many to the better way. He found the young church which sprang up under the efforts of men like himself in need of law and method in order to restrain the zeal of those who would outstrip their Guide, hence he introduced a discipline.

The spirit of freedom which this discipline not only allowed but encouraged witnessed a sad departure in many cases from even a reasonable standard, so that Samuel Fothergill's first task was to call the people back and to place about the Society, no longer an infant but already a parent of three generations, safeguards for its preservation.

It is very safe to say that after George Fox, no Friend in any generation has had a more prominent part than Samuel Fothergill has had in the formation of a "discipline" or code of rules and practices for the Society of Friends.

It is pertinent at this point to introduce and to try to answer the query—wherein was there a radical difference between the teaching of Fox and Wesley? Aside from the doctrine of the "Inner Light," which had gained many strong converts in all the churches by the middle of the eighteenth century, the next great lesson the Friends insisted upon was the innate dignity and importance in the sight of our Common Father of every soul that He had created. The Quaker Church in its inception was the truest democracy that we know of; it was profoundly so in theory and should be so in practice. Whatever militates against this idea is anti-Quaker. It is the greatest of the distinctive contributions our Society has made to the churches of today. The Friend is not called upon to denounce the peculiar methods or practices of others; the day for that has in good measure passed, but the call to him is as insistent and as positive as it was two-and-a-half centuries ago, to proclaim as George Fox enunciated it that he was sent to lead men to Christ and to leave them there. It was the power of Divine Grace in the soul of man, without mediation of priest or sacrament, the secret operation of God's power in the human heart that the Friends pleaded for then, it is the same today if we are true to our calling. Others may have great lessons given them to promulgate, we believe they have much to teach us. It is for us, however, to be faithful to that distinctive truth which God in His wisdom has given us to proclaim.

The foregoing remarks have been called forth in large degree by a suggestive report of a Sub-committee of Concord Quarterly Meeting and read before that body at its last session, Fifth Month 15th. It was very noticeable that the report as originally drafted and including in its body the expression "pastoral service" was quite objectionable to several who heard it. The report was referred back to the Committee for amendment, and when reproduced without an iota of change in the thoughts it stood for, but with the word "pastoral" replaced by another, those who had objected at the first reading enthusiastically accepted it.

We commend the report which appears in the present issue of THE FRIEND to the careful reading of those who see it.

Does there lurk insidiously in the suggestion which it contains, something that in its very nature is contradictory to the essence of George Fox's teaching which I have tried to stress in this brief paper? I allude especially to the paragraphs that touch upon the shepherding of the flock. Our Discipline is explicit in defining the duties of Elders and Overseers—but we know that in our larger meetings many things that should receive attention are neglected because the hours of each day are too short and the days of each week too few to allow all to be accomplished that demands accomplishment.

There may be several Overseers and the tasks may be fairly divided among them, but much fails of accomplishment that is planned; again in our smaller meetings but a part only of the little that is scheduled is accomplished, because so often the one or the two under appointment as Overseers lack in the essential element of leadership and initiative.

It is not the pastoral care that a meeting owes its members that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting regards as anti-Quaker, the more of real pastoral oversight that can be extended to the membership, the better it is for the recipients of the care and for those under appointment to render it.

Report of Concord Quarterly Meeting Visitation Committee.

Since the last formal report of the Committee for the Extension of Christian Fundamentals of Concord Quarterly Meeting, your committee has held several meetings with an approximate average of 15 members present. Our individual members have been encouraged to visit in their individual capacities our several meetings, and each has been provided with a suggestive schedule of such visits. It was hoped that thereby duplication and omission of visits might be avoided.

In addition to the regular meetings, appointed meetings have been held at Thornton, Delaware Co., near Phoenixville, at Rush Hospital, and at Centre, Delaware. All were felt to be helpful occasions, calling forth expressions of appreciation from attenders resident in these several vicinities. Through these meetings it has been possible to present Friends' interpretation of the Christian message to some unfamiliar with our view-point.

A backward look over the past year's labors of your committee is at once encouraging and discouraging. While it would appear that our visits to various communities have been an encouragement to the Friends there, we are conscious of a feeling that we have not been as diligent in taking up with available opportunities as we might have been.

It has been our earnest desire to do whatever may be rightly laid upon us to further the efficient functioning of our constituent meetings, and much time has been devoted to serious discussions as to the best means of its accomplishment.

Frequently our attention has been called to the individual responsibilities of those resident in our various communities. No community can continue to thrive and grow when all the

What we do feel opposed to is the insistence upon such a plan as will disregard that fundamental essential of Quakerism which will allow one man or one woman to usurp the duties and the privileges of the many. We do not question but that much good follows the dedicated service which results from the so-called "pastoral system" among Friends, our contention is that this is not the great contribution that should come to world advancement in religion through Friends; other branches of the Christian church ever since their establishment have rendered this better than we do it or can do it; it is part and parcel of their organic life; the Friends' contribution is different from theirs, we have so much in common with them, that nothing but a spirit of love and good fellowship prevails between us, but if we both know anything of the real spirit of Quakerism we must recognize that each has its own task.

We do not know that the report of this Committee of Concord Quarterly Meeting will do more than awaken some of us to a fuller realization of our duties as officers and members of a congregation; if, however, it should lead to the appointment of a "field secretary" by some Quarterly Meetings jointly, we entertain the belief, certainly the hope, that the service rendered will stimulate us all to a fuller performance of our obligations, first to our fellow-members and then to our unchurched neighbors, of whom there are not a few who need the Christian fellowship a Friends' meeting and community can offer, if the way were made easier and more natural for this to be brought about.

Many may see in this a departure that must lead away from the very principle which this essay tries to foster, others will see in it a means towards helping to make the overseership of a meeting approach more nearly to the ideal which every meeting wishes to cherish.

D. H. F.

upbuilding influence comes from without. May each of us, wherever he may be, submerging himself, look to the Source of All for guidance and sustaining power to push forward in true zeal, being not disobedient to the Heavenly vision.

In some communities, notably Middletown, a commendable co-operation with other Christian churches exists. Your committee desires the encouragement of such.

One meeting was devoted to a consideration of the subject of Bible Classes and First-day Schools. It was the consensus of opinion that such efforts should be encouraged, as helpful adjuncts of our meetings when conducted under Divine leadership. They should result not only in a better familiarity and understanding of the Bible, but should inspire to a fuller appreciation of the Master's will for his servants and to a greater zeal in His service.

Discussion of the question: "Are our meetings for worship what they might be?" engaged the attention of the committee. While our form of worship is based upon what we believe to be sound principles, we fear the meetings themselves at times fall far short of their possibilities. The ideal meeting ought to grow out of a fusion of the worship of its several attenders, where each soul is prayerfully exercised before its Heavenly Father to offer to Him the spiritual worship which He calls for; and out of this waiting silence there may oftentimes come the message which the Head of the Church has for that meeting or for the separate individual worshippers. There is great strength in group worship.

And may it not be at times, that we are not as responsive to the Divine call as the Master would wish?

While the committee does not record itself as in any way favoring utterances in our meetings for worship that are not Divinely inspired, we are conscious of the need of a wider and larger expression, a broader interchange and sharing of our individual religious experience. Do we not at times fail to bring to our meetings the same devotion, to accord to them the same earnest thought, to extend toward them the same effort and to make sacrifices equal to those we bring to the other problems of our lives?

The attendance of the committee at the various meetings, larger as well as smaller, has tended to deepen and strengthen our interest in them, and our sympathy for their peculiar problems, and we trust, in some instances, the meetings thus visited have re-acted to this feeling, and the help has thus become mutual.

[A Sub-Committee of the General Committee at the same time submitted a fuller report which the Editors are glad to give to the readers of THE FRIEND.]

REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE.

The Committee which was asked to consider and report on the needs of our smaller meetings, and how we can more effectively render assistance to them, has given attention to the matter, and reports as follows:—

The inquiry immediately assumes a broad and very fundamental aspect, involving a consideration of the structure and function of Friends' Meetings, the manner of holding them and of giving them life, the groups of individuals and families which are, or ought to be, associated with them, and the causes which lead to their apparent success or failure. It is of course assumed that numbers are not the sole measure of the usefulness of a meeting or of any other similar religious effort, but as a measure of the degree to which a particular meeting is functioning as the religious centre of a community, or as an expression of its spiritual life and aspirations toward service in the cause of Christ, we must admit that numbers are of prime importance. A meeting composed of a very few individuals may be of very deep spiritual power within the limits of its own attendance, and may spread a much wider influence than we can know or can measure, but we feel that our message is also for the larger group and that we should not be satisfied with a small and selected gathering not in close association with the neighborhood.

We understand that we are requested to consider how we can assist our meetings to function as spiritual centres of community life affecting the largest possible number of individuals.

Our Quarterly Meeting presents an interesting field of inquiry. The territory is large and prosperous, and so near to the city as to enjoy the advantages of easy communication with it and with all that it has to offer. The population is increasing and is made up of men and women of such a character as should appreciate the appeal of Quakerism. The members of our Society once dominated the country-side in many sections to which they are now strangers, and while Friends seem at all times to have retained the respect of their neighbors and in many respects seem to have been more or less of leaders in the community, they seem for some unascertained reason to have been unable to associate with themselves other people willing and able to take up the tradition where the elders have laid it down.

A survey of our Quarterly Meeting discloses meetings at Chichester and Goshen, once largely attended and influential, which were long ago discontinued, and Birmingham, Chester, Malvern, Springfield and Concord in need of help. Our other meetings may be said to be in a fairly prosperous condition, although the problem of our large meetings is also a pressing one. In the communities tributary to the small meetings above enumerated there are many unchurched people, and many whose religious affiliations have all been with Friends and who ought to be active workers with us.

It must be admitted that the Quaker emphasis upon individual responsibility has a natural tendency toward society disintegration, and this is emphasized in an age when there are so many other influences tending in the same direction, and so many other avenues of good work outside the church. This is a free-thinking age.

We are without the cohesive influence of a religious faith which holds the relation of the individual to the church organization as the test of his relation to God. We do not believe or teach that one must be a Quaker to be saved. We are not and never have been a proselyting body, and our regard for all who are true worshippers, no matter what may be their creed or practice, is not calculated to draw those from other denominations. Our method of worship has in it nothing that is entertaining, and little to stir the emotions, as is found in most church rituals. And we have no pastors upon whom we impose the duty to watch over the flock and keep it together.

And yet, for all of these things we believe there are adequate compensations. If we emphasize individual responsibility and the need that each shall search his own conscience for the Light of Life, we also emphasize individual duty, not only in the affairs of private life, but in the affairs of the church, which with us means the meeting, and we have set before the body of our members larger doors of opportunity for service than are offered by any other denomination. If we do not make society membership a test of fellowship with God, we have shown the way toward a closer fellowship with Him than any church affiliation can offer and at the same time do not fetter ourselves with any creed or ritual, nor set up any untruthful spring between ourselves and our Creator, which tend to supplant that instant appeal to the Light of Christ within our own soul, when questions or doubts are to be resolved. If we do not proselyte, our doors have always been wide open to all who are willing to join with us in our faith and practice and common aspiration. If our meetings for worship lack the element of entertainment and perhaps of teaching which some desire, they offer an altogether unique opportunity for that spiritual communion with God which we believe is the substance of all true worship and which is of inestimable significance to the individual in the moulding of his own life. All of these things are commonplace with us and to a large extent they are accepted by those whose religious co-operation we would like to gain, and yet, for some reason Friends do not seem able to make their message sufficiently vital to draw men and women to them. And this is the more extraordinary when we consider that very many of the class of people whom we are considering are spiritually minded and highly ethical in their habits of thought and practice and are often interested in social improvements and philanthropic activities to an unusual extent. Indeed, they seem often to be all that we could desire of them except in profession and association with us.

Our principles and practices are peculiarly in harmony with the free, independent, seeking spirit of the age in which we live.

Evidently we have a good faith, and a good practice, and there are many people whom we ought to reach and bring into our meetings, and the question is how it is to be accomplished.

Perhaps we should more strongly emphasize the duty of our members and of all people more seriously to accept meeting or church responsibility. The organized church is a necessity of Christianity, or even of mere Christian ethics, and if we cannot teach that the individual's relation to God depends on his relation to the church, we can teach that a fair measure of the individual's devotion to God will be found in the measure of his devotion to the organized church of God.

As any meeting must function with and among those who compose it, so the life and hope of any meeting must be found in the same individuals. Life cannot be infused into a meeting group from without, but it must be found within itself. The function of the committee should be to stir up the members in the various communities which are the subject of this concern, so that they will arouse themselves to their duties and opportunities and take upon themselves the work of building up their own meetings. We can help them and counsel them, and even inspire them, but after all the work must come from within.

There was a time when certain favored ministers were enabled to go into a community and with a few meetings and household visits to so enthuse the whole neighborhood, that with one accord they would join in a strong and lively meeting. But either we have not now the ministry so gifted, or the times have so changed that the same methods will not bring about the same results. Indeed, our own Quarterly Meeting represents the spectacle of meetings where there was once a strong and faithful ministry, but no growth in the meeting groups. We are therefore led to the conclusion that it is not ministry alone that we require. We need to create or to revive not only an adequate, and strongly anointed ministry, but also an adequate and devotedly interested audience ready to accept the message which the ministers are able to communicate, and willing to translate it into meeting life and community activity. We need to impress upon the individual groups of seriously minded people to be found in every community, the grave duty that rests upon them to accept and to carry their share in the organized religious life of the neighborhood, and to gather the people into the fold of our meetings' organizations.

We are led to fear that in some places there is a lack of Christian unity among those who ought to stand together and compose the meeting. If this is true steps should be taken instantly to compose such differences so that Friends may work together for their good and the good of the Society. No Friend or group of Friends should permit the life and usefulness of the meeting to suffer from such small causes, and no Friend should permit questions of personal opinion or preferences or personal desires to mar the harmony of the meeting. Friends should speak frankly and freely one with another when there is a duty to speak.

Our love should be the love of one family in our Father's presence, and where the spirit of discord has created a lack of harmony, all should be brought in humble supplication to God to end such un-Christian conditions.

Various suggestions have been gleaned from different sources and are here set down as proper for consideration, in connection with the general subject.

The power of earnest prayer and of vocal prayer in our meetings cannot be over-emphasized. "A meeting in which vocal prayer is seldom or never heard is surely pretty low spiritually."

"Preaching should be of the Pure Gospel—to bring the meeting to Christ and leave it there."

Some think our meetings are too formal and not sufficiently free and that our ministry is conventional. These are matters which should not exist, and each meeting should strive to correct them.

There should be more concerted Bible study.

There should be appointed some individual who would give special attention to the business and social responsibility of the meeting.

Of course all ministry should be without pay, but can we expect to secure the time and effort which are necessary for the proper shepherding of our membership without having someone able to devote all of his or her time to the work? How can we get our membership generally to accept pastoral responsibilities?

There should be great help in properly consecrated family visiting not only among our members, but also among those outside our membership. Should our committee in visiting meetings or at its regular meetings, more often go into the homes of Friends?

When visiting meetings, let it be done in a spirit sympathetic with the meeting visited.

How can we stir up in our Quarterly Meeting a missionary spirit of the quality which carries our members off to foreign countries to preach the Gospel? How can we inspire our people to preach the Gospel of Quakerism at home?

If the Committee are substantially agreed on the line of thought which we have outlined, we offer the following suggestions for carrying it into effect.

I. Recognizing that the condition of each meeting is a matter of local concern in which we have no right to interfere, we recommend that in all that is undertaken we exercise extreme care to act in full accord and co-operation with the local bodies, and preferably on their invitation in order that the susceptibilities of Friends may not be wounded.

II. That we endeavor to arouse among the members of each meeting, by personal appeals, or otherwise, an appreciation of the need of the meeting, and of the opportunity for usefulness which is about it, and an enthusiasm to build up the congregation to strength and usefulness.

III. That we let it be known that we are ready on invitation of any meeting or group of Friends to meet with them and consider their difficult problems, and assist them in anything that we can toward their solution.

IV. That, preferably on invitation and in co-operation with Friends in the particular meetings affected, we make a survey in order to ascertain

(a) The actual and potential membership and attendance, how far it is active in attendance and what appear to be the obstacles to life and growth.

(b) Ascertain if there are any local or traditional quarrels or differences which divide the community, and endeavor to compose them where any exist.

(c) Survey the officers of the meeting, such as Overseers, Elders, etc., in order to ascertain if they are functioning in the manner intended by the discipline, and if it is found that changes are desirable, endeavor to bring them about.

(d) Ascertain if the meeting is making use of the available material within its borders in the transaction of its meeting and business affairs, and where this does not seem to be the case to find ways of correcting the conditions.

V. That this Committee make a substantial effort to inspire in the membership of each meeting group, a sense of responsibility for the welfare of the meeting as a church organization and a missionary spirit which will assume a measure of the pastoral care of the flock which Quakerism places upon each of its members.

VI. That the Committee offer its assistance to our meetings in providing ministers, teachers for First-day Schools, speakers for conferences and the like.

VII. That this Committee, on the occasion of its visits to meetings and at other times, endeavor to get in close touch with Friends and in small groups and conferences endeavor to arouse them to a larger interest in our meetings.

VIII. That family visiting throughout the Quarterly Meeting be encouraged.

IX. That where and when the opening is clear, to consider the appointment of a Meeting Secretary, who, under the direction of the Overseers or other duly constituted officers of the meeting, would have a care for duties which are now often neglected, such as the care and stimulation of meeting activities, attention to members and attenders, and the fostering of religious interest in those not in association with us.

X. That, when opportunity is presented, local conferences be called to consider the condition of local meetings and means of strengthening them.

Whether or not any of the suggestions above outlined can be made to bear the fruit which we all so ardently desire will depend in a large degree upon the enthusiasm and the spirit of consecration and faithfulness with which they are undertaken and carried out, but we are persuaded that the fields are even now white for the harvest, and that our only need is for those able and willing to enter into them.

FROM A LETTER TO "CLIENTS WHO ARE COLLEGE GRADUATES."

ROGER W. BABSON.

If statistics have taught us any one thing during the past twenty years, it is that the spiritual factor is the greatest factor in the growth of communities and nations. It is well enough to talk about land, labor and capital. They all have their uses and functions, but of themselves they are helpless in bringing about prosperity. Land, labor and capital existed long before there was even civilization. Many great nations, Babylon, Persia, Egypt, Greece, Rome and even Spain, have possessed land, labor and capital in abundance, but fell for want of this far more important quality—the spiritual factor.

I'm looking out my window at the highway where a man is at work with a pick. The highway is the land; the man is the labor; and the pick is the capital. There is a perfect illustration of land, labor and capital; but it also illustrates that such a combination can be used either to destroy or to construct,—to break up the road, or to repair the road. The man can use the pick to make the ruts and holes deeper, or to fill them up. It all depends on the purpose, the motive and the desire of the man. Purpose, motive and desire are spiritual factors and are all important. Land, labor and capital, and even education, are mere tools which can be used either for good or evil. Two men graduate from the same law school and get the same degree;—one uses his education to uphold the law, and the other uses his education to help men evade the law. Two chemists graduate from the same technical school in the same class;—one uses his training to make foods pure; and the other uses the same training to adulterate foods.

However, the purpose of this letter is not to prove our proposition. You know that this position is absolutely right. Rather, the purpose of this letter is to urge you to use your influence in having our young people at school and college taught the truth of the situation. There is altogether too much materialism in our schools and colleges. The public documents and the private reports of many professors are harmful. The talks which many professors give, sneeringly referring to spiritual forces of life, are very harmful. This materialistic trend is distinctly dangerous and every college graduate should use his influence to stop it and check it.

Conditions are getting so bad that they must be checked. It would be far better for the country if some colleges were closed up altogether than to have them continue to teach the materialistic economic doctrines that they are teaching today. Failing to teach the importance of the great spiritual force is not only doing the country much harm, but is giving the students an idea which is absolutely wrong economically and statistically. The great need of the hour is more same religion. Education, unless guided by a religious purpose, is a very dangerous possession. Giving wrong economic teaching to the average man is like giving a gun to a maniac.

Notes on Mountmellick School.

(Queen's County, Ireland.)

Annie Margaret Pike.

I am fortunate in having at hand for reference some reminiscences of his schooldays printed in the Newtown and Mountmellick Old Scholars' Association Report of 1910, of Thomas Joseph Haslam. He entered the school in Seventh Month, 1835, and spent five years there.

He came from the neighboring village of Rosenallis, referred to in Whittier's letter already quoted. I cannot do better than give a few extracts, first saying that the number of pupils was exceptionally small, possibly about a dozen, though the number rose to 42 in the next few years.

Thomas Haslam says that on the morning after his arrival he "was roused up at about five o'clock by a friendly school-mate, who wished to initiate me into the mysteries of my new surroundings, so far as they were accessible to us boys. Passing down through the garden, and clambering over the lofty wall which separated us from the Enclosure, we proceeded along the Slip, across the Bridge, into the Potato-field, the Wheel-field, the Hill-field, the Rushy park, and the Wall-meadow,—all of which in those days belonged to the School; returning to our bedroom before the bell for rising rang at six o'clock. And here I should mention, in explanation of these lawless proceedings, that the Boys' side of the School just then, and indeed for the whole succeeding year, was in the condition of a happy interregnum, when, like the Israelites in the days of the Judges, we did every one very much what was right in our own eyes. Isaac Clarke, the former Master, had returned to England; no suitable successor had been found; Robert Nesbitt, the retiring apprentice, remained for only a small portion of the time; and the Committee were compelled to fall back upon two extern Teachers from the town to fill up the gap."

Robert Nesbitt, I think, must have been a youth of courage and decision of character to judge by an incident which also I give exactly as Thomas Haslam wrote it lest I deprive it of its piquancy:

"There was at that time a school in the town between which and ours a traditional feud of some kind was supposed to exist; and, one day, the Mulleners, as they were called, invaded the Slip, and sent up a challenge to us, Providingoes, to go down and fight them. The expected encounter got bruited over the town; and the Slip was black with the heads of anticipating spectators. We were told as an actual fact that two young men, the sons of a retired military Captain, came armed with pocket pistols, to take part in the fray. Robert Nesbitt, who was at that time in charge, of course prohibited our entering the lists, in which we should have been mercilessly overpowered and mauled. But, fortunately, there was a very large wolf-dog belonging to the School; and he himself heroically, with the dog in leash, single-handed sallied forth, charged the invaders, and cleared the Slip in double-quick time. Achilles did not perform a greater feat at the siege of Troy, nor Horatius when defending the bridge against the Volscians; that brought the proposed campaign to an end, and there was no more talk of invasions."

But even young Quakers may be tempted to use their fists, and may succumb to the temptation, as is evidenced by the account of more than one fight amongst the schoolboys. They were fights "sub rosa," or if not exactly under the rose, at least so carefully carried out as to escape the knowledge of the masters.

There seems to have been no recorded minister amongst Mountmellick Friends at the period referred to. I quote again from Thomas Haslam's reminiscences:

"Of the religious life of the School in those days I have not much to report; there was no acknowledged Minister in Mountmellick; and within the School itself, though there was habitual reading of the Bible, two or three times a day, there was little direct religious teaching. The prolonged silent meetings were often felt to be wearisome; on First-day mornings, more especially, the ringing of the Church bell was sometimes a relief. The occasional visits of English Ministers were always times of awakening; but the impression seldom lasted long. On one of these visits we were told with reiterated emphasis that "equivocation is half-way to lying, and lying is the whole way to —" I need not say where. We were a good deal affected by the communication; and there was much searching of heart on the Teacher's part; but no permanent result appeared to follow. There was, however, one exception to the general rule, which deserves commemoration, more especially because it was not due to any outside influence, but was entirely spontaneous. Two of the boys, in the first instance, and subsequently three, one of whom is still living, without any stimulation from the Teacher, had their hearts so touched that they became active preachers of righteousness to their schoolfellows; for some time they were jeered at, but eventually the entire School, with very few exceptions, responded to their influence; and, though we gradually fell away from our first love, I do not think we were ever so disorderly afterwards."

The teaching of the history and principles of the Society of Friends formed a part of the First-day routine in 1844. I do not know for how many years it continued to do so.

It may be of interest to educationalists to note the dates at which various subjects were added to the list of those taught in the school. No mention is made of teaching geography until 1807, nor of history until 1821. I have not a date for book-keeping, but it appears to have been carefully and successfully taught to the boys. In 1826 it was decided that each pupil who could read was to be given a Bible.

In 1833 the study of French and Latin was begun. I cannot be sure that the whole school joined in these new subjects, probably only the boys undertook Latin, and when mensuration, algebra, and science were added in 1853, the examination papers set were for the boys.

In 1852, a search was made for an instructor in physical sciences, but without the desired result. Six lectures on chemistry, however, were given by a lecturer of the Royal Dublin Society and were followed up by lessons from Benjamin Wood and Joshua Fayle.

We must remember that Friends were in advance of the times in laying stress on the education of women, even in what seems to modern minds a very limited number of subjects.

I quote from an article on Education by Dr. J. G. Fitch as follows:—

"A girl was not expected to 'serve God in church or state,' and was therefore not invited to the university or the Grammar School; but she might, if poor, be needed to contribute to the comfort of her 'betters,' as an apprentice or a servant, and therefore the charity schools were open to her." This refers to English schools.

In comparing education in Ireland outside the Society of Friends with that provided in Quaker Schools, it is noteworthy that the national system was established in 1831, when a Board of Commissioners was appointed. They had larger powers by far than the committee of Council in England or Scotland ever had. A royal charter was granted to the commissioners in 1861. In 1878 the Board of Intermediate Education was established, and its enlightened policy soon worked wonders in the advancement of education generally. It was made possible for girls to share equally with boys in all its advantages.

I have just been looking through a list of the schools in Ireland that may be called Secondary Schools, that is, schools in which the educational standard is set between the preliminary and the university courses. The list is by no means meagre. The Friends' School at Mountmellick was in this category.

WESTERN QUARTERLY MEETING.

The usual number gathered at West Grove, Pa., on Fifth Month 25, 1923, when Friends of the Western Quarter assembled for their spring session.

Some visiting Ministers, several members of the Yearly Meeting Visitation Committee and others were with us and by their Gospel messages and presence counseled and encouraged us.

We were urged to seek the Source of all spiritual strength and to dedicate our lives to His service. We were lovingly reminded of the importance of always putting spiritual things first and of not allowing business or home cares, important as they are, to become all-absorbing.

In the business session, Friends had brought to their attention, by the reading of the extracts from its Minutes, some of the important accomplishments and concerns of our recent Yearly Meeting.

Friends discussed briefly various suggestions that have been made for eliminating confusion, duplication and loss of time in our method of appointing the many special and standing Committees of the Yearly Meeting. No definite proposal was decided upon to be forwarded, the matter being left for final consideration at a later session.

After transacting routine business, the Meeting concluded.

BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING.

Burlington and Bucks Quarterly Meeting was held at Burlington, N. J., on Fifth Month 29, 1923. The meeting for worship was a very helpful occasion. The vocal ministry seemed to grow out of the worship and allowed time for communion between. The prayer at the beginning that we should gather in our Heavenly Father's presence was indeed answered. We were made to feel that God was greater than any individual conception of Him, and that faith in Him and co-operation with His will was the great need of the world today.

In the business session, after a local property matter had been dispensed with, the meeting considered the desirability of holding meetings again this year one day a month at Barnegat. This plan was approved and a committee appointed. It is hoped that all members of the Yearly Meeting Visitation Committee will make occasion to attend this Meeting, which, it has now been arranged, is to be held every second First-day of the month during the summer, instead of every first First-day, to avoid confliction with other meetings which frequently take place on the first First-days.

A Minute from Burlington Monthly Meeting, releasing Henry B. Leeds for service abroad in company with Max I. Reich, was read and approved by the Quarterly Meeting, it being felt that our Friend had been called to a real service awaiting him.

James M. Moon expressed a concern that a message of love and encouragement be sent to our absent members. He reminded us that the membership had become greatly scattered over far distances, some being in California, others in Germany, and that undoubtedly these Friends would be cheered to know that they are not forgotten by us in our gatherings together. A Committee was appointed to take charge of the writing of such a message.

Extracts from the Yearly Meeting Minutes were read.

Grateful expression was given to the fact that we had with us our dear friend Zebedee Haines and others, whose presence and ministry among us were most helpful.

M. J. M.

A FRIEND writes: "We used to hear the term 'concerned Friends,' but there seems to be more of a spirit of 'complacency' now than 'concern.' I feel that our meetings are suffering from lack of exercise more than from any other reason. At present, a cash contribution is all that is asked (or at least received) from a large percentage of our membership. It is a quite singular form of 'taxation without representation.' What I would like more than anything else would be for every member of Meeting to be asked and expected to assist in doing some labor for the good of the Society; to be required to think about its problems, to give opinions of their own as well as contributions in money."

We are inclined to query whether the same may not be said of many communities of Friends.

BITS OF EXPERIENCE.

The Editor of THE FRIEND has asked for more recent extracts from the letters of Esther M. Whitson to her parents, similar to those published last autumn from Châlons sur Marne, France. If we felt at liberty to do so, this request would be granted freely, for her letters contain much of general interest to all who follow sympathetically the international work of the American Friends' Service Committee and the allied work of English Friends. But Esther has put us under some restraint, claiming that many others are more competent, that life is even more intense than in France and she has less time to consider, and that Russia is so big and the problems involved are so intricate that she would prefer not to be quoted much. However, I feel free to give some facts illustrating to some extent the geographical and political aspects that may be of general interest. I wish sincerely that for the entertainment of the reader I could copy the composition instead of merely outlining the circumstances.

The final passport permits from the Soviet Government did not reach Esther in Berlin till about Second Month 15th. Her girl friend, Hilga Hoppe, although born in Russia, was refused re-admission. The political complexion of her predecessors was unsatisfactory in some way. It was a bitter trial to these girls to part. Hilga went with the English Unit in Poland. Esther left at once under the care of a "Courier" from London, for the long journey to Samara by way of Riga on the Baltic. The mobilization of opposing armies made the direct route by Warsaw impracticable. She had the company of a woman for a day or two, but once in Russia, the sight of a woman on the train or at any station was rare. The Courier experienced trouble enough on his own account with the Customs Officers at the German-Polish border and again the same day at the Lithuanian border. So the assistance he had been expected to render became negligible. However, good humor, smiles and a lad she found who could speak German, combined to facilitate matters.

She was glad to be able to get along without the Courier. An English-speaking clergyman—"a lady-like gentleman from Argentine Republic"—enlivened the balance of the journey to Riga.

What happened on the Russian frontier we are informed was "unforgettable," but apparently not harrowing. No details given; but full particulars to be rehearsed by the home fireside next winter. Train accommodation similar to Pullman service in America; cars comfortably heated, except in Germany. Western Russia is "monotonously uniform"—a level country, no prominent elevation of land from Riga to Buzuluk—nearly two thousand miles—an endless reach of snow-covered plains, with snow-covered towns and cottages marked by curling smoke ascending from the chimneys of humble dwellings. Meeting Julia Branson and other "home folks" at Moscow, a business trip to Petrograd (St. Petersburg), where the Government Buildings are painted scarlet, and the journey continued later from Moscow, were interesting experiences, but the one significant fact seems to be that people in every land are "folks," and act psychologically exactly like other folks, whether Soviet officials or the commonest peasants or honest-hearted newsmen. To travel with a group of Tartars or Serbs in America would not have been so pleasant, but to talk of dangers in Russia is ridiculous, she says.

Her final destination, Sorochenskoye, was reached on Second Month 26th. She was given a hearty welcome and plenty of work, both of which are characteristic of the Mission and warmly appreciated by every loyal newcomer. The use of camels as beasts of burden was a surprise. Most of the horses had died of famine or had been killed and used as food by the starving people. Camels were brought in as a substitute, but the horses from Turkestan that the Mission has been importing are greatly preferred. The sight of Moslem mosques and the use of things distinctly Oriental seems a trifle confusing at first, like riding camel-back, or on a horse. The Volga River is regarded as the line between the eastern and western civilizations. Sorochenskoye is a city on the eastern tributary of the Volga, which is next in size to the great stream itself. The elevation above sea level is zero. The river flows into the Caspian Sea, which is eighty feet below sea level.

Plans for running the tractor plows continuously, day and night, when the season opened had been completed. No effort will be spared to "break the famine."

People are not dying for lack of food now, but the relief agencies are keeping alive at least 5,000,000 people. Except for these agencies most, if not all, of these people would not be living at this time.

A letter mailed Fifth Month 2nd came through with remarkable speed. It tells of the awful floods incident to the spring thaw and the breaking up of the ice on the river. Much damage resulted. About five hundred "where-with-alls" (homes) in Sorochenskoye and some cattle and horse were swept away.

The ice-jam, an appalling spectacle, and the consequent loss of the superlatively important bridge (the only road bridge in Soroch) all occurring in the day-time, furnished the background for many pathetic scenes and thrilling rescues. The water had risen twenty feet above normal; the greatest flood in ninety years, if data are reliable. The havoc at Totscoc is said to have been even worse, as reported in some way by Nancy Babb, located there. The picture is sad to contemplate. We scarcely can wonder at the expression, "These people are born to disaster."

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

A STOP IN HER MIND.
(1808)

MAUDE ROBINSON.

There was no doubt that little Mark Kendal was in a sad pickle. At ten years old he had learned all that the village school could teach him, and spent his time there in such audacious pranks that the Dame had declined to have him any longer.

The good father, who used to control him, lay weak and weak in an upper room, slowly drifting out of life, while his capable wife, Bridget, with a heavy heart, went about her work, trying to keep the little village shop going with the help of her two elder children.

Matthew, a strong lad of sixteen, steady even to dullness, was her chief reliance, driving twice a week into the seaport town of Ebbmouth, seven miles away; fetching shop goods, taking in the farmers' eggs and butter, and doing errands for the whole neighborhood.

Anna, at fourteen, was quite a miracle of efficiency, cooking, sewing and helping in the shop like a woman; but like many clever young folks, rather pet and self-sufficient, and her rule was not relaxed by the younger children, although Mary and Kitty were good little maids always ready to help in their small way.

Bridget Kendal had a perfect horror of debt, and with the incapacity of the bread-winner and the expenses of his long illness, the most extreme frugality had to be practised, and Mark's help might have been of real value, had he not been such an idle, careless monkey, using his ability in wild pranks instead of helpfulness.

When the children went "wooding" in the Lavercot Chase, where the fallen branches supplied much of the family fuel, the little girls would fill their small wagon and trundle it home while Mark was chasing squirrels, creeping through the fern to watch the fallow deer, or climbing after birds' nests. He would come home at supper-time, dragging a huge dead branch, but with such rents in his homespun garments that either the weary mother or Anna had to sit up late, by the scanty light of a rush, to make them decent for the next day's wear.

He was good-hearted and affectionate enough, but his mother's and even his father's gentle admonitions seemed to go in at one ear and out at the other, and he delighted in teasing Matthew and Anna when they tried to keep him in order.

John Kendal had been a devout worshipper at the little Quaker Meeting in the village, and the five children were regularly sent there on First-days, while the parents communed together on the parting that must come. The sick man's faith upheld and strengthened his sorrowful wife, encouraging her in the belief that the widow and the fatherless would be provided for, and the children led into paths of righteousness and peace. Many were the prayers put up for the wayward Mark, while that young scapegrace was trying Anna's soul by grimaces at the little girls, attempts to catch blue-bottles, and all the devices of a restless boy in a long and often silent meeting.

The Friends were full of sympathy for the Kendal family, and the Overseers would have given financial help, but that Bridget Kendal was determined to avoid, although the dainties for her invalid and out-grown garments of more well-to-do children were thankfully accepted.

It was a real help to Matthew to have someone to hold Brown Bess while he carried parcels into shops and houses in the town. Sometimes Anna, the discreet, could be spared to go with him, but Mark, who liked it above all things, was often more hindrance than help. The busy quay and the shipping drew him like a magnet, and often Matthew had to wait in the inn-yard, where the horse had her bait, until he turned up full of the wonders he had seen, and quite unrepentant.

At last, one summer evening, Matthew decided he could wait no longer—Mark must walk the seven miles home—yet what would his parents say to his leaving the little fellow behind in the big town with its rough, seafaring population? Matthew was jogging along with his heavy load, when about half way home a post-chaise passed him, dashing along with two fine grey horses, one ridden by a postilion in blue and yellow. Seated in it was a naval officer, cocked hat, gold epaulettes and all, and by his side, sitting very upright was Mark, who turned his head and winked at his amazed brother!

His mother was astonished to see this magnificent equipage stop before the shop door, and hastened out in her neat Quaker muslin cap and drab dress, just as Mark got down with polite thanks.

GRANDMOTHER VASSILOVA.

The Quakers have had to ask the peasants in the Sorochinskoye district to accept a much smaller number of pyoks than before, so that some of the starving people in Pugachev Ooyezd and the Bashkir Republic may be helped, too. Assemblies are being held in many of the villages so that the Friends' interpreter may explain to the peasants the reason for the cut in their rations, and so the peasants themselves may decide which of the people in their village are most in need of the rations.

The assembly in Voznesenka village was just over, and the peasants were leaving the hall.

Pushing through the crowd from the back of the room came an old, wrinkled, half-blind woman of above seventy summers, her daughter leading her by the hand.

"Here is my mother," the young woman said, "she has always wanted to see an American or one of their representatives. She never gives us any peace. She is always asking and asking who they are. At every meal, everytime we sit down to eat, she says, 'Who has given me all these nice things, whom can I ask—I must know who they are.'"

"Yes, yes," quavered the old lady, crossing herself, "I want to know who they are. I want to pray for them. Some say they are the Quakers, but I don't know what that means. Some say they are Americans with stars, but that is not what I want. God will not understand what I mean if I pray for Americans with stars. I want to know their names—the names of every one of them. I want to know their first names, so God will understand—"

It is explained that there are so many of them that the interpreter does not even know all their first names herself, so cannot tell them, but that she is very sure God will understand if she will pray for them all together.

"There are all kinds of people in America sending the food, Grandmother. Some of them are rich people, some of them are poor workers, and peasants like yourself. And they send you the food because they want to show you that they are fond of you and want to help you in your trouble."

Again the old Babushka crossed herself, and reached out for the interpreter's hand, which she took in her two withered ones.

"Well, then, I shall pray for them all together, if you are sure God will understand that way. And be sure to tell them that Grandmother Vassilova, from Voznesenka village thanks these kind people from her heart, and prays every day for them."

JESSICA SMITH.

NOTES FROM THE SERVICE FIELDS.

MEDICAL aid promises to become one of the most important phases of the future work of the Friends' Mission in Russia. Repeated appeals have been received from the workers this spring for additional shipments of quinine to be used in fighting malaria. Dr. Carl W. Lupo, Head of the Medical Department of the Mission, says in a late report:—

"Quinine arrived in sufficient quantities to permit the receiving of new patients during the last two weeks of the month.

It is the opinion of the department that at least half of the entire population in the districts in which the Mission will operate, will be malaria patients before the beginning of winter."

WILBUR K. THOMAS, who is now on his way back from Russia, touches on another aspect of the medical situation in the following quotation from one of his recent letters: "We had an interview with the woman doctor who is in charge of the training of nurses for maternity and welfare work in the whole of Russia. She pleaded with us to do something to support the women who are in training. She says that their condition is very serious, as they do not have sufficient food and clothing."

EVEN the famine has made its contribution to the music of the Russian steppes. The following is a translation of an actual folk-song, quoted by Dr. E. Bogolepova of the Moscow Health Department in her article "The Fight Against Hunger as a Physiological and Social Factor:"

"Aching legs; Aching arms; Aching teeth; The tongue is dry, the mouth waters and eat I wish—; Bread, please, bread, bread, a crumb of bread, a tiny crumb, please. O! How I would chew it, and chew it, from morning till night would I eat it. I would pick then its crumbs and eat them again, and chew them again, and weep with joy."

SECRETARY OF STATE HUGHES, in his address on the sixteenth of last month to the National Conference of Social Workers, stated that American relief work in Europe had definitely tended to cultivate better international relations. The Philadelphia Public Ledger reports as follows this portion of his address:

"The Secretary of State said that if America was understood abroad, it was because of the gratitude there for the work done by American relief agencies. It is well to recognize, he added, that there does exist 'what has happily been called a ground-swell of popular good-will toward this country.'

That the Secretary of State feels the importance of such work of international friendship as that which Friends are carrying on through the American Friends' Service Committee, is further indicated elsewhere in his address by the following statement:

"If those who are keenly desirous of enduring peace will descend to the contemplation of realities, it will be seen that there is only one way to the goal—a long and difficult way—that is, by the cultivation of the spirit of friendship and good-will among peoples through which alone sources of dangerous life can be dried up."

GERTRUDE BAER, Secretary of the Munich Branch of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, has appealed to Friends to send workers for at least a temporary work of reconciliation in that city. In a letter addressed to the Friends' Council for International Service, which the latter organization has referred to American Friends, she asks that the Friends "send one or two workers to Munich to bring their message of non-violence and tolerance to that group of people who are constantly preaching violence against the French, Jews, socialists, pacifists, republicans, etc., and are thus creating a new atmosphere of fear, hatred and brute force between nations, classes and races."

"I need not report," she writes, "that various movements in Bavaria are the focusing point for all reactionary tendencies in Germany. . . . I do hope that your Committee will realize the great danger for the whole of Germany, for the peace of Europe, springing from the ever-growing reactionary movement in Bavaria, and that you will find personalities and means to start several months' pacifist work in Munich. Your mediating work would do much good there, I am convinced."

The Message Committee is looking for one or more American Friends, preferably Friends who have lived in Munich, and so are acquainted with local conditions, who feel a concern to undertake work of this kind.

SHIPMENTS received for week ending Sixth Month 2, 1923—80 boxes and packages.

Cash contributions received for same period—$8,304.39.

SLAVERY, 1922.

The Assembly of the League of Nations at the recent sessions at Geneva made numerous discoveries new to not a few of us. Those concerning slavery in this year 1922 were not the least astounding. Well-informed people were given startling evidence of the existence of slavery. They learned from authoritative sources that gangs of slaves can still be seen in large areas of the African Continent, marching to misery and death in hundreds, and in some cases, thousands,—men chained together in long rows, with their women and children dragging after them on the way to slave markets. Accounts were placed before the members which seemed like the horrible story of far-off days—of the highways strewn with the dead bodies of the slaves. Members also learned that many thousands of slaves are to-day held captive in one or more territories of Africa. All this represented startling disclosures for those Powers assembled here who had solemnly committed themselves many years ago to a total abolition of slave-trading and slave-owning.

AN ANCIENT CERTIFICATE.

[The following document will convey its own lesson of kindness and carefulness. The transcript came to hand a few years ago from Jane Bell, of Waterford, Ireland, and was among some "extracts from minute books and papers found at Clonmel." It was not always that Friends in former times could obtain the consent of the Meeting in case of a contemplated removal, and the request for it was obviously more than a form. The certificate that follows was probably sufficient at that time to give Thomas Coborne (and his family) the standing of membership in any Friends' Meeting in Pennsylvania "whersomever his lott might be cast."—M. W.]

FROM JAPAN.

(Taken from a Letter addressed to Ethel Rhoads Potts and written by Minnie P. Bowles, First Month 21, 1923.)

It pays to put Christ and, so far as in us lies, the Spirit of Christ into the hearts of those with whom and for whom we work. Especially in this true of girls in the school. Sometimes when girls graduate without becoming Christians we feel or have felt as though the time spent on such was, if not wasted, at least not spent in the best way. I do not feel it is so. If the word is planted deep in the good ground it is sure to bear fruit sooner or later. This afternoon a young married woman called and brought her three pretty little daughters. She graduated from this school in 1913. She was a day pupil, so the teachers could not do for her as much as for the girls who live in the dormitory. However, she had the daily Bible lessons. She manifested no interest. She rather resented the teaching. She was married soon after graduation and went to Kobe to live. This autumn when I went to Kobe and vicinity to see some of our scattered family, H. and I called upon this young woman. She welcomed us with tears. She is very pretty and her house was in perfect order. She had no maid. We had scarcely sat down and gone through with our salutations when she turned to me and began to speak of her home and the emptiness she felt there was in it without Christ. She said religion must be the foundation of the home. Then she referred to her indifference about these matters when she was in school and said; "I feel I want to become a Christian and lead my husband." She felt her need, but she would not have felt this need had she not had the teaching. Last month they moved to Tokyo. Now one of her classmates who is an earnest Christian and I had this special time with her this afternoon. She said she had not read her Bible since she was in school, but lately she had been telling the story of Christ's birth and life to her little children and they were so eager always to hear more, and "I want to learn more so I can teach them," she said. Today she has been more convinced that the foundation of the home must be Christ. Now she says if she can only secure a maid the whole family will come out to our meetings. My husband has had many hours with her husband. His heart is open for the direct message now. I find other former graduates of the school who did not become Christians when in the school had a hunger planted in their hearts that will never be satisfied until it finds and accepts Christ.

"The best way to get ahead is sometimes to stop short and see where we are. The best way to advance our work is sometimes to lay it aside."—R. CABOT.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

SEEBOHM ROWNTREE, an English Friend and economist, is scheduled to give a course of lectures at the Summer School at Haverford, Pa.

A FRIEND writing of that of which he has knowledge, says:—

While entertaining at lunch a chemist of one of our business associates, I found him to have been an intimate friend of one of the recent members of the group of Friends at Penn State. So well had this friendship been carried out that these two young fellows had had serious and deep talks together on the fundamentals of Christian life, faith and thought. This had resulted in a real hunger on the part of my guest to know more of the Society of Friends, and a readiness to attend our meetings.

The group at Penn State no doubt serve their Lord in this way many times in a year and I hope will continue to be an efficient irrigation channel for Christian fundamentals in the excellent field where they are located.

The members of Berkeley Friends' Meeting, California, wish to thank all who so kindly contributed towards the purchase of their Meeting House. The attendance at the meetings has increased, and it is hoped that it may become a centre for active work in the Master's cause.

HANNAH R. ERSKINE.
Clerk.

FRIENDS' denominational papers will have occasion to make frequent reference to the George Fox tercentenary. H. Sefton-Jones, referring to this, writes:—

If the Society decides, as I hope it will, to commemorate the birth of the brave and good Christian to whom we owe most of our organization (not our foundation as so frequently asserted), let it be by methods which will attract and not repel sensitive and thoughtful inquirers. The accident of a birth-date is not of the slightest importance to such; but the Good News which the early Friends so powerfully proclaimed in the seventeenth century still appeals to sincere minds, provided we are able faithfully to deliver it in twentieth century language.

The First Publishers of Truth declined to observe the Church festival incorrectly described as the birthday of our Lord. Surely they would have been the first to condemn similar observance of their own anniversaries. We can best honor their memories by handing on to those willing to receive it the truth to which they dedicated their lives, rather than by pageantry devised to amuse the thoughtless.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Fifth Month 25, 1923.

A man in Detroit called the Friends' Meeting by 'phone a few days ago and asked if it was possible to make a "contribution to Quaker welfare work in Germany" through the meeting. An affirmative answer was given and his name asked for. He refused to give the name and said he would send the contribution. It came three days later in the form of two fifty dollar bills with the following note:—

"The enclosed hundred dollars is to be an anonymous contribution to the Quaker welfare work in Germany from one who recently took a pleasure trip to that country. This sum represents in part the difference between what I spent in that country and what I would have spent in America." No name was attached.

The tourist season is now opening and if those who visit European countries would measure their obligations toward European relief in this way much might be added to the funds in addition to the regular contributions.

L. Oscar Moon called to see a Friend the other day who expressed his natural inclinations toward the German people, but said the time had now come for him to begin to love his enemies. He was therefore writing his check for a sum to be applied to welfare work among them. He said this was one practical way he had of putting this new spirit into operation.

NOTICES.

DURING Seventh and Eighth Months, Friends' Library will be closed, except on Fifth-days, from 8 A. M. to 12 M. (Standard Time).

LINDA A. MOORE,
Librarian.

MEETINGS for Worship have been resumed at Marshallton, Pa., on First-day mornings, at 10.30 (Standard Time).

FRIENDS' SUMMER SCHOOL, HAVERFORD COLLEGE, SIXTH MONTH 18-25, 1923.—The final program is nearly complete. A number of changes and additions have been made since the printing of the provisional program.

President Wm. W. Comfort, of Haverford College, is to speak Second-day evening at eight, on the subject, "The Religious Element in Quaker Education."

The Conference on Home Service is to come at 5 P. M. on Third-day. Clarence E. Pickett and Anna B. Griscom are to speak.

On Fourth-day, the 20th, at 10.30, Alexander Irvine, lecturer and author of "The Carpenter and his Kingdom," who has recently joined Friends in New York, will speak on "Quaker Evangelism." At 11.30 the same day, Robert C. Brooks, Professor of Political Science in Swarthmore College, will speak on "How to Get Into Politics."

On Fifth-day, at 11.30, there will be a symposium on "The Workers' Education Movement," in which Hilda W. Smith, Dean of the Bryn Mawr Summer School, Gladys Boone, Secretary of the Trade Union College, Philadelphia, and B. Seebohm Rowntree, of York, England, are expected to speak. At 5 P. M., we expect Dr. Bertha Kraus, Social Worker and former member of the Friends' Child Relief in Germany, to conduct a conference on "Changes Wrought in Germany by the Revolution."

Seventh-day, at 10.30, W. Beatty Jennings, of the First Presbyterian Church of Germantown, will speak on "The Approach to the Individual."

On Sixth-day, at 10.30, Alexander C. Purdy and Henry J. Cadbury are to speak on subjects yet to be announced. At eight o'clock, Seventh-day evening, Wilbur K. Thomas is to speak on his experiences and observations on his visit to the fields of Friends' Relief in Europe, from which he will have just returned.

For the class in Methods of Religious Education at 9.20 each morning, E. Vesta Haines, Richard M. Gummere and Richard C. Brown have been secured.

OLD WINE IN NEW BOTTLES.

Happily the committee charged with a review of our Discipline realized the lamentable result in filling an old bottle with new wine. That there is new wine no one can doubt. As one Friend has put it: "What we want is less discipline and more Christian charity." Or again, "if our weaker meetings had had less of discipline and more common sense we should have more and stronger meetings today."

And yet the Discipline as it now stands opens well.

"The love, power and peaceable spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ being the alone true authority of all our meetings, it is the fervent concern of this meeting that they may be held under the sense and influence of that holy union." How is it that a group of people professing this doctrine should have declined in numbers, almost to the present day, ever since this paragraph was adopted by the meeting in 1795? There is only one answer—namely, that too much attention has been put on the letter and too little stress on the spirit. Maybe there is a challenge in any discipline because of this unescapable tendency to follow a precedent, to conform to a practice, to maintain the "good order." In short, to do anything but meet the situation in a courageous, common-sense way.

Is it not possible to break away from the defensive, fearful attitude into the light of present-day usefulness? On the very first page of the current volume one reads: "For this important end, and as an exterior hedge of preservation to us, against the many temptations and dangers to which our situation in this world exposes us, rules for the government of the Society have been made and approved from time to time."

What a lamentable confession of weakness. Hedged in by what, hedged in, indeed, by our own fears. If the Society of Friends through its vigor and faith is unable to maintain its position "exposed to this world" no code of rules can save it. Let us hope that these sentiments are the stale wine of an 1806 vintage. Less of discipline and more of common sense!

Surely one of the prime duties of the present committee is to shift the stress of any discipline from negative, defensive and protective statements to positive expressions that represent real convictions. There are some such passages now existent, although, to speak frankly, these are not nearly as numerous as they should be.

"— to love our neighbor as ourselves, is the measure of the love which we desire may pervade all our lives;" (1910) If we changed may to must we should have a year of sermons in one line. In accord with this simple though mighty admonition is the recommendation to ministers. "Encouraging the lumbie, careful traveler, speaking a word in season to them that are weary." There is a fine gentleness in this passage and it should be preserved. There should be no objection to a sound caution such as now applies to men in business. "When any become possessed of ample means, they should remember that they are only stewards who must render an account for the right use of the things committed to their care."

Of course a consideration of the dubious matter of possessing wealth is itself not considered in the Discipline as it now stands. Such conceptions are singularly modern. We approach the investigation of wealth and the responsibilities of business through the inquiries of the Social Order Committee. This committee should have an able contribution to make to any revised discipline.

Before leaving the subject, permit a vigorous protest against the name "Discipline." Surely the Society of Friends has lost too much already in the minds of our neighbors by the impression of constraint, restriction and binding down that this very name implies. Again, if we are to be a spiritually effective people it must be through the inspiration and power of Christian living. It is with this old wine that we must fill the new bottle.

H. W. E.

ANYBODY can enter an open door. The real challenge comes when the door is locked and barred and sealed. He who would open a closed mind needs a big mind. He needs the grace of magnanimity and all that magnanimity breeds. In this ministry little minds are altogether without resources. We need "the mind of Christ." We need a mind purified and enlarged by His saving grace, and with such endowment we can confront other minds, and by patient knockings we can persuade them to let in the King, that they also may come into possession of their great inheritance.—J. H. JOWETT.

"FINGER PRINTS."

The Young Friends' Committee has its counterpart in the Young Peoples' Commission of the Chicago Church Federation. Made up of eleven organizations, such as the Chicago Christian Endeavor Union, Congregational Young Peoples' Societies, Epworth League, Luther League, etc., it links the four compass divisions of the city in spiritual growth. North, south, east and west, Chicago has been studying Home and Foreign Missions from like text books: "India on the March," and for the Home Field. "In the Vanguard of a Race." The Young Peoples' Commission has hoped thus to create a background for the two dramas, "The Tides of India," and "Finger Prints," which would end this season's study.

Charlotte B. Chorpenning, of the Dramatic Department of the Recreation Training School, in close co-operation with both black and white persons, gave a year of careful study to race relations in this city. From 318 interviews (the highest number with a single individual being five) she collected not only facts, but she captured as well the spirit of each race. She wove the facts into a clever story, and she chose fifteen Negroes and fifteen whites to interpret it. Word for word as told by her, we heard the heart-thoughts of two races.

We listened to the black man who, though educated in one of our biggest universities, was yet a "nigger," who could not, in spite of his best efforts, be an equal—who was familiarly called by his first name solely because of his color. Sullen, revengeful in spirit, he hated the white man. There was the colored girl with "something in her" that withered up because a white woman, accidentally brushing against her, turned to apologize, discovered that she was black, and dropped both the smile and the apology!

What that Negro who does not escape these incivilities, but who is not embittered by them? Does he not "mind"? Yes, he minds. But he has an invincible armor—self-respect. "No one can make me ashamed of my color but myself," one Negro strengthens his faltering friend; or again, "We must see in the white man what we believe to be in ourselves;" or yet again, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Near the end a sympathetic, white friend challenges the colored hero, "You are not typical of your race." Swift as thought it is flung back, not by the black man, but by a white girl, "Are you typical of your race?"

It was a young woman from New Orleans who first told me of the drama. "Oh," she said, "Bring every thinking person you can to see it. Back home, I never thought; I just did as everyone else did. Since I've been helping on this, I've been thinking. Now I want others to think."

The Young People do not claim that they have offered a solution for the race problem, but—there is a girl from New Orleans who wants "others to think." Thirty young people, black and white, have faced their problem together, and ought to fathom and interpret it. Again and again they remind us that through patience, love, and the Spirit of the Master we must seek to understand each other. A foundation is laid: "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump."

ESTHER C. JONES.

VISITORS.

We would like to introduce the nine English Young Friends who are likely to spend part of the summer in America. There will be four in the first group, who expect to spend from Sixth Month 30th until Seventh Month 19th within the precincts of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

Winifred Cramp was for some years Executive Secretary for the Young Friends' Movement in England. She has worked in Berlin for the Council of International Service.

Roy Calvert is well known to American Young Friends who were in relief work in France. He has made a special study of international questions. As a C. O. during the war he was glad of the fellowship with Young Friends, although not then a member.

Gerald Littleboy is a nephew of William Littleboy, and is Chairman of the English Young Friends' Committee.

Howard Diamond will be remembered by those who attended the Jordans Conference as carrying much of the detail work in an efficient and unobtrusive way.

Sewell Harris has been assistant warden at Beechcroft Educational Settlement for the last two years.

The second group will only be with us for a few days before the Westtown Conference.

John Nicols is assistant librarian at Devonshire House. He spent about four years during the war doing war victims' relief work in France.

Christine Southall has been a member of the Central Young Friends' Committee for some years.

Enid Priestman does social work in connection with institutions for the blind.

Christine Graham does social work in Birmingham, chiefly in connection with Infant Welfare Centres. All three of these young women are active members of the Birmingham Young Friends' Committee and group.

Daniel and Jane Balderston Dye have reached home after their long journey from Cheng-tu, West China. They were married there some years ago and Jane Dye now returns for the first furlough of her seven years' work in China.

O THOU who came to bring Joy to the world,
To show Jehovah as our Father-God;
Thou who didst dwell among earth's simple folk,
Proving that goodness, life, health, happiness
Are part of God's great Will for all of us;
Give us the grace to listen to Thee now;
To dare to live as children of our God,
Receiving His great gifts with thankful hearts,
And using them to glorify His Name—
He knows no limitations of supplies!
He waiteth for His children to accept
With utter confidence and perfect trust
The Power and Strength, the Love, and Hope and Joy
They ask of Him.
O Christ, our well-loved Friend,
Give us the grace to listen to Thee now!

"WHEN A DREAM IS BORN."

Is there one of you, O Young Friends, who has not in the secret drawer of his desk a "poem," written in that rare moment, when, as "Bobby" Graves has it, the pinch of salt really landed on the dream-bird's tail? Most of us are haunted at times by the thought, that could we only write all the poetry there is in us, the world would be richer, wiser, happier,—oh, a far better place in every way! Far be it from me to exhort every budding genius to broadcast his verses as he composes them under the midnight lamp. But I do put in a plea for poetry as a hobby. Enough of confusion and ugliness! Let the reformer cry in press and meeting-house! We will away with Redman "Seaward,"

"to glimpse the pagan sail
Of Beauty, riding over distant waves."

There each can set out in his own small bark, to pursue her, each happily absorbed in turning his own sails to catch the favoring wind of fancy.

But if your critical faculty be so well grown as to overpower the impulses of creative imagination, there is still the scrap-book. Here the collector's passion has full scope. No anthologist ever was guided by as good taste as yours, and there are no poor barriers of the pocket here. You may gaze in vain through the Walnut Street window at old Italian candelabra, or rare prints of Dr. Johnson's cronies; you may mourn the high value that artistic friends set upon their craftsmanship, and long to see expensive delphiniums in your garden. But for the scrap-book, an old "Exercise Book," a tube of paste, and the family magazines, suffice. It is homely to look upon, but it will hold all sorts of charming things, verses that have spoken straight to the emotion of a moment, and stand ready to speak again, when the time returns.

When the scrap-book is filled, and the pocket not quite so empty, there remains the most satisfying adventure of the inarticulate poet—to fill his shelves with the new volumes of his brothers who speak. In no other field of art, I believe, is there so much vitality and youth at the present time. "Go out on the starlit hills with Ralph Hodges, to hear the "Song of Honor," follow the sea with Masefield, sit with Lindsay beside the Kansas highway, while "the United States goes by." Let the poets introduce you to strange people,—“Poor Miss Loo,” drinking tea in her summer parlor, “still and cool,” “Lucinda Matlock,” who at ninety-six, “had lived, enough, that is all;” “Miniver Cheevy,” who “loved the Medici,

Albeit he had never seen one;
He would have sinned incessantly
Could he have been one.”

Neglect not Hilda Conkling, for

“The child alone a poet is:
Spring and Fairyland are his.”

And hear the great spokesmen of human suffering transmute the wail of a "cause" into a bright prophecy,—Gibson's "glory struck from strife." Find the hearts of those you have never bothered to understand, opened to you by some more powerful imagination than your own, while a clearer voice sounds forth the thoughts, that no one has ever understood from you.

THE HAVERFORD SUMMER SCHOOL.

Seeborn Rowntree, of England, has accepted the invitation to give a course of five lectures at the Friends' Summer School, which is to be held at Haverford College, Sixth Month 18th to 25th. This will be one of the two parallel courses on the Christian message and its applications. Other speakers will give the world view of missionary and international problems; social service; the point of labor, and methods of educational evangelism. Among these speakers will be Rufus M. Jones and Wilbur K. Thomas and C. K. Edmunds, President of Canton Christian College. Alexander C. Purdy will lead a Bible Class, running through the week, on "The Way of Christ." Elbert Russell will lead one on the book of Revelation; and one or two other classes will be arranged, possibly including one on Methods of First-day School teaching.

The Summer School is being held under the auspices of Woolman School, Haverford College, the Extension Committee, and the Advancement Committee. Its purpose is to give definite training to those who want to help in bearing the Friendly message, and in spiritual fellowship to catch the fervor for this service.

The points to emphasize would seem to me to be: (1) The basic course by Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor of The Christian Century, on "The Vital Emphasis in the Christian Message;" (2) The course by Seeborn Rowntree, which is of particular interest to business men, factory workers, and students of industrial relations. (Note that all of the lectures of this course are late in the day, when it may be possible for these groups to attend.) (3) The Bible Classes, and the whole program are particularly valuable for those who are interested to prepare themselves for bearing the Friendly message.

The tennis court, athletic field, swimming pool, and other attractions of the Haverford campus, will be available.

BLESSED are they who have the gift of making friends, for it is one of God's best gifts. It involves many things, but, above all, the power of going out of one's self, and appreciating whatever is noble and loving in another.—THOMAS HUGHES.

CRUM CREEK.

On Fifth Month 17, 1923, a group of about seventy-five Young Friends met together at Crum Creek for the annual picnic, which for some years past has been held at that spot. Coffee was cooked on the camp-fire and consumed with sandwiches and cakes and ice cream cones. A spirit of fun and good fellowship prevailed. Everybody seemed so pleased to see everybody else, and everyone had so much to tell the other, that it was almost with hesitancy that the attention of the group was called to the fact that we had several noted personages among us. J. Henry Scattergood, the chief speaker of the evening, and Frederick J. Libby, who, we were glad to find, was able to spend the evening with us in spite of his almost ceaseless activities in the great cause which he is championing. Philip Garret, just returned from an extensive trip through Europe, was also with us.

Henry Scattergood gave us, at some length and with great clearness, a splendid summary of his extensive study of the economic and political causes which have led up to the present deadly conflict between France and Germany in the Ruhr. He brought very vividly before our eyes the terrible state of affairs which this complex train of events, conditions and motives has brought about. He made us feel the hopelessness of things, if they continue in the way they are going. He also proved, very conclusively, that there is but one way which can possibly stem the tide of ruin which is sweeping onward, and which can build up again devastated areas and despairing lives, and bring back hope and peace to Europe—the way of mutual forgiveness and love!

Frederick J. Libby here gathered up our thoughts for us, and turned them into a channel where we hope they may flow into an ever-growing river of power. He told us that we may feel that there is nothing that we can do before such a situation, and that feeling may deaden the energy surging within us which the words of Henry Scattergood called forth. He reminded us, however, that this is not the last such problem that will face us, so let us make sure that we are working to make ourselves authorities on these world problems in order that we may ever be more and more ready to face the new problems which arrive as time goes on. Surely these words should become for us a resolve to be woven into the dominant aim of our lives. Let us always remember that if we are not ready now to take an active part in problems that we should so like to help solve, we still have time to prepare ourselves for future problems, so that when the time comes we shall not feel as helpless as we do now.

Julianna Tatum spoke of the letters which the Young Friends' International Committee has received in answer to the Christmas Greeting sent to Germany, and asked that Young Friends try to correspond with young people in Germany, so that they may have real evidence of our sympathy and desire for friendship with them.

ELSA H. SILBER.

THE WAY OF PEACE.

SIXTH MONTH 4, 1923.

HON. WARREN G. HARDING,
White House, Washington, D. C.

Dear Friend:—In concurrence with the call for an expression of sentiment on the subject most vital to this present generation, sent out by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the Philadelphia Young Friends' Committee, representing eleven hundred young people, desires to give thee its most hearty encouragement in thy efforts to lead this nation into a united protest against all war. We are deeply gratified by thy constructive program for the outlawry of war and the substitution of settlement by judicial court, rather than by futile attempts at reaching settlements by wholesale slaughter.

We assure thee of our unwavering support of the stand thee is taking, and desire most sincerely that America shall not swerve from her "God-given task," but shall succeed in leading the world into "the way of peace."

Very respectfully,

SIDNEY O. NICHOLSON, Chairman,
Phila. Young Friends' Committee.

WHITE HOUSE,

Washington, June 7, 1923.

DEAR MR. NICHOLSON:—

The President has received your letter of June 4th, and he asks me to thank you very cordially for writing to him.

Assuring you and all concerned that the President genuinely appreciates this expression of commendation,

I am Sincerely Yours,

GEORGE B. CHRISTIAN, JR.,
Secretary to the President.

HOTEL BARLEY SHEAF.

The law of compensations operated most effectively the morning that a Colonial ice cream wagon blocked traffic on Route 65. It required only one look at the prostrate wagon sprawled helplessly on its side to convince every passenger that at least fifteen minutes or rather a half hour would pass by before the vehicle was righted. There was something very pathetic in the wheels in air and the pack ice spilling over the tail-board into the street, carrying a can of ice cream as a glacier might carry a frozen victim.

A walk to Second Street was the only alternative. No sooner had I reached this thoroughfare than the law of compensations began to operate.

There are very few people alive who recall Second Street as the great spinal street of Philadelphia. In fact I have doubts whether there are those alive who knew people who knew this Second Street or rather this Philadelphia. Be that as it may, Second Street was the backbone of the town for almost a hundred years throughout the eighteenth century. Market Street was, at that time, a faint hope to be realized only when the city grew to fill the yawning green fields stretching between river and river.

As witness to these assertions one has only to visit North Second Street, as I did that spring morning and see the market—this market is a relic of the northern terminus of the then city.

It served the inhabitants of Northern Liberties and also those who dwelt in the north end of the town proper. At the other end of this thoroughfare was the South-end Market. This treasure of Colonial Philadelphia still stands, a witness to a by-gone day. The trade that goes forward under its dome is very much in the present. Perhaps a mean spirit might infer that the merchandize, chiefly foodstuffs and especially the cheeses, smack of a ripe past. The market, however, still does lusty business and so the building serves a double purpose not only housing the providers of the neighborhood, but representing with much faithfulness the market-houses that existed on this street. The central and largest of the three houses was of much the same architecture, standing mid-way between the north and the south. It is from this edifice that Market Street, then called High Street, gets its name.

This old Philadelphia came back with a rush as the trolley bore me south. The shops backed from head to toe with dress goods, furniture shops, with tables, chairs and what-nots and above all the people, made a hundred years even as yesterday. I am inclined to think there is a stubborn genius of the place that refuses to cede to the shifting of a city's axis. Be that as it may the buildings still reflect the old life and the old romance.

Picture the farmer bringing his products to market, produce grown in that vague, vast hinterland between the northern limits of the city and Germantown. Such a journey was an ordeal if, as history records, it took James Logan a day's journey to get from his estate at Stenton to town, due to the impassable condition of the roads and old friend mud. When one made such trips, one was forced to spend the night, maybe nights, away from home. Hence the many taverns and road-houses that even I can remember. All, alas, doomed to obliteration or metamorphosis into garages. There are a few remaining that have escaped the hand of time. If you doubt it visit the Second Street that I saw that morning and there, tucked away amidst a sad scramble of buildings, you will find a house the name of which alone justifies its preservation. Allow me to make a pious sign to the romance of buildings and the charm of names—a feature that is almost smothered by such names as Wanamaker's, The Bourse, Hotel Adelphia, Ritz-Carlton and the Masonic Temple. Smothered, yes, but not extinguished, for one can still find the Hotel Barley Sheaf.

AT WESTTOWN.

For those who know and love Westtown it is unnecessary to go into detail about the beauty of her campus and the surrounding country as they lay under the hot sunshine on Seventh-day, Sixth Month 2nd, Westtown Alumni Day.

Master Thomas K. Brown opened the exercises with the Twenty-first Psalm, which was followed by a short welcoming speech from George L. Jones. Before the regular business of the meeting was brought forward, the President called the attention of the Alumni to three unusual features to come on the day's program—the dedication of the Helen Bacon Cottage; the presentation of a picture, the William C. Engle Memorial, to the School; and the singing on the hockey field in the evening. The business of the Association was then brought forward and duly dispatched.

At the close of the report of the Board of Managers, D. Robert Yarnall gave a short address in which he dealt chiefly with the spiritual and intellectual needs of Westtown. In answer to a letter he had sent to some of the Alumni asking them what they thought Westtown most needed, great stress was laid on high intellectual standards and more emphasis on spiritual values. In closing, Robert Yarnall said, "We must see that boys and girls from the right homes come to Westtown, who will assume their part in Quaker leadership which we not only crave as Friends, but which the world demands. That is the task that is placed on us today as members of the Alumni Association."

After the President's address, Albert L. Bailly, Jr., made a few remarks about the arboretum. Careful memoranda had been made of the classes which had never planted trees, or whose trees had died. The unrepresented volunteered to complete the list.

James G. Vail gave some interesting Alumni statistics and told of the work of the "distant" Alumni Committee. Before he left the platform he called for representatives from certain sections of the country. "West of the Mississippi" was represented by one person "all the way from California."

The chief speaker of the day was President William W. Comfort, of Haverford College. President Comfort's topic was Westtown, Haverford and Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and he spoke with a courage born of his honest, personal convictions. He did not spare any of these organizations from keen criticism and showed clearly and concisely where each had failed to live up to its highest and best.

One of his chief points was the lack of understanding and co-operation between Westtown and Haverford. Each institution has a distorted view of the other, and until there is a system of collaboration so that the half truths can be cleared up and the work of the school and college blended into a profitable whole, there will always be dissatisfaction and distrust between the two. Westtown and Haverford must strengthen each other and they cannot do this until there is more intellectual sympathy between the two boards that govern them.

Before the meeting adjourned, the President called for a showing of the "decades." A general applause saluted the faithful representative of the roaring "forties."

Immediately after the meeting adjourned, a group of people gathered about the southwestern corner of the new Helen Bacon Cottage, in which the girls will devote themselves to Household Management and Cooking. The dedication address was given by J. Henry Bartlett. The stone contained Helen Bacon's will; a list of the School Committee; a copy of the Westonian, a copy of the Philadelphia Public Ledger for the day and a copy of the school catalogue. From this ceremony people turned to the less serious one of eating lunch.

About two o'clock a small group gathered in the dining-room to witness the presentation of an oil painting by the class of 1910 in memory of their fellow-member, William Clothier Engle. William C. Engle studied art under N. C. Wyeth and the two men formed a close friendship. When William Engle died, so great had been the influence of his ideals and personality on his teacher that Wyeth painted a picture carrying out his pupil's conception—the imagination of the child mind. Wyeth has caught in his picture fine imaginative quality, together with the beauty and power of the sea. After Howard W. Elkinton had explained the picture, William E. Coale read a selection from Walt Whitman and gave a brief character sketch of William Engle.

IN THE SUN.

A little tot sat in the sun
 And played with childish glee;
 Behind her spread the spotless sands,
 Before her shone the sea:
 Albeit that she knew it not
 Right winsome she and fair,
 Her dainty dress all dazling white,
 All gold her tumbled hair,
 And blue her eyes as were the skies
 And white her skin like spray;
 As red her lips as coral chips
 That strewn about her lay.
 Yes, unaware that she was fair
 And busy now was she
 Aplaying in the shifting sands
 With shells beside the sea.

—WILLIAM CLOTHIER ENGLE.

The greater part of the afternoon was taken up with a baseball game with Girard College, a boys' tennis match with the same institution, a baseball game between some of the Alumni and water sports. Many stayed to sing on the bank above the hockey field and to applaud reminiscent sketches. The group broke up about nine o'clock and Old Scholars' Day was over for another year.

YOUNG FRIENDS.

The Executive Committee and Sub-Committees met together for supper and the evening at Twelfth Street on Sixth Month 4th. At the business session the President read from the Gospel of John. The minutes of the last meeting were read. In the absence of our Secretary, Julianna Tatum served for the day. Francis Goodhue reported for the Social Committee. There were seventy-five present at the Crum Creek supper. It was felt to have been a very successful evening. The address by J. Henry Scattergood was much appreciated by all, and we feel that it was of real stimulus in arousing Young Friends to all possible for the cause of Peace.

When the Chairman, Sidney Nicholson, asked for suggestions for the Social Committee next year, Francis Goodhue felt that there should be more effort made to get in touch with the Young Friends who did not come to our gatherings. Even the fact of our scattered membership hardly accounts for an attendance of only about two hundred of our eleven hundred members.

Ruth Kirkbride reported for the Editorial Committee, making a plea for more expression through THE FRIEND from our membership. Too much of the material at the present time is having to be written by the Editors. When one Young Friend at the Committee Meeting confessed that he did not know that there was a Young Friends' Number of THE FRIEND we were thoroughly aroused to the need of bringing the paper to the attention of our younger Friends.

Julianna Tatum reported for the International Committee. She read letters which had been prepared as suggested forms to be passed on by the Committee to be sent to the President and to our Senators in compliance with the request made by the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America. The call asked that we inform the President of our support in his programme for the outlawry of war, and urge our Senators to accord him their full assistance. Our attention was called to the fact that No More War Day is to be celebrated this year on Seventh Month 28th, under the Slogan: "LAW—NOT WAR." Young Friends were encouraged to help other organizations in a community to carry forth a constructive program. Work should be done by writing to newspapers, getting up public meetings and putting up posters. The Chairman was asked to appoint a small committee to have this work in hand.

Mary J. Moon reported for the Extension Committee that arrangements were being made for visits in local communities from the nine young English Friends who expect to visit America this summer. This committee is anxious to help in the visiting of meetings by Young Friends and asked to be informed of automobiles that could be used in this way, and of Young Friends desirous of visiting.

C. Canby Balderston called our attention to the fact Seeborn Rowntree is to be at the Haverford Summer School for one week, where he will deliver several addresses on industrial questions. This English Friend is well known as a great Quaker and international authority on the subject of Christianity in industry, and this is an unusually favorable opportunity which should not be missed on any account. It was felt that Young Friends should make an effort to be well represented at at least some of these meetings, and the two evening meetings were suggested as being probably the most convenient times for a large number of Young Friends to attend. A representative of the Dennison Manufacturing Co., feels it well worth while to give up the week to attend the summer school in order to be with Seeborn Rowntree. The office was authorized to send out postals to our Young Friends encouraging their attendance at the two evening meetings.

The representatives were asked to encourage registration at once for the Westtown Conference. The President asked for suggestions for next year. It was felt that it would be a great advantage if the Executive did not completely change its personnel, as we have just gotten ready now to work together. It was strongly urged that we begin our work earlier in the fall next year. In order to facilitate this the Nominating Committee was authorized to appoint the Sub-Committees and the members at large on the Executive before our first Executive Meeting this fall. Local communities were asked to appoint their representatives and inform the office as to the appointment by Ninth Month 1st. The suggestion was made that a Young Friends' Meeting similar to Crum Creek be held early in the fall.

James F. Walker, our new Chairman, was asked to tell of his hopes for the Young Friends' Committee. He reminded us that we were a religious organization, and that we must remember to carry on our work in the spirit of our Master, our principal aim being service for Him. He also suggested that the Young Friends of today are the foundation upon which the Yearly Meeting of tomorrow rests. Therefore, it is our responsibility to see that it is a sure foundation upon which the work of the next twenty-five years may safely raise itself in ever-increasing efficacy in the spreading of the Kingdom.

After a short devotional period, the meeting adjourned.

Notes on Mountmellick School. (Queen's County, Ireland.)

Annie Margaret Pike.

But to continue the details of its expanding education; after the school was reserved entirely for girls, French, and now German, and drawing were undertaken under the direction of Jane Wood who went to Mountmellick in 1856.

In looking through the recollections of an old scholar of the period I have found such a charming reference to Jane Wood that I cannot resist the impulse to quote it:

"In January, 1856, Jane Wood came to the school as First-class teacher. 'Governess' was the title by which she wished to be called, which soon assumed the more respectful one of 'governess, please.' She was not long amongst us before she had won all our hearts. The interest she took in her pupils and their work inspired them with a like earnest spirit; and the trust she reposed in us awoke a feeling of self-respect, and desire to do right, that we might prove worthy of her confidence.

One afternoon we all noticed our 'governess' looking unusually bright and well. She had a flush on her cheek, a sparkle in her eye, and an excitement of manner more than common. What could it all portend? We were in the drawing-school in the class-room (now No. 6 bed-room); one of the girls had forgotten something, and was obliged to leave the room. On her return, some light was thrown on the mystery. A man in the house, was whispered round; she had seen a hat and gloves on the hall table. Now the curiosity became more intense. Those who know the room will remember there are three windows looking towards the large parlour. Our object was, by some excuse, to reach one of these, and observe what was going on there. One girl had a pencil to be pointed, which she found necessary to take to the teacher. While this was being done for her, she was making use of her eyes. On her return to the desk she informed us that he had a moustache—she had seen it! Not until school was over was our curiosity satisfied, and then—I leave you to imagine our sensations, when we were informed that our 'governess' was engaged to be married to the mysterious visitor! After tea (or rather bread and milk) the First-class were assembled in the class-room, and we had a pleasant literary evening—Joshua Davy reading some of his favourite poems to us. We now set ourselves to devise some plan whereby we could make his visit a pleasant one. Some of us discussed the matter, and came to the audacious conclusion that we would write and ask our dear kind friend, Susan Pim, to lend their tax-car, that the happy couple might explore the country next day. She complied with our request, as we expected she would, and a holiday having been granted, the whole school set off for Forest, taking provisions with them. We had a most enjoyable time, and this visit of Joshua Davy's would have left very pleasant impressions on our minds, had it not soon been followed by the announcement that our beloved governess was shortly to leave us, owing, no doubt, to his persuasion. In their simplicity, the pupils of her class wrote an imploring letter to Joshua Davy, begging of him to allow her to remain, pleading as a reason our love for her, etc. But he was inexorable. The very reasons we urged only strengthened him in his determination to remove her as soon as possible."

I must go back a year or two to record the change that was made in 1855, when the school became altogether a girls' school, the boys being sent to Newtown School in Waterford.

From time to time the school was examined by competent educationalists so that the standard of the education given might be maintained. As years went on many subjects were added to the list of studies.

Girls whose parents wished them to learn music could take lessons in the town, but in 1880 it was added to the school curriculum as an optional subject. In 1881, as many as five pianos were in use, and of the forty-two pupils thirty-six girls were being taught. This of course made it necessary to have a resident music teacher. The music teachers were, almost without exception, non-Friends, music having been actively discouraged in the early days of the Society. In the Old Scholars' Report for 1915 I notice mention of a Gold Medal won by an old Mountmellick scholar at the Royal Irish Academy of Music.

The examinations, conducted under the arrangements of the Intermediate Education Board, already referred to, were held at the school from 1882. The larger numbers of pupils took Junior and Middle Grade courses of study, a few only were advanced enough for the Senior Grade. The Senior Grade to the best of my recollection was a "stiffer" examination than matriculation. In more recent times the pupils have entered for the College of Preceptors' Examinations and if the successes in 1910 may be taken as a standard of results, they have passed with great credit both to themselves and the school. In that year, too, all who took Music Examinations passed, eight took Honors, and one gained a Special Certificate from the Associated Board of the Royal Academy and College of Music, London.

Physical training and athletics were amongst the school's activities. Hockey matches have frequent mention in the Old Scholars' Association Reports. In my school days cricket matches were the fashion. There were tennis courts, both grass and concrete, in those days, too.

From time to time suggestions were made that the School should be removed to Dublin. Mountmellick was no longer a centre of Quaker activities as in the old days. I think the whole idea of education has undergone a change, and the education in seclusion of the past has been superseded by education, of what I may perhaps call the centrifugal kind, from within outwards, developed naturally by contact with the happenings of normal life. For its due progress residence in a "Sleepy Hollow" does not perhaps offer the best possible environment. A few years ago a very carefully thought-out scheme for the amalgamation of resources, and the starting of a school thoroughly equipped in the best modern sense was discussed. However, the difficulties in the way of its adoption proved to be insuperable.

Of recent years the number of pupils who were members of the Society of Friends was proportionately very low. I have heard of as few as nine in the otherwise well-filled school.

Perhaps the Society is less self-contained than it was in the days of our ancestors. The distinctive dress is not worn, and the quaint speech to a great extent is in disuse. One has but to glance through the pages of such a "hardy perennial" as "John Halifax, Gentleman," to note the isolation in which a Friend's family might live in the midst even of a city population of long ago. To be a non-church goer, unbaptized and consequently not a communicant was sufficient cause. Friends naturally drew to Friends and formed a habit of interdependence. They followed the custom of the Society in sending children at a very early age away from home for education at a Quaker School. In the present time of vanishing barriers, education may be had near home in any of the numbers of good schools that exist. Advertisements crowd the pages of educational papers. I have been studying the list in a Year Book, though indeed one has to go no further than the pages of The Friend (London) to note that young Quakers' scholastic opportunities in the British Islands are very much larger and more varied than was the case in the earlier years of the nineteenth century.

It may be that Mountmellick School had served its purpose, and could close its doors with a good conscience.

The sale of the school property and furniture realized about four thousand, four hundred and thirty pounds. During the course of the years the estate had been reduced to some three-and-a-half acres. Whatever advantages the location may have had at one time in facility of access and economy of management, I must confess to my own belief that for quite a considerable number of years it has been unsuited to the purpose. The distance from other educational centres, from any important public library, from opportunities for attending lectures, the difficulty of securing occasional instruction in special subjects, and the limitation of social life in a little country town, seem to me to put too severe a strain on the devotion of the talented staff who have up to its close maintained the high standard of the education given at Mountmellick.

It is, perhaps, of interest to note that for years before the building of railroads through the Queen's County, Friends went to Mountmellick from Dublin via the Grand Canal. The boat was drawn by a horse that plodded sedately along the towing path. The journey of somewhere about fifty miles took more than a day. I well remember the drive of some ten miles on an "outside car" from Portarlinton railway station in 1882. Afterwards a branch line made a connection with the Great Southern and Western Railway at Maryborough, seven miles distant.

The town is close to the Bog of Allen, from which the turf is cut that is used as fuel in those parts. The faint but unmistakable scent of turf smoke is noticeable long before one arrives.

The surrounding country is a paradise of wild flowers, and it supplied a vast number of specimens for study in the botany class.

At the time of the Reunion in 1921, at the closing of the School, the old Meeting House was once again well-filled with visitors who had come to take leave of their Alma Mater.

Notes on Dublin Yearly Meeting.

More than half the Friends in Ireland live in the North, so it was appropriate that for a second time the Yearly Meeting should be held in Belfast.

The statistics of Dublin Yearly Meeting are: Total membership 2,275, 7 less than the previous year. Births numbered 13, deaths 45, convictions and as minors 37, withdrawals 2, in-comings by certificate 12, out-goings 16. Marriages: to members 1; to non-members, 15; Ministers 31, Elders 80, Overseers 150.

Young Friends, or rather Northern young Friends, were very plentiful, but showed little corporate activity. Possibly corporate activity is missed less in Belfast than elsewhere, because so many young Friends are busy individually, for one can think of times when corporate activity has been rather a sign of lack of something to do than of real work.

The First-day morning meeting was replete with earnest and helpful messages, ten being delivered altogether, and, after all that had been said during the week about the necessity for a living silence, practically no silence at all.

When the conditions of the various meetings were under consideration a Friend inquired how Limerick Monthly Meeting got along with no ministers, elders or overseers. It was pointed out that Limerick Monthly Meeting contained only two families.

This is the meeting from which Joshua Jacob and family came to America in the early '80's. A Friend said she could not explain the Limerick situation, but had noticed that in Yorkshire Quarterly Meeting each Monthly Meeting found that where there were no recorded ministers there were more gains in membership than when ministers were recorded. Were our 261 officials (one for every seven Friends—omitting the non-resident and "practically withdrawn") doing their work? Overseers should be the shepherds of the flock, to bring the sheep to the Master.

At this juncture a Friend introduced a suggestion, which if offered at four o'clock would have drawn forth more than a smile, he regarded the marriage features as alarming and suggested that an essay test be made and a reward offered for the best essay on how to promote matrimony.

During the session set aside for the consideration of Society, corresponding in our case to the session given to the Queries and Answers, this pertinent and wise counsel was offered: that Friends would avoid giving Gospel addresses on these occasions, where they were not in place, and come down to the basic subject, seeking to find where the fault lay and trying to discover a remedy.

S. Hilda Bell said that for years she has felt there had been a lack of instruction of our children and new members in our principles, the latter in Ulster in particular. Some years ago a beautiful report on the subject had been drawn up, and there the matter ended. We were the only church that neglected these things, and hence the light-hearted way in which our children left us, not realizing what we were and being drawn to other people who did put forward their beliefs. A cousin of hers had left Friends, and then had said some years later that if she had known what Friends stood for earlier she would have been with them yet. We were all potential ministers; yet whereas the ministers in other churches had long terms of training, ours were not even questioned on our beliefs. Our form of worship was most difficult. Children might pick up some idea of it, but new members could not be expected to do so or to unite with our meetings unless they understood them. This had a scattering effect, and it made our ministers, who felt the burden of these restless souls, speak too often and too long. Our silences were vital. In them our Society had grown.

The same was referred to by a Friend from London who, recalling his last visit to Dublin Yearly Meeting, seventeen years ago, could note very little certain change, but in England the needs were similar to those pointed out by the report of the Meeting on Ministry and Oversight. There was the same tendency in England to take things for granted. They had plenty of dull and small meetings, and meetings where people were nearly done to death by hearing the same preaching week after week. They had young people leaving them, not knowing what Friends had to offer, and finding scope for service in other directions. We had started schools in the eighteenth century just in time to escape extinction, but still we did not recognize the need for fuller instruction. We all needed more study and grounding in the nature of our beliefs. Young people should be taught how to bring their religious knowledge into unity with their knowledge of science and history; otherwise they would not be able to maintain it; truth must more and more be realized as a whole, in which the Bible did not contradict the facts of history. They should realize what it was and really meant for the souls of men.

At the same session another Friend said that the large number of Friends who absented themselves from meeting was, he thought, a growing danger and an evidence of irresponsibility. Why were young people staying away? Partly perhaps because of the home atmosphere. A devotional period before the day's work was most important for adults as well as children, and parents should also encourage their children in their private personal devotions. We should make the children our friends, sharing our lives with them in an interesting way and not so filling our time with other interests as to neglect the child at home. All members should come to meeting with a sense of concern and responsibility, and we should not injure the influence of the meetings by so much criticism of them at home.

Another remarked in regard to making our meetings attractive and said we must beware of making them too easy.

Our Society's function was not quite that of other sections of God's Church, and therefore we required different methods. Otherwise we might as well join some other larger and richer and more efficient Nonconformist body. We came to Friends' meetings knowing we might be sent on very difficult tasks, and it was better to think of our responsibilities than to diminish them in making our meetings more attractive.

Impressions of America were given by some of the fraternal delegates to the Five Years' Meeting at Richmond last autumn.

Joseph T. Wigham described Richmond as a busy little town, with no slums, open gardens, piano-manufacturing, rose-growing, a couple of millionaires and a large meeting-house.

Henrietta Bulla, while in America, said she had never been left without some meeting to attend, and she had attended all she could of both sections. At Earlham she had been interested to notice that none of the Friends smoked. In all the hotels the waiters had said that prohibition was the greatest disaster that could have befallen America, but at Richmond all the Friends took exactly the opposite view, and she believed the amount of private drinking was not large relatively to the size of the population. In visiting schools she had been much impressed by their palatial equipment, which seemed to aim at impressing on the child the importance of education. The whole spirit of Westtown, Philadelphia, was delightful.

Another delegate had found everywhere in America a spirit of rapprochement among the various sections of Friends, the only really great division being that between East and West. The Western Friends were an intensely active evangelical people, working under the pastoral system and much inclined to "fundamentalism." The Eastern Friends were also active but were modernists, and they had felt that the Western ones wanted to impose a creed such as experience had, in Eastern opinion, shown to be a mistake. The Westerners, on the other hand, felt that the Easterners were upsetting the beliefs of young Friends and that a creed was necessary for mutual safety. All this was partly because American Friends were so widely scattered that it was impossible for them to know and therefore to trust each other as Friends did in England. The great accomplishment of the meeting was the restoration of confidence and, in addition, the drawing together of many Friends of differing thought into a unity of spirit.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

A STOP IN HER MIND. (1808)

MAUDE ROBINSON.

"I have brought your boy back, Madam, as I was coming through your village. His brother should not have left him in the town. I have little lads of my own," said the officer kindly.

"It was most kind of thee," said Bridget, as the post-chaise drove on, "but oh, Mark, what has happened and where didst thou leave thy brother?"

"It was he left me," said Mark saucily; "he left word with the ostler I was to walk home, and that grand officer heard him tell me, and offered me a lift. Oh, it was fine! those greys did go such a pace and the seat was so soft!"

He omitted to say that tired, with his wanderings, he had burst into childish tears at the old ostler's cross words, and the soft-hearted Captain, on his way to his own little ones, had taken pity on him.

"Why didst thou not ask to get out, when you overtook Matthew?"

"Not likely, when I was in a post-shay," said Mark decisively; "Matt would only have grumbled at me."

"How was it thou missed him?"

"Oh, he had to wait for the parson's physick at the apothecary's, and I just ran down to the beach, and there was a fisherman needing help with his boat. He gave me a whole groat, and I bought these two oranges for father," said Mark, producing them from his coat pockets. "His mother was softened: 'Take them up to him,' she said; 'it was kind of thee to think of thy poor father.'"

The tale was eagerly told again, but John Kendal reminded Mark how often he had told him to keep with Matthew in the town. "To know my boy was obedient would be sweeter to me than oranges," he said, but he praised the fruit when Mark had peeled and divided it for him.

Half an hour after, Matthew drove home, as sulky as it was in his nature to be, and when asked how he could have left his little brother, answered that he had waited a long time, and he had promised the parson to bring his physick by seven o'clock. So he had started, and if Mark had had to walk it would have taught him a lesson—he was always running away to see the ships—Mary should go on the next trip—she had more sense at eight than Mark had at ten.

This Mary did, and Bridget tried her best to keep Mark suitably employed, but it was a difficult task. Weeding the garden would only hold him a few minutes. When told to help Anna tidy the shop, a lump of the precious white sugar at fourteen pence the pound, only kept for the Hall and the Rectory, was defiantly popped into his mouth to the horror of his sister.

Strangely, it was in the sick-room that Mark was most useful. He fetched and carried and attended to the fire, and would read for hours in a low, pleasant voice, to soothe the weariness and pain of his father. The large Bible, given by his parents to John Kendal on his marriage, was almost their only book, and over and over the boy read his father's favorite chapters and Psalms.

Mark had just passed his eleventh birthday when the long suffering was ended, and his father's worn-out body laid in the little burial-ground of the Friends, in the village. Bridget Kendal, left with so many cares, had no time to repine, and as she went about her duties, the words of the 46th Psalm, which has helped so many in the day of trouble, was constantly in her mind, and many a prayer went up for her wayward and troublesome Mark.

NURSES AND STENOGRAPHER NEEDED FOR FRIENDS' SERVICE IN RUSSIA.

Wilbur K. Thomas, Executive Secretary of the American Friends' Service Committee, who is now on his way back from Russia, after having inspected the work of the Friends' Relief Mission there, sent the following cable before leaving Moscow:—

"Two Nurses, One Stenographer, Friends, Needed Russia August."

The American Friends' Service Committee would be glad to receive applications from, or information concerning, Friends who are qualified as candidates for these positions. The workers selected will probably sail for Russia next month.

It is hoped that a good harvest this summer may make further emergency relief feeding on the part of Friends unnecessary in Russia. The future work of the Friends' Mission will then be turned into distinctly reconstruction channels, medical aid forming a very important part of the program. The service will offer great opportunity for expressing the ideals of Friends, not only in relief of those who are in great need, but also in helping to inject a spirit of good-will into the tense relations at present existing between our own country and Russia.

NEED FOR CLOTHES IN SYRIA.

In a recent letter from Ras-el-Metrn, Syria, to the American Friends' Service Committee, Daniel Oliver emphasizes the need for clothing among the Armenian refugees. He says: "The need for clothes, blankets, quilts, boots and shoes cannot be too often mentioned. We have no more underclothing left, and only three or four quilts. We are hoping some clothes are on the way from America, and are counting the days until they arrive."

A shipment of clothes from America reached Daniel Oliver shortly after he wrote the above letter, and in acknowledging it he writes: "The clothes are a godsend. I do not know what we could do without them."

This need for clothing continues to be acute. The American Friends' Service Committee will be glad to receive good second-hand garments, bedding or other materials to be forwarded to Syria. Contributions of this nature should be sent prepaid to the American Friends' Service Committee's Store-room, 1521 Cherry Street, Philadelphia, Penna.

FUTURE PROGRAM OF THE FRIENDS' RELIEF MISSION IN AUSTRIA.

"In Austria, as in a number of other European countries at present, there is undeniably a strong current of feeling that emergency relief is out of date. Welfare work of a reconstructive nature is what is now needed."

So says Clement M. Biddle, Chairman of the Austrian Subcommittee of the American Friends' Service Committee, who has just returned from inspecting the work of the Friends' relief missions in different parts of Europe, particularly in Austria.

In accordance with the changing conditions upon which the above statement is based, the work of the Friends' Mission for the coming year will be of an increasingly reconstructive character. A considerable amount of relief will still be necessary, but the main energies of the Mission will go into types of work which will contribute to the splendid efforts of the nation to establish itself once more on a self-sustaining basis.

The staff of the Mission will be reduced to twelve workers—six English and six American—and as widely as possible the work will be carried on with the help of Austrian assistants and through channels provided by Austrian institutions. This arrangement will permit the continuance of the work at minimum cost, will perform a service in helping the Austrian assistants to support themselves, and will further benefit Austria by injecting into the nation's permanent channels of welfare work some experience with American methods.

The work will be divided into four main categories. One will be the continuance of middle-class relief work, which will be conducted in such a way as to benefit the rank and file of the well-educated classes. Individual case work will be reduced to a minimum, most of the assistance being given through professional associations, which will recommend their most needy members for Mission help.

A second division of the program will be a limited amount of help for the land settlement movement. Owing to the inability of the government to offer further subsidies, this movement has undergone modifications. Smaller houses are now being built, and they are erected by individual settlers instead of by co-operative building associations. The Mission help given will be for the purpose of aiding these individual settlers to build huts in which they can live during the summer, thus escaping from the congestion of the city and being able to raise their own food.

The Arts and Crafts Department will continue, to the extent to which orders for its products are received from England and America, its plan of providing middle-class women with sewing and other handwork by which they can help support themselves.

The greater part of the Mission's funds and energies, however, will go into the fourth phase of its work: a nation-wide anti-tuberculosis campaign which is now being organized and which will be a part of the nation's program to permanently reconstruct, not only its economic foundations, but also the health of its people. Plans for this work have been drawn up in close co-operation with Dr. Clemens Pirquet, of the Medical Faculty of the University of Vienna. Frequent consultations have been held with medical leaders and government officials, and the plan is heartily endorsed by all. Dr. Mary W. Griscom, of Bryn Mawr, Penna., a medical worker of wide experience, not only in America, but in China and India, sailed for Austria on the 2nd inst., to assist in organizing the campaign.

That anti-tuberculosis work is particularly needed in Austria at the present time is indicated by an article published recently in two of Vienna's newspapers, under the title: "Tuberculosis Welfare Work Not Up-to-date in Austria." This article, which is based upon one of the addresses given at the Fifth Austrian Tuberculosis Conference, states that tuberculosis mortality is increasing, and that the number of tuberculosis centres in the country is totally inadequate to meet the need. There exists only one anti-tuberculosis centre for every 120,000 persons, while in Germany the proportion is one centre to 20,000 persons.

The anti-tuberculosis work will include the following activities:

1—A "teachers' scheme," by which ten young women who have been teachers in the government schools in the different provinces, and who have been specially trained by Dr. Pirquet during the past year, will return to their provinces to carry on work of tuberculosis prevention by giving illustrated lectures in the schools.

2—Extension of the help given to Homes for Tubercular Children, Infant Welfare Centres, and Anti-tuberculosis Centres.

3—A continuance of the "cow scheme," by which cows and bulls are sold to farmers in the environs of Vienna in return for milk equal in value to the price paid by the Mission for the stock. This scheme, which the Mission has conducted so efficiently that it has become self-supporting, is not only providing a source of fresh milk for relief purposes, but is restocking the districts around Vienna and thus permanently increasing the capital's milk supply.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

FRIENDS from the Meetings of New Garden, London Grove, West Grove, Kennett, Parkerville and Golora, with some members of the Yearly Meeting Visitation Committee, gathered at the smaller New Garden house, on the morning of Sixth Month 10th, and entered into a Meeting for Worship, in which the presence of our Heavenly Father was sensibly felt. After a box luncheon under the fine old trees, and a time of social intercourse, an out-door Conference on Our Country Meetings was held, in which the freedom of expression and variety of viewpoint kept the interest sustained, and made the occasion well worth while. Such a day in what John Woolman called "the clean country," is a Sabbath indeed.

HADDONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING.—The final Quarterly Meeting of the spring series was held at Moorestown, N. J., on Sixth Month 14th. Several visitors were present, including George M. Warner, James M. Moon, Dr. Tomlinson and John G. and Rebecca P. Haines. The Meeting opened and closed with prayer. There were some six or seven communications in the "first meeting," and we were urged to practice diligently the religion we profess. The second meeting, after lunch, took up the reports of the Committees charged with the holding of the annual meeting for worship at Greenwich, and with the oversight of the meeting held during three months of the year at Orlando, Florida. An average attendance of forty-five was reported at the latter meeting, which is no longer held in the Hotel Osceola, but in the Adventist place of worship. Routine business occupied the remainder of the session.

The commencement at Friends' Boarding School, Barnesville, Ohio, was held Fifth Month 31st; fifteen of the papers being read the previous evening. The class this year consisted of twenty-five members, and as the old custom of each reading a graduation paper is here continued, the program seems long. While there was nothing especially brilliant in these papers, they were well written, with enough variation to be interesting.

The valedictory was short, but impressive, in a very practical way. The class address was original in thought and well received. Few senior classes of recent years have held the School in better esteem or been more appreciated than the class of '23. We believe Olney still has an important place to fill and its future is quite encouraging.

TACY SMITH.

DR. ELIZABETH ROTTEN, whose name has often appeared in THE FRIEND and who is personally known to many of us, and Henry Becker have contributed to last month's Friends' Fellowship Papers, an account of the growing sentiment in Germany in regard to Quakerism.

The aim of the organization which is now in its second year, is (1) to arrange opportunities for exchange of thought and to bring about connection with the different groups of Quakers and friends of Quakers, which are gradually being formed in various parts of Germany, and (2) to help foreign Friends coming to Germany to get into touch with those who are in sympathy with this line of thought. The writers of the article are giving their whole time to the work.

The Friend (London) in commenting on the seventieth wedding anniversary of Luke and Elvira Woodward last Fourth Month, remarks that their last attendance at London Yearly Meeting was in 1895, and that at the same Yearly Meeting the following American Friends were present:—Samuel R. Neave and Dr. Richard H. Thomas, Baltimore; Rufus P. King, North Carolina; Jonathan E. Rhoads and Esther Fowler, Philadelphia.

A WRITER in the Univers, the Catholic weekly, for Fifth Month 4th, says that the "Society of Friends must be excepted from the charges of proselytizing brought against relief workers in Poland. This is certainly in keeping with the general spirit of the Society, which stands in a sharp contrast with that of non-Catholic relief organizations in general on the Continent. It should be sympathetically recognized by all Catholics."—From The Friend (London).

No less an authority than Herbert Hoover tells us that of the twelve men at the head of the United States Government (comprising the President, Vice-President and the Cabinet) "nine have earned their own way in life without economic inheritance, and eight of them started with manual labor."

The Friend (London) says:—Seventy-eight firms, probably many of them Quaker or of Quaker ancestry, have been celebrating their existence in Philadelphia for a century. The second oldest of these, is the firm of J. E. Rhoads & Son, tanners, whose ancestor John Rhoads, of Ripley, with a large family, carried certificates from Chesterfield Monthly Meeting and settled near Philadelphia about 1687. (John Rhoads' name was spelled in six different ways in his will.) The old ledgers of this firm show that they were already dealers in leather in 1723; but they have not always confined their activities to leather belting. In the early days John Rhoads, the grandfather of the present members of the firm, visited Baltimore to sell scythe stones, which were part of their product.

The thirty bodies related to the Federal Council of Churches report a total membership of 20,722,042 persons with 149,436 congregations served by 119,077 ministers, and the gain in membership over last year is 669,261.

The Committee of Ackworth School, the Westtown of England, has decided to reduce the fee for Friends from £90 to £84 per annum, and for non-Friends from £110 to £105 per annum. The reductions are to take effect from the beginning of next autumn term.

The Swarthmore Press has recently published Elizabeth B. Emmott's "Short History of Quakerism." In this volume she has sought to bring within smaller compass the history and interest of the two great volumes of Quaker history by her brother, the late William C. Braithwaite, the two introductory volumes on Mystical Religion written by Rufus M. Jones, and his "Quakers in the American Colonies" (in which Isaac Sharpless and Amelia M. Gummere collaborated), thus bringing the history in one volume down to about 1725. A supplementary chapter deals with the "Quaker Way of Life" throughout the Society's history. Rufus Jones, who contributes an introduction, referring to himself and W. C. Braithwaite, says: "We always hoped that our books would stimulate the writing of other books covering the same field, and that our accumulation of data would present material for further study. This is a happy instance of the beginning of the fulfilment of that hope."

He adds: "There are two different types of historical work. One is the work of collecting, preserving and reproducing the annals and records of the past. The other is the work of re-interpretation. They are both important, but they indicate a different focus of interest and they call for quite different talents and equipment. The Society of Friends has been rich in its historians of the first type. It has had fewer of the second type. This is peculiarly the work now needed, and this present volume, together with A. Neave Brayshaw's valuable volume entitled 'The Quakers: Their Story and Message,' are good examples of this latter type."

NOTICES.

A MEETING for Divine Worship will be held at Stony Brook, near Princeton, N. J., on First-day afternoon, Sixth Month 24th, at 3 o'clock (Daylight Saving Time). Trolleys from Trenton pass the Meeting House. A cordial invitation to attend is extended to all who feel interested. For further information write to William B. Kirkbride, 908 Berkeley Avenue, Trenton, N. J.

FURNITURE NEEDED FOR WOOLMAN SCHOOL.—Woolman School could use some additional articles of furniture. It has been suggested that some Friends might have such articles in good condition which they would be glad to donate or loan to the School. Friends sometimes have such furniture in indefinite storage, or when breaking up housekeeping, or when moving to smaller quarters, which can be spared.

Perhaps some Friends who are unable to give money as they wish, to the support of the School, may be able to help in this way.

The School needs a gas-range for the kitchen, a typewriter desk, two study tables, one hall mirror and three small mirrors, a lawn settee, divan, two bed-cots, two bed-room rockers and some small rag rugs.

Friends willing to donate or loan such articles will please write to the School, giving a description of the furniture.

IS THE WORLD GROWING BETTER?

The one thing that is sure is this, that the hope of humanity lies in the widening, deepening influence of that blessed Life which was born nineteen hundred years ago in Bethlehem, and that Life teaches us that the only way to make the world better is for each man to do his best.

HENRY VAN DYKE.

Twelfth Month 12, 1904, in Beulah M. Rhoads' handwriting.

OUR BIRTHDAY.

With the present issue THE FRIEND completes its ninety-sixth year. We have recently made more than a cursory review of the ninety-five bound volumes of the paper that occupy two long shelves in our office, and have been much impressed with the evidence there afforded that the paper has been clear and out-spoken on the scores of moral issues that have been under discussion in the Society of Friends and in the world at large during the past century.

This leads us to the conclusion that THE FRIEND has had its full share of service in moulding sentiment and that it has had no small place in assisting many to come to safe and right conclusions in matters of great importance.

We have read with especial interest number one of volume one, and feel that the closing number of the current volume is a worthy child of the original.

Possibly the two agencies of all religious organizations that should be expected to yield the most enduring results are those that belong to our educational and publication committees. We fail to think of any that we would place before them.

Hence the inference that THE FRIEND should have a place of great importance in the life of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and in that of other Yearly Meetings of close kinship.

Much we know must depend on the Editorial Staff, but the attitude of our subscribers and supporters is almost as important to the paper's success.

We have a friend who has often said that he believes THE FRIEND is the best read weekly that passes through the Philadelphia post office—by this we understand he takes into consideration the relatively small circulation that the paper can maintain.

We want on this occasion, as we close the present volume, and prepare for the opening of a new one a week hence, to thank the large group of those who have aided us by their kindly messages of sympathetic approval, by helpful suggestions and constructive criticisms, by speaking a good word for us to a should-be subscriber and by their financial support, without which we could not have gone on.

We bespeak a continuance of these and other helps and we shall endeavor to do our part in making the weekly visits of THE FRIEND a welcome feature.

With each year we note a long list of those who have been for many years regular subscribers, but who have passed away during the year, in some cases these are succeeded by sons or daughters, in others this cannot be, but the greatest loss we sustain is where one passes away who in addition to seeing that THE FRIEND reaches his own home each week, sends us a list of those for whom he also subscribes.

[Eds.]

PUBLISHERS.

Life is continually expressing itself and publishing its interests, little and big. When our mood is zestful the infinite variety of life's manifestations, everywhere, thrills us with ecstasy. When our mood is dull we are depressed with the fearful sameness of experience. In any case, life seems so much at the mercy of our interpretation that we wonder if perhaps we have large responsibilities in reacting to it. Some feel that we spoil all by introducing questions of duty, of what ought to be. Others think that the "ought" that organizes is the orderer and, to that extent, the creator of true beauty and worth.

Without a rule, we are but wanderers who know not their way. Each little sparrow, and toad, and wasp has his rule. We call it instinct and respect the consistency of the humblest little vehicle of the great wisdom. Each sportsman, whether runner, swimmer, or flyer has his rule. Everywhere is law and a right way wherever life is satisfactorily lived. Guessing and much of doubting are the luxuries of those who have most of their living provided for them and who have not been aroused to that pitch of interest which seeks true success.

We humans seem to have more kinds of success open to us than other creatures. At least it would appear that we had options on many ways. Yet nothing very important results until we elect from our fancied list of possibilities that way which is to be our choice. We find, in practice, that we are limited in important particulars. True, we may elect forestry, but if we are very near-sighted we might do better at watch-repairing, or reading inscriptions. The day will come when our children's feet will no more be crowded into the wrong paths than into the wrong shoes. It doesn't take long to learn a few things about fitting feet. It takes somewhat longer to learn to fit people to services, but it can be done.

Now, if we consent that some ordering of our life's expression should be followed, what shall be the rule? Should we seek in every expression to be real, even realistic, so that there shall be no seeming, no artificiality in any word, or other expression of our inner state? The level of expression would then conform truly to our actual achievement. Some say "yes" to this. Others are as certain that we should make no progress by such photographic faithfulness to facts as they are. These latter would propose an ideal, a hope, a dream, even an unattainable perfection, something to spur, or pull us to higher ground. Some say that we shall find a sufficient rule in the best expectation of the social conscience around us, others that we must find it in a unique testimony in the individual conscience. Some are strong for common-sense, others for mystical sense. I've no doubt but that we have known exponents of each of these ideals. Never, perhaps, have we known a thoroughly wholesome Christian to be guided exclusively by any one of them. Christian faith and practice combine under the leading of the Holy Spirit, through time, to resolve the apparent difficulty into a working conscience for each child.

What are we to publish, ourselves, or our ideal? One age answers one way and the result is a Paradiso, a cathedral, a City of God, a hope, an aspiration. Another age answers the other way with the resultant confessions rioting in display of the intimacies, in books and other products, seeking to tell everything about the self. The type-founders have to make a large supply of the capital letter "I": "My this" and "I that." Yet not all the unfoldings of consciousness in this field are unlovely. Taste is apt to decay and entertainment smothered edification. Even among Friends, the love for entertainment flames up and consumes, indiscriminatingly, much self-exploitation along with the publishing of the truth.

Do you remember how in the first three gospels the beautiful portrayal of The Father, in parable and deed of mercy, almost leads us to forget that The Son is also disclosed? One of the traits that has made the devout reader of John uneasy is the change in style that brings a sudden rush of "I's" into the phrasing of the message. This may well be a result of the use of our Lord's gospel in the early church. Was it the method of Jesus, or do we actually catch the style of His speaking better in the other gospels?

Publishers of the Truth we are to be, whether that truth is of some past, or present experience, or dream of the future. We do not say publishers of facts merely, for it is a fact that in our region "water freezes at 32 degrees above zero, Fahrenheit," but it would be an untruth, at least to the situation, to say those words to a man who in great haste and perturbation asks us, "Where is the Broad Street Station?" The three friends of Job said some admirable words, words true and beautiful in their appropriate context but, in the situation as presented by Job's anguish, essentially false. O, Thou Great Physician, Master, Friend, Teacher, Savior, even truth takes on new perfections in Thy light. Lead us therein!

ELIHU GRANT.

Westtown, Haverford and Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

W. W. Comfort.

[While the address delivered by President Comfort at the Westtown Old Scholars' Meeting on Sixth Month 2nd was listened to attentively by many hundreds of our readers, and will be seen by others as it appears in The Westonian, we believe it is due to all our subscribers and the wide circle of Friends and others to whom THE FRIEND GOES to give a careful scrutiny to what is said in this address, and to allow time for reflection on some of the views that are advanced in it.

We feel that President Comfort is most honest in his statements, that what he says he says for himself alone, and not as the mouth-piece of any group of persons. His deductions may not be ours, but they are honestly stated, and we must admit that he has certain reliable data whereon to base his conclusions, which none of us individually nor all of us collectively can command.

His remarks on leadership are too sadly true. His intimation, that because a college freshman "goes to pieces" in his freshman year may not be laid to the charge of the college, is most gently put. Everyone but a total ignoramus in such matters knows that more than fifty per cent. of such failures are traceable to the training that antedates college entrance, and that almost one hundred per cent. of this fifty per cent. are chargeable to the lack of training at home. Let it be remembered, too, in this connection, that many a Quaker boy today finds admittance to college from families which possess no college-going traditions and in which a generation back no thought was further from the family counsels than that of a son entering college. We are still in a transitional stage in this matter. We are learning by personal experience, and in many cases the lesson is being well learned, and the son will come forth wiser than his parents.

President Comfort states that "of 43 Quakers of the two branches in Haverford, 21 are Westonians and 22 are not." Is there anything to discourage us in this showing? For reasons purely economic it is better for certain boys to attend college near home as day-students, some find at other institutions than Haverford the special courses their tastes seem to demand, again others, because they go farther from home or into an entirely new environment, elect Earlham; this has been especially noticeable among Ohio boys. All in all the showing 21 to 22 is a good one.

Where the speaker touches upon the subject of the ministry, we recognize that he is upon ground where he must tread most cautiously. This part of his paper merits re-reading. We believe that you will find in his conclusions very much to endorse. Be watchful, we would ask you, not to read into his paper, especially in this section, what he has never said; and if you draw inferences do not label them as anything but your own. When one has faced a congregation of some two hundred young men, alive in every fibre of mind and body, week in and week out for a college year in a Friends' meeting of the Philadelphia type, he has had presented to him problems that you and we have not even attempted to solve; he speaks with a horizon that we do not command, and his statements must carry an element of fact that we must accept. Where he alludes to a "limited intelligence and narrow experience," he has far more in mind than scholastic training.

There were preachers among the Friends of the seventeenth century and there have been many since who were not college-bred, yet they did not lack in intelligence and experience. They were, however, possessed of a power to which all schools and colleges will do well to appeal.

To be effective there must be clear thought, vibrant with feeling, if the message is to win its way and effect its purpose with the American youth of today. Quaker ministry in its very nature should be and, in no little degree, is of this type.

[Eds.]

Such an occasion as this offers a rare opportunity to consider some of the problems which concern Philadelphia Friends, and in particular those which confront the only boarding school and the only college for men under Friends' management which are located within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Our very presence here today is evidence of our interest in the welfare and development of this ancient School; and there are perhaps few in this company who have not had some contact and acquaintance with Haverford College. Upon the standards of scholarship and of life which are inculcated at these two institutions depend in a very large measure the future of the oldest Yearly Meeting in America. They occupy a strategic position. They have been and they are an important link in the development of American Quakerism.

What I say today I say for myself alone, and not as the mouthpiece of any group of persons. I shall say what I think categorically and without the qualification or restriction which usually marks our Quaker parlance, but which sometimes weakens a truth which needs to be driven home. It is my hope that something may be said to clear the path for an advance in Quaker education in these parts, and that all concerned may understand more clearly how these institutions can and should co-operate more effectively than they have ever yet done.

Two years ago at Westtown Commencement the present speaker voiced his regret that Westtown graduates were not taking the part they might in undergraduate affairs at Haverford College. They were not felt in the formation of decisions and policies at a time when the judgment of many of our youth was strangely distorted. It was cause for general regret among some of us that Westtown sentiment was inarticulate before an attack of license which threatened precious foundations at Haverford, as at most other colleges. Westtown sentiment did not seem to translate itself into action and leadership. At that time it was rather from other denominational elements that succor came. I have never fully understood the cause of that state of affairs. Perhaps it is unnecessary to re-open the question now. For I am here to say that the past two years have witnessed a total change in this respect. For two years Westtown sentiment has been articulate. Westtown graduates have done their share to maintain our equilibrium and to direct our college policies in sane and righteous lines. The introduction of student government at Westtown has had a happy effect. There was one Westonian on the Haverford Student Council last year, and four this year. These are figures of the greatest significance. Without in any sense constituting a political bloc, Westonians have demonstrated that in force of character and in qualities of leadership they can make themselves felt in open competition, and this we have long wished to see.

This acknowledgment, which it gives me the greatest satisfaction to make, brings us naturally to a consideration of the historic function of these two institutions in the development of Quaker leadership. That we are lacking in leadership as a Society, is only too well known. It cannot be concealed. We have an abundance of earnest fighters in the ranks, but we are meagerly officered for our great campaigns. In our 100,000 membership there are not enough leaders to fill the fingers of one hand. Bankers, lawyers, doctors, preachers, teachers, hard-headed business men, noble mothers and lovely daughters—4,000 of them in Philadelphia alone. But where is the prophet, the leader, to go before us? Where is the voice, our voice, which can be heard above all the confusion of tongues wagging about us and which by its accents of truth and sympathetic intelligence will gain the attention of the world? Where are our writers who can write for a large public? I cannot think of anyone at present born a member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting who can gain a national public by his written word. With one-quarter the membership, English Friends have many times our weight in British national and social councils. There may be other causes for this, upon which we need not dwell. But I know there is one cause which we may do well to ponder: they are better educated than we are. And lest you will think I am referring to mere intellectual superiority, I hasten to add that their superior education is revealed not in pride and exclusiveness, but in tolerance, in ease of social contact, in wisdom that wins its own way. How eagerly we run to meet these valued Friends when they come among us! How eagerly we listen to their wise and sympathetic interpretations of truth! It is because they are citizens of the world, and we are citizens of a city which is no mean city, but it has a narrow denominational horizon. These British Friends are better founded, better read, better traveled, better bred than we are, and they are fighting on a far-flung battle line.

Now it is in connection with this comparison that we should think of the two institutions which claim our attention. Westtown has been preciously guarded as a nursery of Quakerism, where certain peculiar manners and customs have been retained for their value in preserving our children from the temptations of the world. Westtown has been reserved for Friends' children, and the education here has surely been guarded. Nothing recognized to be at variance with the testimonies of our Society has been encouraged within these precincts. The School is the special concern of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting; here, if anywhere, the future leaders of our people must receive their formative training.

Haverford was founded and has always been governed by the liberal wing of Philadelphia Quakers,—liberal in theology when the question arose, liberal in manners and in all the exterior marks of Quakerism, liberal in allowing members of other denominations both to teach and to learn upon its foundations, setting store upon scholarship and intellectual development. For over half a century non-members have been admitted to its student body and have grown more numerous until they now form about eighty per cent. of the enrollment. Doubtless, then, Haverford is no longer an example of Quaker homogeneity. It offers in our educational scheme a point of contact between our young membership and that of other denominations. Here our boys find themselves in the world,—a somewhat protected world, to be sure,—but nevertheless a new world of opportunity to err as well as to walk straight. Here Quakerism is on trial. Here Westtown comes into contact and competition with the outside world. Will it sink or survive the stronger for the testing? We have not a monopoly of wisdom. We must not pay too heavy a price for being a peculiar people.

Both institutions will be strengthened if each allows the other to strengthen it. Yet it is not too much to assert that each has gone its way unconscious of any responsibility toward the other. This is because the Westtown educational group in charge of Westtown has been a different group from the Haverford educational group in charge of Haverford. They are so distinct in personnel as hardly to have any common educational interest. There has never been any intelligent co-operation between the responsible management of the two institutions, though there has been for years a cordial personal relation existing between executive officers, who have personally facilitated the transaction of necessary business between School and College. This unnatural situation, regrettable as it now appears, is altogether the result of historical factors. It is a situation which can and should be adjusted. In the interests of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting we must cease to separate the interests of these two institutions. Before showing our corporate debt to them, let me point out what the loss has been through a failure to correlate their endeavors in a broad-minded spirit of sympathy.

Very many of our members are satisfied with the Westtown of the past fifty years. As compared with other boarding schools, it has had a pretty high wall about it. Bearers of approved messages have been cordially welcome to come in, but there has not been much going out on the part of the School family. The cultivation of certain manners and ideals has been very intensive in a protected garden. The Philadelphia Yearly Meeting's Committee has willed it so, and the Committee has included a considerable number of conservative Friends. They have of course sought by the means employed to preserve what is precious to all of us. There is no criticism here intended of their aims. It is only the means that we are considering. Is it not possible that until very recently the exterior peculiarities of Quakerism have been stressed at the cost of the inner strength of Quaker convictions set forth in the lives of strong men and women? Is it not true that a number of graduates have taken one or two unfortunate paths: some have continued throughout life to live on a narrow gauge of human sympathy which has interfered with their value as members of a mixed community; while others, after feeling restrained during their school years, have leaped over the traces altogether when free from restraint and renounced all effective co-operation with the Society of their birth-right. If we can place ourselves for the moment in a state of perfect frankness, I think we must admit some loss of efficiency through these two results of Westtown training.

And now let us be equally honest in viewing the effect of a Haverford training upon the Quaker youth of our Yearly Meeting. Here at the present time we find Friends not in complete but in only partial command of the situation. The students are only twenty per cent. of Quaker membership; the Faculty is almost exactly fifty per cent. of Quaker membership; the Board of Managers is one hundred per cent. of Quaker membership. There is no official discrimination against non-Quaker students or professors. Our Society is here in open competition with the thought and practices of other denominations. Our Society's ideals are placed in review; our Quaker youth are on trial. If our way of life is inferior, it is disparaged; if our ministry is archaic, it is mocked at; if our teaching is feeble, it is denied; if our personal testimony fails, then Quaker influence in the College is a vain boast. No one in touch with the situation will deny that Haverford has fallen short of its possibilities in these respects. But the interesting fact in the situation is the challenge it presents. Our Quaker boys here have a chance to take their first step in the world, to test themselves as they will have to do later in the outside world in the temptations which assail their physical, moral and spiritual lives. If they fall into temptation, the College must bear its share of the responsibility; but so also must the home and the School which have left them unable to defend themselves and to build more stately mansions upon their early foundations.

I have been interested in running down some of the instances which have given to Westtown teachers and students an unfortunate impression of Haverford standards. These instances have been indeed deplorable. But it has been a few Westtown graduates who return from Haverford to the School and conduct themselves in an unbecoming manner who have given rise to the natural impression. They are exceptional cases and are very regrettable. The question is, why do these individuals select Westtown as a place to disport themselves in this fashion? That is a subtle question which I shall not answer here, but for which an answer may suggest itself to some of my hearers. The conduct is the result of a kind of misguided protest which the School and the College working together ought to be able to forestall. Perhaps the worst effect of it is the tale-bearing to which it gives rise and which does infinite harm to both institutions. There is none of the Queries whose practical value we should more cherish than that which discourages tale-bearing and detraction, for I know of no body of Christians more prone to these practices than we are ourselves. Vague reports brought home by incompetent observers are bandied about in our families and committees and are exaggerated beyond recognition. Both School and College are sadly misrepresented, and misunderstanding is created. Both School and College are dealing with human beings at what is likely to be a foolish and thoughtless age. They should both be judged by their mature products rather than by their immature students. We are all working for the same results, and we can afford to be generous in the belief that many foolish children will yet make wise parents.

But at present some Quaker parents feel the danger to be so great in the transference from Westtown to Haverford that they refuse to submit their sons to the danger. They prefer to send them to a great university where they will be free from the sinister influence of a diluted Quakerism. Yet Haverford students are surrounded by a traditional atmosphere of Quakerism. They are an object of continual personal solicitude, and they are perfectly free agents to practise their own standards of life. They do not have to deteriorate; very few of them do. Investigation shows that those who are unsatisfactory in college were already unsatisfactory in school. Now boarding-school government is totally inappropriate in dealing with young men from seventeen to twenty-three years of age. Students at Haverford may indulge in certain unprofitable practices if they wish to do so, within the bounds set by temperance in such matters, just as students do either openly or covertly at other colleges for men in the country. I am talking about Westtown youth at Haverford, and I say they need not do these things to the dismay of their parents unless there has been something in their previous training which inclines them to indulge their freedom. Each may decide for himself in college, as in life, what he will embrace and what he will eschew, subject only to the solicitude of the Faculty, who seek to curb him in any practice which is undermining him or affecting his Christian efficiency. Of 43 Quakers of the two branches in Haverford, 21 are Westonians and 22 are not. I trust that these 21 are not in danger of losing any of their valuable patrimony. I should be quite willing to trust the observation on this point of their parents, who are certainly interested in their welfare. These boys are a great asset to the College and they show what the School can do for the College. I predict with confidence that they will be taking thirty years hence as important a part in the affairs of the Yearly Meeting as their forebears did before them. Blood will tell, especially if fortified by a transfusion of education, and after a pardonable flight in the world, with its strong appeal, our youth will come home to roost where they belong. Only let their flight be what the aviators call "under control" — a wise and sympathetic control that knows when to exert pressure and when to let the natural desires of youth run free. I believe that at this age it is expedient not to forbid where it is impossible to enforce, but to have faith that the best will assert itself to the eventual confusion of the trivial. It must not be forgotten that our boys are fundamentally like other boys, and it is useless to pretend that they are immune by nature from temptation. Any strength they may develop must come from the family and school. By the time they get to college their fundamental traits are already bent in a certain direction. What college does is to arouse ambitions, inspirations, ideals hitherto only vaguely seen; but a boy's character is already either strong or weak. We parents are largely responsible for the character, and we must not palm off the responsibility where it cannot be borne.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

The following Notes were compiled by Frances Tatum Rhoads.

The Philadelphia Peace Committee is sending a member into each of our Monthly Meetings (of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting), to supplement, by some statement, the Appeal which presents our own work, along with that of the National Council for the Prevention of War. In this personal contact we hope to bring the matter of our work more closely home to all of our members, to stir them with a sense of the importance of our all doing just now whatever we can do to stem the tide of militaristic sentiment, and present the true ideals of peace.

The activities of the Citizens' Military Training Camps are being put very prominently before the public as the summer advances. Posters in railroad stations, trolley cars, etc., present their attractions; how traveling expenses are paid, equipment furnished, etc. "Send your boy to Plattsburg, and Swap him for a Man," says one poster, but it does not say what kind of a man he will be!

An article in a popular weekly magazine entitled, "Our Brutal Soldiers, and what our Boys in Camp think of them," tells of the pleasant side of camp life, describes the pet animals the soldiers have, the outdoor sports, etc., but nothing is said of the aim of it all, and the direction in which it leads. Let us be watchful to present the question in its true significance. Do we want the boys of our country trained for army service on the former German plan?

The Peace Committee has on hand some reprints of the article published in the Atlantic Monthly, "A Test of Faith." This remarkable answer to the question as to whether non-resistance is a practical position deserves a wide reading and distribution. We shall be glad to have our members help in this.

OUR Autumn work in State and County Fairs brings us in touch with people we want to influence for peace. Suggestions as how this may best be accomplished will be welcomed by the Peace Education Committee, 304 Arch Street.

GOOD WORDS FROM IRELAND.—We recall the thrilling stories of the staunch Irish Friends, under the pressure of war-time conditions, which are told in the journal of Wm. Edmundson, and other old-time chronicles, and the remarks of Ernest Grubb at the late Dublin Yearly Meeting show that they are no less strong for peace, some of them at least, at the present time.

Notes on London Yearly Meeting.

London Yearly Meeting began Fourth-day, Fifth Month 23rd, at ten o'clock. A morning and an afternoon session was the usual order during the seven days of its continuance, with special sessions some evenings. Each morning session was preceded by a devotional meeting at nine o'clock. On the 22nd, three gatherings occurred: a meeting for worship; the Swarthmore Lecture, "a beautiful and reasoned statement of the close and vital connection between our religious life and our service," was given by Helen M. Sturge; and lastly, a film was exhibited showing the Relief Work of Friends.

At the first session of the Yearly Meeting proper the Nominating Committee, previously appointed, proposed that Roger Clark be Clerk, and Julia R. Glaisyer Senior Assistant. At a later session it became necessary to release Roger Clark on account of illness in his family, and the ex-Clerk, John H. Barlow, took again the office for the remainder of the sessions. Visiting Friends included Rufus and Elizabeth Jones, Emma Cadbury, George Williams and Augustus Murray from America, Friends from West China, Vienna, Germany, Denmark, France and New Zealand and two members of the Dutch Mennonites were present.

Official correspondence with American Yearly Meetings came up on Fourth-day afternoon, by report from the Meeting for Sufferings. The following extract from that report will explain the matter:—

It has been assumed that, whenever a separation occurred, London Yearly Meeting must decide which of the two separated bodies it would recognize as part of the genuine "Society of Friends." A special responsibility has seemed to rest upon it in this matter, since it is the mother Yearly Meeting and the one whose judgment has often been regarded as authoritative. The assumption has had many unfortunate consequences. It has compelled London Yearly Meeting to sit in judgment on bodies at a great distance, with whose circumstances it was very imperfectly acquainted. If the course

Describing his own experiences with the many soldiers who have come for food or lodging to his home during the past two years, he said that he had always prayed that some "good words" might be given him to say to them, and generally had found a right opportunity to say them, though it was hard to know how to speak to men "who were accustomed only to the mass."

Four soldiers were just leaving his home one morning and "as they went down the avenue," Ernest Grubb called after them, "Boys! Do violence to no man! Remember they are your brothers!"

Meeting one of them again, some time after, the man said: "I remembered what you said, sir, and fired high. I didn't want to hit 'im."

"So," said Ernest Grubb, "the good words have not lost their force!"

The World Tomorrow devoted a recent issue to discussion of the question, "Shall the Church Bless War?" Letters are still coming in, presenting replies made from various viewpoints, and the last issue has one under the heading, "Follow the Quakers." It says, "In answer to the question, 'Is War a Method which the Church can sanction anymore?' would say that the Church never should have countenanced war, and that if all Christian denominations took the same point of view as do the Quakers, and exerted their all-powerful influence in propagating and, wherever possible, enforcing that view, wars of aggression would long since have ceased, and with them the occasion for engaging in war on the part of nations against whom such wars are directed.

proposed is adopted, it is the earnest desire of the Committee that the spiritual tie which binds all true Friends together should be strengthened. While our Yearly Meeting will not assume responsibility for the views held or the practices adopted by any other, the bond of friendship and fellowship need not be in any way diminished, but will, we trust, be increased by becoming less formal.

In the judgment of the Committee the best method of achieving this aim would be to drop entirely the practice of appointing official Correspondents, and this course it heartily recommends.

In less than half an hour a unanimous decision of approval was reached.

Very different, however, was the reception of the report on Religious Education. In 1921 a Committee of the Yearly Meeting had this subject assigned to it for consideration, and this year made a final and voluminous report. The Friend (London) sums up its contents by saying:—

It surveys the present situation, lays down general principles, indicates the scope of the teaching required, makes numerous practical suggestions and concludes with a list of nearly 150 books on religious education for the use of parents and others who have the care of children, classified under eight heads.

It was felt by some, however, to have a bias toward special theological tenets, and the discussion that followed ran along these lines, while the practical suggestions were not seriously considered. At the close the Clerk presented this Minute, which was accepted:—

We have been reminded that all education is religious education and that religion is rooted in experience, in direct and individual experience of God revealed to us by the person of Jesus Christ, and that the secret of religion is the practice of His Presence. Such experience we must reverently believe can come only by the Holy Spirit, but our aim must be definitely to provide an education that will help to prepare the way for it. In the absence of a trained ministry we need, more than others, that large numbers of our members should be seriously studying the whole background of our religion and the Bible. Part of our failure to attract others to the truth we hold is due to a lack of power in expressing this truth. Many of the difficulties that surround us in religious life are intellectual and must be met by intellectual means. Without adopting the Report as a complete statement of the view of the Society of Friends on the teaching of religious education, we welcome the suggestions it makes and recommend those suggestions to our meetings for careful consideration.

Extension Work at Home drew forth lively and stirring messages at one of the evening sessions. Thus Robert Davis spoke regarding the aim of the work:—

Three points might be emphasized: (1) We needed to appreciate more fully the values that attach to our meetings and that the poverty of those meetings was a serious handicap to extension work; we needed to cultivate a deeper sense of responsibility. (2) There was the need for a deeper concern to spread the message of Truth: What contribution did our meetings make to the spiritual life of the neighborhood? Were the lives of men and women being changed through the influence of that meeting? Was the meeting a living creative force, the centre of spiritual influence and social activity and educational enlightenment? Would the neighborhood suffer if the meeting were to close? (3) The spirit that desired the spread of Truth was lacking. No one could read the history of Early Quakerism without being struck by the contrast between the splendid enthusiasm of that day for the spread of Truth and the comparative lukewarmness and indifference of today. In the seventeenth century Quakerism was a creative, spiritual movement. Quakers were desirous of spreading the truth; today it was difficult to move at all. What was the remedy? What was needed was a vital and personal sense of the immediate presence and power of God. The purpose that should underlie our efforts to spread the Truth was not to make the world safe for democracy, but something far deeper, to make democracy conscious of God. God was ready to lead us forward to larger and more fruitful service, if we had the will to obey His call and the courage to follow the guidance of His Spirit.

Rufus M. Jones had been asking himself the question, "What is our main business and are we really at it?" Our business was not to create some new spiritual life, but to let Christ through in the human life today, and that was the supreme business of the Church. He was making it his business in this world to try to let Christ through to men, women and little children, so that never again would the world have anything to do with hatred, nor would it be an organ of dis-sension, but would stand for the love that reveals fellowship, friendship, joy and radiance and all the other qualities that make Christ real. We must let the love and glory and radiance of God break through us. Christ made us transmitters and living centres to a religion that was just as real as electricity, as real as radium and as mighty as gravitation that holds the universe together.

Two sessions were given to the subject of the Ministry, including the Recording of Ministers. T. Edmund Harvey said:—

We were all Ministers if true Friends. The ministry of life was the ministry in which personality spoke to personality. The call to minister came to each one, but in a peculiar way to those who were given this special gift for the service of others. The best could not be attained unless the whole life were dedicated. There were claims on all sides for service,—municipal service, philanthropic, educational. It was sometimes necessary, however, to lay down a service or give up a pleasure in order that the life might be more freely given and spent in the call of ministry.

To William Littlebois it seemed that two things illustrated our weakness: (1) The absence of expression of vocal prayer in so many of our meetings. (2) The lack of Friends to whom the vocal message was given. God had immeasurably more to give to Friends than they ever dreamed of. A new epoch lay before us of power and work for the Kingdom of God.

On the subject of recording Ministers there was much expression favoring the giving up of the practice and the Clerk drew up a Minute which was accepted:—

"We have had before us the report of the Meeting for Sufferings on the Minute of Yorkshire Quarterly Meeting with reference to the recording of Ministers and have carefully considered the subject. Before coming to a decision we ask the Meeting for Sufferings to consider the changes that would be necessary, should we discontinue the practice of recording Ministers."

On Seventh-day morning, the only session of that day, an invitation was accepted to meet next year at Llandrindod Wells, a Welsh town, where, however, the English language is spoken. Reference was made to the advantages that had accrued previously in holding the Yearly Meeting at Leeds, Birmingham and Manchester, and also to the possibility of Devonshire House passing out of the possession of Friends by another year.

The statistics of the Yearly Meeting were given as follows:—

Total membership of the 77 Monthly, Two Months and Six Months Meetings which comprise the 21 Quarterly and General Meetings, together with the C. I. S. Foreign Membership (85) was at the end of 1922, 20,069, an increase of 22 on that of the previous year, due to the increase of 54 in the foreign membership. The decrease in Great Britain is 44. Eleven Quarterly Meetings show decreases, 6 Quarterly Meetings and 1 General Meeting showing increases. Convictions, admissions as minors and reinstatements—424—were 22 more; births—139—16 more; disownments, resignations and disassociations—209—17 more; deaths—339—27 more. The number of members married was 177—4 more; and there were 20 marriages in our meeting-houses, when both parties were Friends, compared with 23 in 1921. Recorded Ministers—236—were 4 less than in 1921, and 102 less than ten years ago.

NEW ENGLAND YEARLY MEETING.

In visiting this gathering, held at Westerly, Rhode Island, Sixth Month 2 to 6, 1923, we were impressed with the interest evinced by the members and how each one counts in an assembly of moderate size.

Two Friends from Iowa, one from New York and four from Philadelphia and its vicinity were welcomed as guests in different homes. Dinners and suppers were served in the basement room with rest apartment and kitchen adjoining.

The Queries occupied one session, another was devoted to Epistles from Canada, Kansas, Iowa, Ohio, North Carolina, Philadelphia and Fritchley—the one from London was supplemented by a cable greeting, and all these were cordially answered.

There had been a suggestion from one Quarter that Westerly should consider union with Philadelphia, and although it is hardly ripe for action, we are reminded of the articles by Blair Neatby in the Quarterly Examiner, 1918, entitled: "Quakerism in America."

He reviews from his English standpoint the various Branches on our Continent—one sentence we quote:—

"I feel perfectly clear as to the most hopeful immediate step for Friends who value the old paths. It is to work for the fullest possible union between the Orthodox Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and the Yearly Meetings of the Conservative body; and for an equally close union between these two bodies and our own."

There were two sessions of the Meeting for Ministers and Elders, the Clerk, Job S. Gidley, being much favored in conducting it.

On First-day the house was well filled, many young people and children, for the marriages between Westerly and Philadelphia Friends bring a fraternal feeling.

Henry J. Cadbury, too, came with a greeting from those of our Society at Cambridge, Mass., in their weekly gathering. Arthur Perry, of Boston, was Clerk of the Yearly Meeting, and after a devotional period each morning, the business was transacted ably "without haste, without rest."

The Peace Committee occupied one evening, Frederick Libby giving us one of his earnest addresses. He had a popular Primer, from France, illustrated, inciting the children of that country against Germans, urging hatred and revenge.

How can we offset this?

The next night the Prison Reform Committee inspired us with a stirring appeal by Lewis Bernhard, an ex-convict. He told of his boyhood in Georgia. His parents were wealthy Christian people; at college he learned to play cards and to gamble, to gratify this passion he stole, and soon landed in prison; being released he went home only to find his mother dead and his brother unwilling to receive him. Back to his crime and prison again for twenty-two years in different States, until one night in New York City he determined to end his life, for it was impossible to find work; homeless, friendless, he wandered into Jerry McCauley's Mission and heard loving invitations to the men there to begin life anew. His heart was reached when an old lady came down the aisle, laid her hand on his shoulder and said, "Jesus loves you." Home memories were stirred, he wept and fell on his knees, in prayer.

A position as janitor being found for him and his joy at being trusted, kept him, through Divine Grace, from falling into his old sin, and now for seventeen years he has remained true to his Saviour.

Returning to Georgia he was able to organize prison reform and to help in other States also. His plea everywhere is: "Give discharged men and women a chance to work—put hope and courage into them, tell them of the Lord's power to save." He has a position in Providence, Rhode Island, at the "Church House" there.

The Yearly Meeting being over, our kind hosts took us to the shore five miles distant, and the Friends from Iowa were given their first sight of the sea. A fine surf breaking on the rocks delighted them, and they gathered shells to send home.

They then proceeded on their way to Canada Yearly Meeting, and we all separated in much love.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

A STOP IN HER MIND.
(1808)

MAUDE ROBINSON.

Before he was twelve, she decided that it would be best for him to be apprenticed. Having no ready money, she pocketed her pride and asked the Monthly Meeting to pay the premium for the fatherless lad. But this was not needed. James Sims, a life-long friend of John Kendal's, offered for the father's sake to take the boy free, and employ him in the large warehouse in Ebmouth, where he carried on the business of a ship-chandler.

He was a silent and rather stern man, and in his warehouse and home, where his employer's sons were all grown up, Mark came under most wholesome discipline. He did not dislike his work, and was intelligent enough to take real interest in the sails, ropes and other fittings for the different kind of craft. His scanty leisure was all spent about the beach and harbor, but for the first two or three years the work was so hard that supper and bed were all he wanted at the end of his day's employment.

But as he grew tall and strong, the work became light and easy, and a strange restlessness grew on the lad. No holiday afternoons in those days, no cricket, football or cycling. The week's work was not over till late in the night, but Mark would rise very early on the Sabbath morning and tramp the seven miles to the little shop at Lavercot to spend the day with his family.

His mother studied him anxiously. Sometimes he was wild and flighty, teasing his sisters and Matthew, but as he grew older he was moody and morose, and very unwilling to speak of his life in the town. The fact was there was much he did not wish his mother to know. The window of his little bedroom opened on to the roof of a shed, and Mark, who could climb like a squirrel, had got into the habit of slipping off to the ale-house, and among the sailors, whose reckless gaiety was a relief after the steady work and over-solemnity of the Sims household.

The remembrance of his home and his mother kept him from grosser sins, but the influences of the French Revolution had crept into English towns, and there was in Ebmouth a group of discontents, whose talk of liberty and equality fascinated Mark. His master had some inkling of this, and the day that his seven years' apprenticeship ended, gave him so long and perhaps unjust an admonition, that the lad flung up his employment, got work in another ship-chandler's, and from that day never darkened the doors of the Ebmouth Friends' Meeting House.

He went home but seldom, and to his mother's sorrow she heard that the Ebmouth Friends, after well-meant visits, which Mark received with sulky defiance, had disowned him from membership. It was at the time when the dark shadow of an invasion from the hated first Napoleon hung over the southern counties of England. The army and navy drew off the bread-winners, work was at a standstill, war taxes had raised the price of all provisions terribly, and there was actual starvation in many of the back streets and alleys of the seaport town.

The herds of fallow deer in Lavercot Chase were a great temptation, and it was well known that some of them found their way into the town by night. The younger keepers were away in the army with their master, Lord Lavercot, and the Chase was an immense area for three elderly men to patrol, who much preferred the warm ale-house to tramping through the wet fern in search of desperate deer-stealers.

At last two men with a pony-cart laden with innocent-looking heath brooms, were stopped by the constables, and underneath was hidden a dead hind from the Chase.

The Assizes were held a few days later, and by the barbarous law of those days, the two men, one a peddler of brooms and the other the landlord of the "Black Jack" tavern, were condemned to be hanged, and their bodies hung on a gibbet by the cross roads on the edge of the Chase.

The day that almost all Ebmouth were flocking to the place of execution as to an exciting spectacle, Mark came home, looking so white and miserable, that his mother drew him up to her bed-room, and seated in the big dimity chair, said, "My poor lad, tell me all that troubles thee."

Mark threw himself on the floor, hid his face in her lap, and told her that he had helped the men to get the hind the night before their arrest, cruelly catching it by a sharp hook baited with an apple. His intimate knowledge of the Chase and the habits of the deer, and innate love of adventure, had made him a most efficient poacher.

"And Mother, I did not think it was wrong; there are families in Ebmouth who taste nothing but the coarsest bread week in, week out. Why should not they have a bit of meat, when those useless beasts are eating the good grass of the Chase? What right has one man like Lord Lavercot to keep them just to look at—a man who does not know what hunger is? Poor Barnes of the 'Black Jack' always shared with the poorest. He used to make great coppers full of what he called onion gruel for the children, but there was something more nourishing than onions in the cans they took away! I have seen the little, grey, pinched faces grow almost plump and rosy, when a child had had his tin can filled every day for a week. We have done it many times during the winter, and who was the worse? And now they are hanging those poor chaps, and their children will be fatherless, and I helped to bring them to it! I can't stay in Ebbmouth after this, Mother; I must go to sea."

"Not in a King's ship, my son?"

"No, although Friends have disowned me, I am too much of a Quaker for that. I could not turn a gun on the poor Frenchies, who have been dragged from their homes and their honest work by a military tyrant—just as thousands of Englishmen are. If those who make the quarrels did the fighting there would not be much war."

"Do merchant ships sail safely in war time?"

"There is always a risk of being captured, but in Ebbmouth there is a fine barque, the Atalanta, fitting out for the East Indies. Captain Keith means to risk it. I know I could get a berth as carpenter's mate—I understand ship's tackle so well. Thou wouldst not be against it, Mother?"

Bridget Kendal sat in silence for a minute and then said, "The Lord is as near by sea as by land, my boy, so go, and may He keep and protect thee."

Mark returned to Ebbmouth (going several miles round to avoid the sight of the horrible gibbet) to finish his week's work, the day of execution being a holiday. He was readily engaged in the place he sought, and had a fortnight's free time before the crew were needed in the Atalanta.

A YEARLY MEETING EPISODE.

Some of us who for many years have had the uninterrupted privilege of attending the sessions of our Yearly Meeting, can recall many striking incidents which support the basis upon which its decisions have very generally been reached. Oftentimes in perplexing situations, the waiting for the Spirit of Truth to direct has been rewarded by happy and confirming assurance, that "the meek will He guide in judgment, and the meek will He teach his way." Not once nor twice, within the writer's recollection, has the decision arrived at been one somewhat remote from that expected when the initiative having been taken by intellect or by selfish interest, has yielded, or the minority has won over the majority by patiently waiting for the mind of Truth.

A few years since one of our younger members took the liberty of introducing into a session of the meeting, incognito, one of his acquaintance deeply interested in Christian work. The occasion happened to be one on which an important decision was arrived at in full harmony, after there had been much discussion, amid apparently diversity of opinion, by our simple method of seeking the guidance of the Spirit. As the visitor left the meeting, thanking his friend for the privilege accorded, he stated that it was the most remarkable experience of the kind in his life in a deliberative assembly. Accustomed as he was to arriving at decisions by vote, our Quaker method was for him a revelation.

But our intent is to refer to that pleasing incident of our late Yearly Meeting (perhaps forgotten by most who witnessed it), when at the conclusion of the fourth joint session the clerk, in introducing the subject of adjournment, raised the question as to whether it should be in expectation of again meeting jointly, or otherwise. Very promptly, and without apparent hesitation, several Friends united in the expression of a wish for joint session. Then came one of those pauses, which, as we have said, betokens the presentation of another viewpoint as to judgment. This time it was ours to listen to a woman who arises from her seat in the gallery, and gently pleads for separate sessions, and enforces that plea by alluding to one of the happiest, most pleasing episodes that, perhaps, ever happened in our Mother Yearly Meeting (London).

For a full generation the women Friends of that great body had been pleading to be constituted a meeting for discipline. At the Yearly Meeting held in 1753, the subject had been broached with such force by them as to win over many of the men Friends to their plea, but being strongly opposed by many the matter was postponed, and kept in postponement. At one time when the subject was revived a Friend remarked,

"I see it but not now; I behold it but not nigh." In the year 1784 the subject took such hold of the Women's Yearly Meeting that it was decided to appoint a delegation to visit the men's meeting, then sitting, and personally plead their cause before them. This delegation was composed of nine women of prominence in the Yearly Meeting, to whose number by invitation were added three visiting ministers from America, among whom, and of exceeding helpfulness, was Rebecca Jones. The recorded accounts of the reception given this remarkable delegation by men Friends, leave the impression that the event was one of a highly picturesque and stirring nature. The arguments whereby prominent individuals among men Friends had held off their sister members could no longer withstand the rising sense of justice; and, as one prominent in the affairs of the church wrote, "the evidence of Truth so strongly impressed the minds of those present with a sense of their concern being right, that a minute was made to that purpose at the next sitting of the meeting, and a copy of the said minute handed to the women Friends by a deputation from the men's meeting, of which the same Friend was one, and who quaintly adds: 'We had a good time among them, and left them in sweet peace.'"

There is a beautiful tradition (and it was the reference to this tradition that won our hearts in our Yearly Meeting), that at the head of the delegation of women Friends, as it entered the men's meeting room, walked that queenly personage Esther Tuke, and that a man Friend who had all along been in sympathy with their concern, stepped forward and greeted her with the words: "What is thy petition, Queen Esther? and it shall be granted thee; and what is thy request? and it shall be performed, even to the half of the kingdom." How unlike in spirit and in wisdom the sentiment expressed by one of the men, that it would be preposterous to have a body with two heads; to which Rebecca Jones responded that there was but one head to the body which is the church, and that in Jesus Christ male and female are one.

The sequel may be given in the words of the minute adopted by men's meeting, as follows:

"This meeting after a solid and deliberate consideration of the proposition brought in from the meeting of Women Friends, held annually in this city, agrees that the said meeting be at liberty to correspond with the Quarterly Meetings of Women Friends, to receive accounts from them, and issue such advice as in the wisdom of Truth may, from time to time, appear necessary, and conducive to their mutual edification. For this purpose it will be expedient that the said meeting be a meeting of record, and be denominated the Yearly Meeting of Women Friends, held in London, etc."

THE SPRING CONFERENCE OF THE FRIENDS' MISSION AT SOROCHINSKOYE.

The spring conference of the Sorochinskoye unit opened with a welcome to Wilbur K. Thomas, who was able to reach the field at last after having been held up for weeks by the floods which tore up the tracks and bridges and made travel between Moscow and Sorochinskoye impossible. Wilbur Thomas brought greetings and regret from Clement Bidle and Ruth Fry, who were unable to remain in Russia long enough to visit the field.

In order to give Wilbur Thomas a better idea of the work before future plans for the mission work, the main object of his visit, should be discussed, the district supervisors and department heads reported on their work first.

Emily Simmonds brought word from Pugachev that in a district comprising 27 volosts and numbering some 100,000 people, we distributed for Third Month 15,540 pyoks, and for Fourth and Fifth Months 23,127. The A. R. A. is feeding children in this territory, but a pitifully inadequate ration, and it is certain that had the Quaker food not arrived when it did, the majority of people now receiving pyoks would be dead or in the last stages of starvation. No actual deaths have been reported in the districts which are receiving the Quaker pyok since the second week in Third Month, when the little village of Imaleyevka had a toll of twelve. But there are still cases of famine-swelling.

The transport situation is very difficult, as many of the volosts are more than a hundred versts from headquarters, and as horses are so scarce a great many cows have to be used for hauling. Another problem has been the great influx of refugees from the Ukraine and Siberia, who have come back to find the houses they formerly occupied entirely torn to pieces for the wood that was in them. The health situation is very serious, as an ever-increasing number of peasants are coming down with malaria, and there is no quinine available.

The hopeful side of the situation in Pugachev is that, in spite of the terrible suffering of the people, there has been splendid co-operation of all the local officials in the prompt and just distribution of food, and that amazing energy has been shown by the people in getting their land plowed and seeded in spite of their weakened condition and the lack of working stock. A great deal of land has been spaded and sown by hand, and small groups have been pooling whatever resources they have had in order to send one of their number to Siberia to buy a horse which they can use to work their land collectively. Constant requests are coming in for clothes, for medicines, and for help in getting horses; but the mission has had to confine itself entirely to relief feeding in Pugachev. The people are delighted to have a chance to buy the flour sacks at four million roubles apiece (about three cents) to be made into clothes, so desperate is their need.

The reports of the district supervisors of the Buzuluk section disclosed a healthy revival of conditions throughout the whole district owing to the continuous feeding the Friends have been doing for the last eighteen months. The improvement is revealed in the statistics which show an increasing number of births and a decreasing number of deaths. Much new stock is also being born this spring. The feeding lists have been cut down to an absolute minimum, and it is certain that should the Quaker pyoks be withdrawn before the harvest much suffering and probably mortality would result, as the people who are receiving rations have absolutely nothing.

In line with the policy of the Department of Health all over Russia to decrease the number of permanent institutions for children and get them back into their homes, and concentrate on the establishment of clinics and consultations for the general health of the children, is the closing down of many of the Children's Homes, the returning to their relatives of as many "part orphans" as possible, and the concentrating into fewer and better homes the children who remain. In the Sorochinskoye district the number of homes has been reduced from fifteen to five. One of these homes has been turned into a technical school for the older children.

The floods cut off all communication with the Grachovka outpost during the month, so Katharine Amend was unable to do anything in her district during that period. The horse situation is more serious here than anywhere else, and many people are spading up the ground by hand. The malaria epidemic is increasing daily, and almost the entire population is affected.

Wilbur Thomas, after hearing the various points of view, brought home to the workers very clearly and forcefully some of the real meaning of Quakerism, which some of the difficulties of the work had tended to obscure during the past months. He spoke of the idealism that had impelled the Service Committee to send out these groups of workers to different parts of the world to express in service the love for their fellowmen which is the basis of Christianity, and to try in a small way to overcome the great evil that was being done to each other by the nations of the world. He told of conferences with government officials in Moscow, and of the appreciation they expressed of the Quaker work, and their desire that the Friends continue in Russia—and suggested that from now on by working in closer touch with the central authorities who have the good of Russia at heart and who understand more clearly what the work of the Friends means, it might be possible to overcome many of the local difficulties. He finally put it up to the group squarely that it was not the material help alone that counted, but that if we could not bring a deeper spiritual message to the people of Russia by carrying on the work in a real spirit of love and brotherhood, and actually help them in the creation of a better world by our presence here, that it would be useless for the mission to remain.

And out of the doubts and hesitations of the group there emerged a sincere feeling that there were no difficulties that could not be overcome if approached in the right spirit, and that having brought the people thus far through the tortures of hunger we could not desert them now just as they were beginning to reconstruct their lives again. The final conclusion of the group was that the work of the Quakers would be needed in Buzuluk Ooyezd for many years to come, and that through certain immediate measures of material assistance it would be possible to achieve the higher spiritual aims.

The specific lines suggested along which the work should be carried on were an anti-malaria campaign, the purchase and re-sale of horses with a revolving fund to be put into new horses, and as a smaller and more concrete piece of work to be carried on this summer before actual relief should cease, the repairing and equipping of the schools and hospitals in Buzuluk Ooyezd.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.—At the Commencement exercises at the close of the school year a class of forty-one was graduated. Essays were read by Mary Elizabeth Harold, John E. Parker, Edna E. Wetherald and Mary R. Worth. The Valedictory was given by William B. Test. The closing address to the class was delivered by Elbert Russell, Director of the Woolman School. Alumni prizes for high scholarship were awarded to George P. Lippincott, Esther K. Harris, John H. Wills and Florence Houghton, and for greatest improvement in scholarship to William B. Test, Anna G. Haviland, T. Poultnery E. Mathews and Rachel H. Wood. The Class of 1914 Reading prize was awarded to Helen G. Bell. The following Seniors, because of high scholarship, were elected to the Cum Laude Society, an honor society in secondary schools corresponding to the Phi Beta Kappa of the colleges.—Edna E. Wetherald, Dorothy Michener, Mary R. Worth.

On the evening before Commencement a very interesting program of the Union Literary Society was given, the Senior girls presenting Milton's Comus. The meeting was held on the girls' hockey field; the sloping bank with its setting of fir trees made a very pleasant and suitable background.

About thirty of the pupils remained over at the School after Commencement for the College Board examinations, now held at the School. In addition to our own pupils, several young people from West Chester and Kennett Square High Schools took advantage of the convenience of Westtown as an examination centre.

During the summer the old mill is to be remodelled as a centre for the Westtown Community Club, an organization which was formed about three years ago and has steadily increased in interest. The expense of remodelling the building is being borne by several interested friends of the School, while the club is assuming the expense of furnishings. To raise money for this purpose a chicken supper was recently given in the school dining-room, for which nearly three hundred and fifty tickets were sold.

The following members of the Faculty are planning to attend Summer School.—Samuel H. Brown, Albert L. Baily, Jr., Caroline L. Nicholson, E. Grant Spicer, J. Ruth Kellum, Cebrun W. Joyner, Lewis A. Taylor, Eugene R. Raiford, Jessie A. Wood.

GEORGE L. JONES.

SAMUEL L. HAWORTH and wife of High Point, N. C., who were in attendance at Philadelphia Yearly Meeting last spring, expect to sail next month for an extended visit among English Friends.

More than one door of service has unexpectedly opened before them, the most interesting one being a pressing call to spend a few months at Ram Allah, Palestine, heading up the boys' school there, while Edward Kelsey comes to America on vacation.

In a recent report from the Quaker Centre in Berlin occurs the following:—

Yesterday a gentleman from A—— called and told me something of his endeavors to come into touch with the Quakers. He knew of course of the feeding in his town and went to the German who was the local head of it, only to be told that he could receive no information! Then he got hold of the local paper which mentioned a book that had the London address in it. There naturally he got some information and was advised to apply here. He was an officer during the war, and is still the head of an officers' society and has, as he expressed it, had to fight hard with himself to come to the Quakers, but he felt he must find out what lay at the back of such strange and unaccountable doings as their work seemed to him to be; he was convinced that there must be some spiritual power behind it, or it could never have been done, besides the inexplicable strangeness of it.—“Personal Religion and The Service of Humanity.”

In the multiplicity of details and in the pressure of business, a committee may lose the keen sense of commission to attempt and achieve great tasks. A Committee, like the individual, needs time to think and it needs an attitude of mind and soul which can make it able to receive increasingly the thoughts of God about its work. We cannot be too clear that it is nothing less than “a new thing” which will meet the situation. Individually the faith of most of us is too weak sufficiently to grasp the promise: “Behold, I will do a new thing,” but a committee which grasps with corporate faith such a promise is the committee which will have a spirit of adventure in attempting the humanly impossible. And those who thus trust God discover God.

RENDEL HARRIS in speaking of the daily tasks of his party at the Convent of St. Catherine, Mount Sinai, last winter, says: “We have every opportunity for study in the Library.

Every day there are six of us at work there. Dr. Hatch is classifying over again the MSS. of the New Testament, H. G. Wood is reading lives of the Saints, Mary Dobson and her friend are deciphering Arabic Apocrypha, Dr. Benson, our lady physician, is copying beautiful MSS. and illuminations, and I am on the all-round hunt for prey. We work till 12 NOON, resume at 2 P. M., and go on until 4 P. M., and afternoon tea. The whole varied and supplemented by various mountain expeditions.”

Referring to a personal incident to which we have already alluded he writes: “We are often interrupted by great festivals, when the firing of a gun and the ringing of bells intimate that it is a holiday and the Library is closed. This will happen next week, when three dignitaries are to be remembered: St. John Chrysostom, the Kaiser Wilhelm and myself. So we shall have a day off for a mountain excursion. Most of our party have been up Jebel Musa, but I do not venture so high myself as I have not the physical strength. No one has yet ventured Jebel Catherine, which is said to be a two days' climb; it looks very attractive, but perhaps somewhat steep and higher than Jebel Musa by a good bit.”

THE appeal here referred to will recall to many of our readers a cause with which they were identified for many years.

It has been decided to gather funds for a Memorial to the late Pandita Ramabai. In Europe, America, Australia, as well as throughout the whole of the Eastern countries, the name of Ramabai is revered. Christianity owes a debt to the name and example of Ramabai. Civilization is under an obligation to perpetuate her memory. The womanhood of India and the East recognize that their religious and educational freedom is partly due to her pioneer efforts. Her life and work will continue as a criterion for future generations, because her standard of attainment is unique.

ONE, writing of the present status of the Friends' Hospital at Châlons, France, says: “The staff consists of seven trained (four French, three English) and ten aides (two American, three French, one Swiss, and four English). The spirit of them all is most friendly and harmonious, and the work of the hospital goes on perfectly smoothly and without a hitch. The patients are as full of gratitude as ever.”
